Sharpstein, J. Appellant applied to the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco for a writ of mandate to compel respondent, as treasurer of said city and county, to pay to the petitioner certain moneys received by him in his official capacity. A general demurrer to the petition was interposed and sustained, and this appeal is from the judgment thereupon entered denying the relief sought. A writ of mandate may be issued by any court, except a justice's or police court, to any inferior tribunal, corporation, board, or person, to compel the performance of an act which the law specially enjoins as a duty resulting from an office, trust, or station. Code Civil Proc. § 1085. The contention of appellant is that the law specially enjoins upon respondent, as a duty resulting from his office as treasurer, the payment to appellant the moneys demanded of him by it, by reason of certain acts of the legislature, the first of which was approved April 1, 1870, and provides, among other things, that "the Home for the Care of the Inebriates of San Francisco shall always be kept open for the reception and care of inebriates, both male and female, of every nationality and sect, free of charge for their support, care, or medical attendance while they necessarily remain therein;" and that "any police judge or magistrate of the city and county of San Francisco is hereby empowered to commit any person whom he shall convict of habitual intemperance to said home." But the act mainly relied on in support of appellant's contention is an act entitled "An act to provide for the care and maintenance of inebriates and certain insane persons in the city and county of San Francisco," approved March 17, 1876, which provides that "the fines and forfeitures, not exceeding eight hundred dollars in the aggregate in any one month, imposed and collected by the police judges' court in and for the city and county of San Francisco, from persons arrested for being drunk or under the influence of liquor, shall be by the clerk of said police judge's court immediately paid to the president, secretary, and treasurer, or a majority of them, at the Home for the Care of Inebriates, of said city and county, for the support and maintenance of said Home for the Care of Inebriates, and the construction and improvement of a building for said Home for the Care of Inebriates;" and that "all persons in said city and county, charged with being insane, and pending their examination, or found to be insane and en route for a state insane asylum, shall be placed in the said home, without charge to said city and county." The treasurer of the city and county of San Francisco is not by this act enjoined, nor even authorized, to receive or disburse any of said moneys, but the duty of paying said moneys to the officers of the home is expressly imposed upon the clerk of the police judge's court, and he is required to pay it to them immediately. Section 75 of article 6 of the consolidation act requires that "all fines, penalties, and forfeitures imposed for offenses committed within the said city and county shall be received by the clerk or magistrate of the respective court, and paid into the treasury thereof as a part of the police fund."

And since the passage of the act of March 17, 1876, it has been the duty of said clerk or magistrate to pay into said treasury any excess over $800 received in any one month by them for fines, etc. Whatever sum or sums the treasurer received from that source became at once a part of the police fund out of which the fixed salaries of police captains and officers, chief of police, police judge, and clerk of the police court could alone be paid. It is the duty of the treasurer to safely keep all moneys belonging to or paid into the treasury, and not to pay out any part of said moneys except upon demands authorized by the consolidation act. By an act approved March 5, 1889, the clerk of each department of the police court is required to pay into the treasury of said city and county, once a week, all fines and forfeitures imposed by said court. This act is clearly repugnant to that which required the clerk of said court to pay an amount not exceeding $800 in any one month, of the fines and forfeitures imposed and collected by the police court from persons arrested for being drunk or under the influence of liquor, immediately to certain officers of appellant. Besides, the act of 1889 contains a clause repealing all acts and parts of acts in conflict with any of its provisions. But, whatever effect may be given to this latter act, there is not, nor ever has been, any law which specially enjoins it as a duty of the respondent resulting from an office, trust, or station, to pay to appellant any money from the treasury, no matter from what source received. Judgment affirmed.

I concur: Paterson, J.

De Haven, J., (concurring.) I concur in the judgment of affirmance upon the ground that mandamus is not the proper remedy, but I dissent from so much of the opinion of Mr. Justice Sharpstein as holds that the act of March 17, 1876, (St. 1875-76, p. 325,) is repealed by the later act of March 5, 1889, (St. 1889, p. 62,) and upon this latter point I adopt as a correct statement of the law the opinion of Mr. Commissioner Belcher, prepared for the court upon the former submission of this case. In that opinion it is said:

"By an act of the legislature approved April 1, 1870, (St. 1869-70, p. 585,) it was provided that 'the Home for the Care of the Inebriate of San Francisco shall always be kept open for the reception and care of inebriates, both male and female, of every nationality and sect, free of charge for their support, care, or medical attendance, while they necessarily remain therein;' and that 'any police judge or magistrate of the city and county of San Francisco is hereby empowered to commit any person whom he shall convict of habitual intemperance to said home.' By another act, entitled 'An act to provide for the care and maintenance of inebriates and certain insane persons in the city and county of San Francisco,' approved March 17, 1876, (St. 1875-76, p. 325,) it was provided that 'the fines and forfeitures, not exceeding eight hundred dollars in the aggregate in any one month, imposed and collected by the police judge's court, in and for the city and county of San Francisco, from persons arrested for being drunk or under the influence of liquor, shall be, by the clerk of said police judge's court, immediately paid to the president, secretary, and treasurer, or a majority of them, of the Home for the Care of Inebriates, of said city and county, for the support and maintenance of said Home for the Care of Inebriates, and the construction and improvements of a building for said Home for the Care of Inebriates;' and that 'all persons in said city and county, charged with being insane, and pending their examination, or found to be insane and en route for a state insane asylum, shall be placed in the said home, and shall be cared for by the officers thereof, while in said home, without charge to said city and county.' The petitioner is now, and has been for more than twenty-five years, an eleemosynary corporation duly incorporated and existing under the laws of this state, and situated in the city and county of San Francisco. It has a duly elected, qualified, and acting president, secretary, and treasurer, and is the owner of a lot and building thereon in the said city and county, which is now, and has been for several years, used as a home for inebriates and insane persons committed to its care. It has always, since the passage of the aforesaid acts, fully complied with their provisions, and has at all times kept its home open for the reception and care of inebriates, both male and female, of every nationality and sect, free of charge for their support, care, and medical attendance, and has received therein all persons in said city and county, charged with being insane, and pending their examination, and all persons found to be insane and en route to an insane asylum; and has cared for, supported, and furnished medical attendance to them without charge. It has now under its care a large number of persons who are habitually intemperate, and others who are insane; and the money appropriated by the act of March 17, 1876, is necessary to pay for the maintenance of the said home. Between the 5th day of March and the 1st day of November, 1889, certain fines and forfeitures, the amount for each month being specifically named, were by the police court of the city and county of San Francisco imposed upon and collected from persons arrested for being drunk or under the influence of liquor; and all of the moneys so collected were paid into the hands of the respondent, as treasurer of the said city and county, and are now in his possession. Prior to the commencement of this proceeding, petitioner duly demanded of respondent payment of all the said several sums of money, except the amounts in excess of eight hundred dollars, but respondent refused, and has ever since refused, to pay the same, or any part thereof, to it or to any of its officers, or to any one in its behalf. Wherefore judgment is asked commanding such payment to be made.

"The respondent contends that the act of March 17, 1876, was repealed by an act approved March 5, 1889, (St. 1889, p. 62.) The last-named act is entitled 'An act to create a police court in and for the city and county of San Francisco, state of California,' and the provisions relied upon as effecting the repeal are sections 10 and 13, which read as follows: Section 10: 'All fines and forfeitures imposed by said court shall be paid into the treasury of said city and county by the clerk of each department once a week.' Section 13: 'All acts and parts of acts that are in conflict with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.' It will be observed that no special reference is made to the act of March 17, 1876, and the repeal, if any was effected, was therefore by implication. But the general and well-settled rule is that repeals by implication are not favored. Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, (6th Ed.) p. 182, states the law as follows: 'Repeals by implication are not favored; and the repugnancy between two statutes should be very clear to warrant a court holding that the latter in time repeals the other, when it does not in terms purport to do so. This rule has peculiar force in the case of laws of special and local application, which are never to be deemed repealed by general legislation except upon the most unequivocal manifestation of intent to that effect.' In End. Interp. St. § 223, this language is used: 'A general act is to be construed as not repealing a particular one,—that is, one directed towards a special object or a special class of objects. * * * Having already given its attention to the particular subject and provided for it, the legislature is reasonably presumed not to intend to alter that special provision by a subsequent general enactment, unless that intention is manifested in explicit language, or there be something which shows that the attention of the legislature has been turned to the special act, and that the general one was intended to embrace the special cases within the previous one. * * * The general statute is read as silently excluding from its operation the cases which have been provided for by the special one. * * * The fact that the general act contains a clause repealing acts inconsistent with it does not diminish the force of this rule of construction.' And see People v. Quigg, 59 N. Y. 83; Merrill v. Gorham, 6 Cal. 42; Crosby v. Patch, 18 Cal. 439.

"Under the law, as thus declared, can the respondent's contention be sustained? We do not think it can. The police judge's court was created by the consolidation act of the city and county of San Francisco, passed in 1856, and it was therein provided that the clerk of the court should 'receive and pay weekly into the treasury of the city and county all fines imposed by said court.' The act of March 5, 1889, was, in effect, an amendment of the consolidation act, and, though it slightly changed the name of the old police court, it was not intended, and did not have the effect, to abolish that court, but only to add another judge thereto, and to reorganize the court thus increased in numbers by dividing the same into departments with a presiding judge. Ex parte Lloyd, 78 Cal. 421, 20 Pac. Rep. 872. The legislature had no power, by a local or special law, to create new offices or to prescribe the powers and duties of officers, (Const. art. 4, § 25, subd. 28;) nor did it attempt to do so. It simply, so far as the duties of the clerk as to paying over fines were prescribed, repeated, in substance, the language of the old act. In this we see nothing to indicate that the attention of the legislature was turned to the special act of March 17, 1876, or that there was any intention or purpose to repeal it. It results that when the respondent received the money in controversy he received and held it for the use of petitioner."

But conceding this to be so, mandamus is not the proper remedy, and if defendant, or the city and county of San Francisco, wrongfully withholds money which belongs to the petitioner, his remedy is by action in the ordinary course of law.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.: GAROUTTE, J.

MCFARLAND, J. I dissent. I concur in the opinion of Mr. Justice DE HAVEN, except as to the remedy.

HARRISON, J., (concurring.) The appellant is a private corporation in the city and county of San Francisco, under the management of officers entirely disconnected with the municipal government, and asks for a mandate against the treasurer of said city and county, directing him to pay to it a sum of money to which it claims a right under the provisions of the act of March 17, 1876. St. 1875-76, p. 325. It may be very seriously questioned whether, under the former constitution, the legislature had the power to compel a donation of the city's money to a private corporation, or to direct the payment in each month to such corporation of a specific sum of money, irrespective of any benefit or service rendered by it to the city. Without passing upon this question, the act above referred to is, however, obnoxious to the charge of violating section 31 of article 4 of that constitution, within the principles declared in the cases of San Francisco v. Spring Valley Water Works, 48 Cal. 493; Turnpike Road Co. v. Cole, 51 Cal. 381; Railroad Co. v. Baldwin, 57 Cal. 160. The act of April 1, 1870, (St. 1869-70, p. 585,) prescribing the powers and duties of the officers of the appellant, which it claims affords the consideration for which it was authorized to receive the money directed to be paid under the act of 1876, was clearly without the power of the legislature to enact. The legislature had no power to confer such special privileges upon any corporation, or to pass any special act conferring authority upon it, or prescribing the powers and duties of its officers. The attempt by these acts to impose any duty or obligation upon the plaintiff was without the constitutional authority of the legislature, and the plaintiff, by virtue of said acts, neither acquired any right, nor became subject to any duty. The provisions of section 10 of the act of March 5, 1889, (St. 1889, p. 62,) that all fines and forfeitures imposed by the police court shall be paid into the treasury of the city and county of San Francisco by the clerk thereof, is in direct harmony with section 16, art. 11, of the present constitution, which directs all municipal moneys to be paid to the treasurer, and operates as a direct repeal of that portion of the act of 1876 which authorized the clerk of the police court to pay certain moneys to the appellant. By bringing this action against the treasurer the appellant impliedly admits that the act of 1876 is repealed so far as it directs the payment to it by the clerk of the fines collected by him, but it contends that the other portion of the act is left in force. Inasmuch, however, as under the provision of the constitution above referred to, the legislature could not have authorized the payment of those fines to any other officer than the treasurer of the city and county, it must be held that the entire act is repealed, even if it had any validity when originally enacted. After the money has once been received into the treasury, the treasurer is not authorized to pay out any portion thereof, except as authorized by law, and after the demand therefor shall have been duly audited. Section 82 of the consolidation act provides that "no payment can be made from the treasury, or out of the public funds of said city and county, unless the same be specifically authorized by this act, nor unless the demand which is paid be duly audited, as in this act provided, and that must appear upon the face of it." Section 84 of the same act declares that "every demand upon the treasury * * * must, before it can be paid, be presented to the auditor of the city and county to be allowed, who shall satisfy himself whether the money is legally due and remains unpaid, and whether the payment thereof from the treasury of the city and county is authorized by law, and out of what fund. * * * No demand can be approved, allowed, audited, or paid unless it specify each several items, date, and value composing it, and refer to the law by title, date, and section authorizing the same." It is not alleged by the appellant that the claim which it asks that the treasurer be directed to pay was in any respect audited, as above provided. The provision in section 10 of the act of 1889, directing the clerk of the police court to pay these moneys into the treasury, is not in the creation of any new office, or the conferring of any additional powers upon an existing officer, but a mere direction to him for the disposition of the moneys which he may receive. Nor did the provisions of the act of 1876, even if that act was constitutional, create a contract between the appellant and the city, or give to the appellant any rights or privileges which could not at any time thereafter be revoked by the legislature. It was but an act of legislation subject to repeal at the will of the body which enacted it. For these reasons, as well as for those contained in the opinion of Mr. Justice Sharpstein, the judgment should be affirmed.

EJECTMENT—TITLE TO SUPPORT—POSSESSION—REVIEW ON APPEAL.

1. If two owners in severalty of adjoining tracts by mutual consent inclose them by a fence around the exterior boundaries of both, the inclosure constitutes possession by each of the tract claimed by him, as against a mere intruder who brings ejectment; and it is immaterial whether the land is public or private.

2. While T. was in possession of land, plaintiff, claiming under a deed from one in whom he did not even suppose there was title, entered and began to build a shanty, but T., when he learned of it, tore it down, and drove him off. A few days afterwards, plaintiff again attempted to build the shanty, and slept there without bedding, but T. again tore it down before completion, and drove him off. Nothing further was done by plaintiff for three years, when he brought ejectment against T. Held, that plaintiff had no such title or possession as entitled him to maintain the action.

3. The rule that the appellate court will not review the findings of fact where the evidence was conflicting, applies though the evidence consisted entirely of depositions, affidavits, and notes of testimony given at a former trial before another judge, and is not limited to cases where there were witnesses before the court.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; Walter H. Levy, Judge.

Action of ejectment by J. W. Reay against John Butler and others. From a judgment for defendants, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. B. Mhoon and W. W. Foote, for appellant. Fisher Ames, (S. M. Wilson and W. S. Goodfellow, of counsel,) for respondents.

McFarland, J. This is an action of ejectment, and was commenced by plaintiff on February 20, 1866, in the former district court of the fifteenth judicial district, against John Butler and P. H. Owens, who were the only persons named as defendants. In the complaint it is averred that on the 1st day of January, 1863, plaintiff was "seised and possessed" of certain described land, situate in the city and county of San Francisco; and that on said 1st day of January, 1863, the defendants (Butler and Owens) wrongfully entered upon said land "and ousted and ejected plaintiff therefrom, and ever since have held and now hold possession thereof from plaintiff." There was a former appeal in this case, reported in 69 Cal. 573, 11 Pac. Rep. 463, and from the opinion of this court, then delivered, it appears that Butler and Owens answered, denying all the averments of the complaint, averring that J. P. Treadwell was "the owner and in possession" of the land sued for; that they (Butler and Owens) were there only by license of Treadwell, and praying that the latter be allowed to defend the action, and that they be dismissed; and that by leave of court Treadwell filed an intervention, in which he set up matters upon which he claimed certain equitable relief. It appears, further, that the district court, after having impaneled a jury to try the cause, and after the trial had commenced, concluded to try what were supposed to be the equitable issues first, and, against the objections and exceptions of plaintiff, discharged the jury, and, after a hearing of said equitable issues, rendered judgment perpetually enjoining plaintiff from further prosecution of his action. But on the appeal from that judgment, this court held that there were no equitable issues, and that plaintiff was entitled to a jury trial, and reversed the judgment, with directions to strike out the intervention, and that the representative of the intervener (said Treadwell in the mean time having died) be allowed to defend the action. When the case went down to the superior court, new answers were filed for Owens and Butler, and Mrs. Mabel Treadwell, who was then administratrix of said J. P. Treadwell, filed an answer, by leave of court, in her own name. In her answer she denied all the averments of the complaint; and she averred that at the commencement of the action, and for more than five years prior thereto, said J. P. Treadwell, by himself and his grantors and predecessors, was and had been the owner and in possession of all that part of the land sued for which was known as the "Speck Ranch," and was in possession of the same continuously until his death, which occurred in December, 1884; that since his death, she as administratrix, has been in possession thereof, and the estate of said Treadwell, deceased, and his heirs and devisees are the owners and entitled to the possession thereof; and that, at the time of the commencement of the action, the defendants Owens and Butler were not in possession of any of the land described in the complaint, but were, to plaintiff's knowledge, the mere servants and employes of said J. P. Treadwell. Both parties waived a jury, and the court, after a second hearing of the case, made its findings of fact, and found as a conclusion of law "that defendants are entitled to judgment in this action." Whereupon judgment was entered that "plaintiff take nothing by this action," and that defendants be dismissed, and recover costs of plaintiff. Plaintiff made a motion for a new trial, which was denied, and he appeals from the judgment, and from the order denying his said motion.

There is only one assignment of error occurring during the trial, which will be noticed hereafter. The main contentions of appellant are that the evidence is insufficient to justify the findings of fact, and that the decision is against law. It is clear, however, that if the findings are justified by the evidence, then the conclusion of law and the judgment are correct; so that the real question in the case is, does the evidence justify the findings? At the trial, by consent of the parties, a large part of the testimony taken at the first trial was read without recalling the witnesses, and two or three depositions were introduced; and appellant contends that, when a case has been decided by the lower court upon this kind of evidence, the rule that this court will not disturb a finding when there is a conflict of evidence does not apply, and that this court should sit practically as a nisi prius court, and draw its own conclusions from the evidence, regardless of the conclusions arrived at by the jury or the judge in the trial court. While, for the reasons hereafter stated, the determination of this point is not absolutely essential to the decision of this appeal, it may be well for the benefit of future litigants to intimate that the doctrine contended for has not, thus far at least, become the settled law of this state. It has been held here in more than a hundred cases, commencing with Payne v. Jacobs, in the first published books of reports of this court, (1 Cal. 39,) and ending with Dobinson v. McDonald, in the last volume of such reports, (92 Cal. 33, 27 Pac. Rep. 1098,) that the finding of a jury or a court as to a fact decided upon the weight of evidence will not be reviewed by this court, and so the general rule is clearly established. It was said, however, in the opinion of the court in two or three cases, notably in Wilson v. Cross, 33 Cal. 60, that the reason of the rule is that the court below has the advantage of observing the appearance and bearing of the witnesses, and that such reason does not obtain when the witnesses do not appear personally in court. But it may be well argued that such is not the only reason of the rule; that it is founded in the essential distinction between the trial and the appellate court under our system, and grows out of considerations of jurisdiction; that it is the province of the trial court to decide questions of fact, of the appellate court to decide questions of law; that this court can rightfully set aside a finding for want of evidence only where there is no evidence to support it, or where the supporting evidence is so slight as to show abuse of discretion. Indeed there are numerous cases in which the decisions of this court have been directly contrary to the doctrine contended for by appellant. For instance, it has been held directly in several cases that the rule as to conflicting evidence applies to a case where the trial was before one judge and the motion for a new trial passed upon by his successor, and where the latter saw none of the witnesses; or where the trial was before the old district court, and the motion before the succeeding superior court. Bauder v. Tyrrel, 59 Cal. 99; Altschul v. Doyle, 48 Cal. 535; Macy v. Davila, Id. 647. The same rule has been applied on appeal from an order dissolving an injunction, where all the evidence in the lower court was upon affidavits. Parrott v. Floyd, 54 Cal. 535. In Bauder v. Tyrrel, supra, the court says: "The trial court decides as to the facts, the court of review (in this state) as to questions of law only." The appellate court will, no doubt, look a little more closely into the evidence when it consists entirely of depositions, or affidavits, or notes of former testimony; but it cannot be taken as settled that in such a case the rule as to conflicting evidence does not apply. But even if the rule were as appellant contends, it would not apply to the case at bar; for in this case two or three witnesses, including the plaintiff himself, whose former testimony was read, were re-examined at the last trial, and about 15 new witnesses were examined whose testimony was to a large extent important and material; and under these circumstances, it is quite clear that the general rule as to conflicting evidence applies. Blum v. Sunol, 63 Cal. 341.

The appellant's objections to the findings, as not supported by the evidence, refer mainly to those findings which set forth the possessory right of the said J. P. Treadwell to the land in controversy at the time of the alleged ouster. The findings as to such right, are, in brief, as follows: In the year 1853 one Alexander Speck entered upon a tract of land containing about 41 acres, and known afterwards as the "Speck Ranch,"—being part of the premises described in the complaint. It was then part of the unoccupied pueblo lands of San Francisco. In that year (1853) he built a house on the land, and lived there during part of that year, and during the next year, and down to October, 1855. He made charcoal at various times from wood on the land, and had a garden on it, and raised vegetables. A man named Killian claimed a piece of land containing about 39 acres, which adjoined the Speck ranch on the north; and in 1853, Speck and Killian jointly built substantial brush fences around the exterior boundaries of the two tracts, which fences, together with some fencing which had been built by other adjoining claimants, inclosed the two tracts with fences sufficient to turn cattle; and these fences were at all times, down to the commencement of the action, sufficient to turn cattle. There was no fence along the boundary line between the land claimed by Speck and that claimed by Killian, but each recognized the claim of the other, and the fences were built jointly for the purpose of protecting each in the possession of what he claimed. In October, 1855, Speck went to the mines, but did not abandon the Speck ranch. He left it in the possession and keeping of one Robert Sheridan, as tenant of himself and Killian. Sheridan lived with his family in the Speck house, manufactured charcoal out of wood on the land, kept the exterior fences around both tracts in good condition, and held possession until the spring of 1859. After Sheridan left, Killian took charge and possession of the two claims for himself and Speck, and early in 1860 placed one Markgraf in possession as employe of both. Markgraf repaired the fences, and built some new fencing. He resided on the Killian claim within the common inclosure until Christmas, 1861. He also built a new house on the Killian claim, and Killian resided in said new house from some time in 1861 to the end of 1862. In February, 1861, Speck executed to one Marye a power of attorney (recorded March 6, 1861) to sell and convey the Speck ranch on his (Speck's) behalf, and on March 1, 1861, Marye sold and conveyed the same to one Austin E. Smith,—deed recorded March 6, 1861. Through conveyances from Smith and his grantee, all right and title of said Speck to said Speck ranch vested in said J. P. Treadwell on April 28, 1862. Treadwell was a bona fide purchaser, and entered into possession without notice of any other claim to the land except that of the city and county of San Francisco. The defendants Owens and Butler never had any possession of the land in contest; but at the time of the commencement of the action were the mere employes of Treadwell, and occupied in building a house for the latter. The foregoing are the main facts found with respect to the possessory right of Treadwell; but there are many details in the findings not necessary to be recited here. There was conflicting evidence as to some of the facts found, particularly as to whether the fences around the two tracts were kept up in good condition; whether Speck's house was below or above the line between his land and that of Killian; whether Speck abandoned his claim when he went to the mines; whether Sheridan and Markgraf were in possession under Speck; whether Killian always recognized the right of Speck, and was in possession for both himself and Speck, etc. But upon an examination of the evidence we find that it sufficiently supports the findings of the facts upon which Treadwell's possessory rights are based, and we perceive no abuse of discretion committed by the lower court in making such findings.

It is contended by appellant that the common inclosure of the two tracts by an exterior fence around both did not constitute possession by either claimant, there being no tenancy in common between them. But if two owners in severalty of adjoining tracts of land, by mutual consent, inclose the two tracts together by a fence around the exterior boundaries of both, it seems clear enough that the inclosure thus made constitutes possession as against any third party who is a mere intruder. It is contended also that, even if this rule were good as to private lands, it cannot be applied to the possession of public lands; but we fail to see the distinction, so far, at least, as to affect the case at bar. Here there is no question as to what kind of possession, or what acts, would give to the occupant of public land the right to acquire the title in fee from the public proprietor. The case merely presents a contest of alleged possessory rights between the parties to the action, and the title of the real proprietary owner cuts no figure.

2. But really the court below and counsel have attached more than its just importance to the right acquired by J. P. Treadwell from Speck. This is an action of ejectment, in which plaintiff must rely upon the strength of his own title, no matter how weak the title of his opponent may be. And when we come to examine the right of plaintiff to recover, we find that it has no foundation. The court finds that "the plaintiff herein never had, nor did any ancestor, predecessor, or grantor of plaintiff ever have, any possession of the lands or any part of the lands described in the complaint;" and this finding is amply supported by the evidence, whether we look at it with the eyes of an appellate or nisi prius court. The only facts upon which his alleged possessory claim rests are these: During the first half of October, 1862, plaintiff employed two men to build a small wooden shanty on the land; but after they had worked about two days, and before the shanty was finished, Treadwell heard of it, and went upon the land, tore down the shanty, and drove the men away. A few days afterwards plaintiff again went upon the land, and attempted to build a wooden shanty, when the same thing again happened,—that is,

Treadwell tore down the shanty before it was completed, and drove away the man who, together with two bulldogs, was sleeping in it, without bed or bedding. No further act was done by plaintiff in the premises; but between three and four years afterwards he commenced this action of ejectment; and we think it so clear that these acts do not constitute such a possession as will support ejectment that an elaboration of the point would be useless. He did not have even a "scrambling" possession of any land except the spot on which the shanties were commenced to be built; and that spot cannot now be definitely located. Appellant claims that when he commenced to build the shanty he had a deed from P. H. Owens, which purported to convey the premises described in the complaint; and he invokes the doctrine that one entering upon land under color of title given by a deed has constructive possession to the limits of the boundaries described in the conveyance. But in the first place, the court found that he never had such a deed. The evidence on the point was this: Appellant testified that he once had such a deed and had lost it; and Owens testified positively that he had never executed any such deed; and under such circumstances we certainly could not hold the finding unwarranted by the evidence. And in the second place, it plainly appears from the evidence that if appellant ever had such deed, he did not take it in good faith, believing that Owens had any title, (and he did not have any,) but for the express purpose of asserting color of title. And as this court said in Wilson v. Atkinson, 77 Cal. 492, 20 Pac. Rep. 66: "It could not be justly said that a party was founding his claim upon a written instrument, as being a conveyance, when he knew the instrument to be absolutely void. The Code should be construed as requiring the claim to be made in good faith, believing the deed to be a conveyance of the property." (What effect such a deed would have upon the rights of a party who had held possession for five years, and pleaded the statute of limitations, does not here arise.)

It is contended that the court erred in ruling upon the admissibility of evidence during the examination of the witness Mrs. Ann Cook. The alleged error, if it existed, would not be important enough to affect the determination of the case; but there was no error. The appellant was trying to get from the witness declarations of Speck tending to show his abandonment of his claim to the land; and the record merely shows that the court sustained an objection to general conversations not relating to the land. Appellant then asked the witness, "Did he say in that conversation that he would not return to this land?" and an objection that it was leading was sustained. The question was then asked, "Did he say anything about this land; if so, what?" and the witness, without any objection, went on to tell what he did say. In all this we see no error,—certainly no prejudicial error.

In his assignments of error, and in his briefs, appellant has stated his positions under many subdivisions and heads of discussion; but we think that we have referred to all matters necessary to be noticed. We see no good reason for disturbing the judgment. Judgment and order denying a new trial affirmed.

We concur: GAROUTTE, J.; SHARPSTEIN, J.; PATERSON, J.

DE HAVEN, J. I concur in the judgment upon the second ground discussed in the foregoing opinion.

ALVARADO v. NORDHOLT et al. (No. 14,403.)

ADVERSE POSSESSION—RECOVERY OF LAND—OUSTER OF TENANT IN COMMON—RUNNING OF STATUTE—PATENT TITLE.

1. A widow continued in possession of land occupied by her husband as a home until her death, when it was administered as her property, and the purchaser went into possession under the deed of her administrator, where he remained for about 20 years, receiving all the rents, and paying all the taxes and assessments; and, though the land was within 200 yards of the business center of a city, no one else was shown to have made claim to it. There was also evidence that such purchaser always claimed to be the owner of the property, and that his claim was open, notorious, and generally known. Held that, conceding that the widow was the owner merely of an individual interest which alone the purchaser took under his deed, so that he became a tenant in common with the widow's children as heirs to their father, still the evidence was sufficient to show an ouster of them by him, and an adverse possession by him thereunder, barring an action by them under Code Civil Proc. § 318, providing that an action for recovery of real estate cannot be maintained, unless plaintiff, his ancestor, predecessor, or grantor, was seised or possessed of the property within five years.

2. One of the widow's daughters having lived for a year after the purchaser took possession under his deed, during which time she might have maintained an action to recover her interest, the running of the statute was not thereafter suspended during the minority of her child.

3. Evidence that prior to the issue of a patent there was no publication of notice of the survey and plat on which the patent was based, is inadmissible to show that the patent did not vest title in the patentee.

4. The fact that on publication of a notice by the United States surveyor general of a survey on which a patent had been issued the patentee filed objections which were overruled, does not show that the patent was rejected by the patentee, or that it did not convey the legal title, or that it was recalled and canceled with the consent of the patentee.

In bank. Appeal from superior court of Los Angeles county; WALTER VAN DYKE, Judge.

Action by Thomas Alvarado against W. H. Nordholt and others for possession of an interest in lands. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Lee & Scott, for appellant. Stephen M. White and Shinn, Edgerton & Ling, for respondents.

DE HAVEN, J. Action to recover possession of an undivided interest in a certain lot in the city of Los Angeles, which plaintiff claims to own in common with four of the defendants, the other defendants being tenants of these four. The plaintiff claims title to a portion of the interest sought to be recovered by him by inheritance from his grandfather, Francisco Javier Alvarado, and to the remaining portion by purchase from certain heirs of the same person. The answer denied plaintiff's alleged ownership, and also contained a plea of the statute of limitations. The court found that plaintiff was not the owner of any interest in the property, and also that his cause of action is barred by section 318[1] of the Code of Civil Procedure, and thereupon judgment was entered in favor of defendants.

The plaintiff insists that the findings of the court are not sustained by the evidence. The land in controversy is within the limits of the former pueblo of Los Angeles. No written evidence of title in plaintiff's grandfather was produced, but it was shown that he occupied the premises as a house lot from 1817 until the date of his death, in 1831, and that his widow continued in the occupation thereof until her death, in 1851. It was also proven that there is not to be found in the archives of the city of Los Angeles, the successors to the pueblo, any record of titles or grants made by the pueblo prior to 1828, and that there are no formal municipal records of the pueblo of a date prior to 1832. If it should be assumed that these facts are sufficient upon which to base the presumption contended for by plaintiff that the pueblo of Los Angeles did in fact grant to his grandfather the land in controversy, and that the written evidence thereof had been lost or destroyed, still, if the court was right in its findings that defendants have acquired title by adverse possession, the judgment must be affirmed, and this question we proceed to consider. As we understand this record, the grandfather of plaintiff left surviving him a widow, 10 children, and the grandchildren of a deceased daughter. The widow, with some of her children, continued to occupy the land in controversy from the death of her husband, in 1831, until her own death, in 1851. Proceedings for administration upon her estate were commenced in 1859, and the land was appraised as property belonging to it, and was sold by the administrator of said estate to one William Nordholt, and, this sale being confirmed by the probate court, the said Nordholt received the administrator's deed therefor on February 14, 1866, and thereafter continued in possession of the land so conveyed until his death, in 1885, at which time the defendants succeeded to his title. It is claimed by appellant that, as the widow of his grandfather was only the owner of an undivided interest in this land at the time of her death, her children and grandchildren having succeeded to the remaining portion of her husband's estate, the effect of this deed was only to convey such interest as she had, and that said Nordholt thereupon became a tenant in common with the children of such widow, the remaining heirs of the elder Alvarado. Conceding this to be so, we think the evidence was sufficient to justify the court in finding that said Nordholt entered into possession, and thereafter until his death continued to hold the same, claiming the whole of said land as his own, and to show an ouster of his cotenants within the rule announced by this court in the cases of Unger v. Mooney, 63 Cal. 586; Bath v. Valdez, 70 Cal. 350, 11 Pac. Rep. 724; and Winterburn v. Chambers, 91 Cal. 170, 27 Pac. Rep. 658. Whether Nordholt entered into possession, acknowledging himself as a cotenant of those under whom plaintiff claims, or whether he entered claiming the whole title, and whether his possession thereafter was adverse and of such notoriety that his alleged cotenants must, in the nature of things, be presumed to have known of his claim of exclusive ownership, were questions of fact to be determined by the lower court upon a view of all the circumstances in evidence. It was admitted upon the trial that, from the date of the administrator's deed referred to down to the commencement of this action, the said Nordholt, and defendants who have succeeded to his title, received all the rents of the property and paid all taxes which have been assessed against it. There was also evidence tending to show that all street improvement assessments charged against said property had been paid by defendants or their predecessors. The land is within 200 yards of the business center of the city, and the record does not show that the plaintiff, or any of those to whose alleged rights he has succeeded, ever made any claim for this property until some time in 1884. Upon these facts, and other evidence tending to show that Nordholt always claimed to be the owner of the property, that this claim was open and notorious and generally known to the community, the court was warranted in finding that his alleged cotenants had notice of his claim of exclusive ownership, and that his possession was adverse to them.

The plaintiff himself attained his majority within five years before the commencement of this action, but, as his mother, under whom he claims, lived for something more than a year after Nordholt took possession under his deed, and could have maintained an action to recover her interest in the land during her lifetime, the running of the statute of limitations was not suspended during the minority of plaintiff. McLeran v. Benton, 73 Cal. 329, 14 Pac. Rep. 879.

The court did not err in its ruling on plaintiff's offer to prove that there was no publication of notice of the survey and plat upon which was based the patent to the city of Los Angeles of August 9, 1866, prior to the issuance of that patent, and in excluding proof of the other matters contained in plaintiffs' offer. In the case of Cruz v. Martinez, 53 Cal. 239, this court substantially passed upon the same question, and held such proof inadmissible, saying: "The patent to the city of Los Angeles, bearing date the 9th day of August, 1866, having been duly signed and recorded in the proper book in the general land office, vested in the city the legal title to the lands therein described." We see no material difference between the facts contained in plaintiff's offer and those before the court in that case. The fact offered to be shown by plaintiff to the effect that after the issuance of the patent of August 9, 1866, the United States surveyor general published notice of the prior survey upon which such patent was in fact based, and that the city of Los Angeles then filed objections to such survey, which were overruled, is not sufficient to show that such patent was rejected by the city, or that it did not convey the legal title, or that it was recalled and canceled with the consent of the city. In fact we do not understand that it is claimed, or that plaintiff offered to show, that such patent was in fact recalled or canceled. In addition to this, plaintiff's offer contained an admission that at the time the city filed its objections to such survey "its common council, mayor, and authorities" did not know of the issuance of the prior patent, and never heard of the same "until after the execution of said patent of August 4, 1875; but said corporation in January, 1876, demanded from said commissioner the delivery of said patent of 1866." The rule in regard to a United States patent is that when it is signed, sealed, and recorded in the records of the land office, then, so far as the government is concerned, the title to the land therein described has been transferred to the grantee, and "its acceptance by the grantee will then be conclusively presumed, unless immediately upon knowledge of its issue his refusal to accept it is explicitly declared, and such refusal is communicated to the land office." Leroy v. Jamison, 3 Sawy. 391; Case of Mutell, 3 Op. Attys. Gen. 654. It is very apparent that under this rule the matters offered to be proven by plaintiff were not sufficient to show that the patent of August 9, 1866, did not vest in the city of Los Angeles the title to the land therein described, at its date, or that such title was not acquired by the city until the issuance to it by the United States of the subsequent patent for the same land on August 4, 1875. There are no other assignments of error which require special discussion. Judgment and order affirmed.

[1] Code Civil Proc. § 318, provides that no action for the recovery of real estate, or for the recovery of the possession thereof, can be maintained, unless it appear that the plaintiff, his ancestor, predecessor, or grantor, was seised or possessed of the property in question within five years before the commencement of the action.

ALLEN v. ALLEN et al. (No. 13,005.)

CONFLICT OF LAWS—REDEMPTION FROM MORTGAGE —LIMITATION OF ACTIONS — PLEADING —OBLIGATION OF CONTRACTS.

1. In 1869 plaintiff, by parol contract, borrowed money from defendants, without fixing a time for repayment, and gave them as security an absolute deed of land in California. The contract was made in New York, where both parties resided. Neither of them ever had actual possession of the land, nor were they ever in California before 1885, and prior to that date plaintiff never made any demand for an accounting, nor offer to redeem, nor did defendants assert any claim of title to the land adverse to plaintiff's right to a reconveyance on repayment of the loan. In 1887 plaintiff brought an action to redeem. Held, that the contract was governed by the laws of New York, but the effect of the deed by the laws of California; and since, under the laws of New York, an action by defendants to recover the loan was there barred in 1877, and since, in California at that time, when a debt secured by a mortgage was barred, the remedy on the mortgage fell with it, an action to foreclose the mortgage was barred by Code Civil Proc. § 361, which provides that when a cause of action has arisen in another state, and by the laws thereof an action thereon cannot be maintained against a person by reason of the lapse of time, an action shall not be maintained against him in California; and under the law of California at that time this resulted in barring the right to redeem, that right and the right of the creditor to sue on the contract being reciprocal. BEATTY, C. J., dissenting.

2. No subsequent legislation could change the rights or obligations of the parties, or extend the time for action, and therefore Code Civil Proc. § 346, allowing an action to redeem to be brought against the mortgagee in possession "unless he or they have continuously maintained an adverse possession of the mortgaged premises for five years after breach of some condition of the mortgage," which was enacted after the deed was executed, though before the action to redeem was barred, does not apply. BEATTY, C. J., dissenting.

3. The fact that in New York an action to redeem from a mortgage of land there situated could be maintained, although an action to recover the debt was barred, if true, is immaterial, since the effect of the deed depends upon the laws of this state existing at the time the contract was made.

4. The fact that prior to 1885 there had been no adverse claim to the land by defendants is immaterial, since, under the law of this state at the time the contract was made, the absolute deed as security for the loan conveyed the legal title to defendants.

5. Decisions of the highest court of the state declaring that a mortgage did not convey the legal title to the mortgagee formed no part of the contract in which a mortgage was given so as to prevent the mortgagor's right to redeem from being affected by subsequent decisions overruling the former as erroneous, and declaring that a mortgage did convey the legal title, since every one is presumed to know the law, and decisions do not change, but merely attempt to declare it. BEATTY, C. J., dissenting.

6. Under Code Civil Proc. § 361, providing that when a cause of action has arisen in another state, and by the laws thereof an action thereon cannot be maintained against a person by reason of the lapse of time, an action thereon shall not be maintained against him in this state, it is not necessary for a defendant relying on the statute to set out in his pleading facts showing that the cause of action arose in the other state, and that it is barred by the laws thereof; since Code Civil Proc. § 458, declares that in pleading the statute of limitations it is not necessary to state the facts showing the defense, but it may be generally stated that the action is barred by the provisions of a section of the Code of Civil Procedure, (giving the section,) and if the allegation is controverted the facts showing the bar must be established on the trial.

Action to redeem from an absolute deed given to defendants by plaintiff, as security for a loan. From a judgment for defendants, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. W. Wilson, for appellant. Chamberlain & McGowan, for respondents.

Paterson, J. Appellant received from the state a certificate of purchase for the lands described in the complaint, on March 28, 1860, and in August following assigned the same to one Collins, to secure an indebtedness of $30, and thereafter a patent was issued from the state to Collins. Appellant paid Collins the amount due him; and the latter, by request of appellant, conveyed the land to John H. Allen, who paid no consideration therefor. Respondents thereafter advanced to the appellant certain sums of money for the payment of taxes which had become delinquent, and, to secure the repayment to them of said sums, the appellant, on June 12, 1869, caused said John H. Allen to convey the lands to them as security for the repayment of the money they had advanced. This deed was absolute in form. John H. Allen received no consideration for the deed. Neither of the parties has ever been in actual possession of the land. The contract of loan was oral, and no time was fixed in which appellant was to make repayment. Plaintiff never made any demand for an accounting, or any offer to redeem, prior to the year 1885, and defendants did not, prior to that time, assert any claim of title to the lands adverse to plaintiff's right to a reconveyance upon payment of the indebtedness. This action was commenced March 15, 1887. The court below rendered judgment for the defendants. A motion for a new trial was denied, and plaintiff appealed from the order, and from the judgment.

1. The court below held that plaintiff's cause of action was barred by the provisions of section 361, Code Civil Proc. That section provides: "When a cause of action has arisen in another state, or in a foreign country, and by the laws thereof an action thereon cannot be maintained against a person by reason of the lapse of time, an action thereon shall not be maintained against him in this state, except in favor of one who has been a citizen of this state, and who has held a cause of action from the time it accrued." It is claimed by appellant that under that section it was incumbent on the respondents to set out the facts upon which they rely, to show that the cause of action arose in the state of New York, and that, under the laws of that state, it was barred by the statute of limitations. A complete answer to this contention is found in section 458, Id., which provides: "In pleading the statute of limitations it is not necessary to state the facts showing the defense, but it may be generally stated that the cause of action is barred by the provisions of section (giving the number of the section and subdivision thereof, if it is so divided, relied upon) of the Code of Civil Procedure, and if such allegation be controverted the party pleading must establish on the trial the facts showing that the cause of action is so barred." The rule thus established was intended to simplify the form of pleading such defenses, and is one which the court cannot depart from on a conjecture that the legislature intended to except from its operation cases of this kind.

The contract was made in New York, where all the parties resided, and neither of them was in this state thereafter until the year 1885; and it is claimed by appellant that, under sections 346, 351, Id., and 2903, Civil Code, the respondents' right to foreclose their mortgage was not barred at the date of the commencement of this action; that appellant remained the equitable owner of the property, and his right to redeem was kept alive. Those sections read as follows: "Sec. 346. An action to redeem a mortgage of real property, with or without an account of rents and profits, may be brought by the mortgagor, or those claiming under him, against the mortgagee in possession, or those claiming under him, unless he or they have continuously maintained an adverse possession of the mortgaged premises for five years after breach of some condition of the mortgage." "Sec. 351. If, when the cause of action accrues against a person, he is out of the state, the action may be commenced within the term herein limited after his return to the state; and if, after the cause of action accrues, he departs from the state, the time of his absence is not part of the time limited for the commencement of the action." "Sec. 2903. Every person having an interest in property subject to a lien has a right to redeem it from the lien at any time after the claim is due, and before his right of redemption is foreclosed." Civil Code. In support of this contention, counsel for appellant say, in substance: "Respondents' action to foreclose could have been brought only in this state. The word 'return,' as employed in section 351, supra, is applicable to persons coming from abroad, as well as to citizens who have left the state for a temporary purpose and returned thereto. The statute had not commenced to run in 1885, because the respondents had never been in the actual occupancy of the premises. Section 2903, Civil Code, and section 346, Code Civil Proc., provided rules of limitation different from those which had previously been followed by the courts of this state, and those new rules are applicable to mortgages made before, as well as those made after, the adoption of the Codes, unless the remedy was extinguished at the time the Codes took effect. Respondents were not only mortgagees but trustees of appellant; and the statute could not commence to run in their favor until an offer to redeem was made by appellant. There could be no laches on the part of appellant, because the legal title remained in him, and no adverse claim was made by respondents." These contentions cannot be lightly passed over. They deserve to receive and they have received our careful attention. In the solution of the question presented as to the effect of the deed, we must read, as a part of the contract, the laws of this state existing at the time the contract was made, (Klinck v. Price, 4 W. Va. 4, U. S. v. Crosby, 7 Cranch, 115,) although the nature of the construction of the contract of loan, which was made in New York, is determined by the latter state, (De Wolf v. Johnson, 10 Wheat. 367.) It is true an action to foreclose must be brought where the property is situated; but it does not follow that respondents could have maintained an action to foreclose at the time this suit was commenced. Both parties resided in the state of New York, where the contract was made, and either could have maintained an action there on the contract. The plaintiff could have enforced his right to redeem, and the defendants could have recovered the amount for which they held the land as security. Montgomery v. Spect, 55 Cal. 352; Kanawha Coal Co. v. Kanawha & O. Coal Co., 7 Blatchf. 415; Gardner v. Ogden, 22 N. Y. 327; Williams v. Fitzhugh, 37 N. Y. 444. In this state, when an action on a promissory note, secured by mortgage of the same date upon real property, is barred by the statute of limitations, the mortgagee has no remedy upon the mortgage. Lord v. Morris, 18 Cal. 482; Heinlin v. Castro, 22 Cal. 100. The debt is regarded as the principal, and the mortgage as a mere incident. When the debt is barred, the remedy upon the mortgage is also barred. McCarthy v. White, 21 Cal. 495. If, therefore, respondents could not maintain an action in New York for the recovery of the money due, they could not maintain an action in this state to foreclose the mortgage. Section 361, Code Civil Proc. At the time the conveyance was made by John H. Allen to the respondents, a deed absolute in form, but intended as a mortgage, in this state, transferred the legal title, and there was left in the person executing it a mere equity of redemption; and whenever the debt, to secure which the deed was made, became barred by the statute of limitations, the right to redeem was barred. Hughes v. Davis, 40 Cal. 117; Espinosa v. Gregory, Id. 58. The right to redeem and the right of the creditor to sue on a contract were reciprocal. When one was lost the other could not be enforced. Cunningham v. Hawkins, 24 Cal. 403; Arrington v. Liscom, 34 Cal. 366; Grattan v. Wiggins, 23 Cal. 35. No subsequent legislation could change the rights or obligations of the parties, or extend the time for action. The right and time to redeem were fixed by the laws in force at that time. Bronson v. Kinzie, 1 How. 316; Walker v. Whitehead, 16 Wall. 318; Heyward v. Judd, 4 Minn. 483, (Gil. 375;) Phinney v. Phinney, 81 Me. 450, 17 Atl. Rep. 405. Under the decisions just cited, section 346, Code Civil Proc., is inapplicable, because it would effect a material change in the rights and obligations of the parties, (Phinney v. Phinney and Heyward v. Judd, supra;) and for the same reason Raynor v. Drew, 72 Cal. 307, 13 Pac. Rep. 866, and other and later cases declaring the rule stated in that section, are not in point. They are based upon that section of the Code, and it was passed posterior to the time the parties entered into the contract.

It is claimed by the appellant that the finding of the court, "that the cause of action stated in the complaint is barred by the provisions of section 361 of the Code of Civil Procedure," is not supported by the evidence. The defendant introduced in evidence section 91, c. 3, tit. 11, Wait Code. It is not disputed that this section applies to personal actions, and supports the fourteenth finding of the court "that, by the laws of the state of New York, an action upon a verbal agreement for the payment of money is barred within six months after the cause of action accrues thereon, and the right of defendants to maintain any action against plaintiff to recover the said sum of $500, as security for which the said deeds from Cox and John H. Allen were executed to them, has been barred by the laws of said state at all times since the 20th day of November, 1874; and the right of defendants to maintain any action against plaintiff to recover the moneys advanced by them to him, as stated in finding No. 11, has been barred by the laws of said state at all times since September 13, 1877." But it is claimed that, as the appellant's cause of action is one to ascertain the amount due upon a mortgage, and that he may be permitted to pay the same, and remove a cloud from his title, the section referred to does not apply to the case, but is governed by section 97, which provides that an action for relief not otherwise provided for must be commenced within 10 years after the cause of action shall have accrued. As we have seen, however, as soon as the debt is barred the remedy upon the mortgage is lost. Respondents could not have maintained an action in New York for the recovery of the money due. They, therefore, could not maintain an action in this state to foreclose the mortgage, and the right to redeem was lost; and as the right to redeem and the right to maintain an action on the contract are reciprocal, the fourteenth finding of the court, which is not attacked, is conclusive against the plaintiff's right to maintain this action.

If it be conceded that in New York an action to redeem from a mortgage of lands situated in that state can be maintained, although an action for the recovery of the money due could not be maintained there, the result must be the same, because, as stated before, the effect of this deed depends upon the laws of this state existing at the time the contract was made. The interest of each party in the land was measured and controlled by the lex loci rei sitæ. Klinck v. Price and U. S. v. Crosby, supra. The right to redeem is governed by the laws of this state.

It is claimed that, at the time the contract was entered into, it was the established rule in this state that a conveyance absolute in form, but intended merely as security, did not pass the legal title to the grantee. It is true there had been decisions to that effect; but in the year following it was held (Espinosa v. Gregory and Hughes v. Davis, supra) that a deed absolute in form intended as a mortgage did convey the legal title. These decisions did not change the law; they simply declared what was the law. Every one is conclusively presumed to know the law, although the ablest courts in the land often find great difficulty and labor in finally determining what the law is. The courts cannot make or repeal a law. "They can say what a law means; and if afterwards they see that they have made a mistake, they can correct their error by an overruling of a former decision, the consequence of which overruling is that the blunder is thenceforward deemed never to have been law." Bish. Cont. § 569. It has been held here that, although it appears the parties have entered into a contract relying upon a previous decision of the supreme court, they would not be relieved from the obligations thereof because of a subsequent decision by the same court overruling the former one, and declaring a different rule upon the same subject. Kenyon v. Welty, 20 Cal. 637. There are some cases in which the supreme court of the United States has held that the construction given to a statute by the highest tribunal in the state, whether sound or not, must be taken as correct, so far as contracts made under the act are concerned, and no subsequent decision altering the construction can impair their validity. The construction becomes a part of the statute,—as much so as if it were an amendment made by the legislature. Gelpcke v. Dubuque, 1 Wall. 175; Louisiana v. Pilsbury, 105 U. S. 294; Douglass v. Pike Co., 101 U. S. 677; Thomson v. Lee Co., 3 Wall. 327. These cases, however, all involved the question as to the validity of negotiable securities. We think that the case of Oullahan v. Sweeney, 79 Cal. 537, 21 Pac. Rep. 960, is distinguishable from the case at bar. The amendment therein referred to simply required the purchaser of property sold for delinquent taxes to serve upon the owner of the property a notice stating that the property had been sold for delinquent taxes, the date of the sale, the amount for which it was sold, the amount then due, the time when the right of redemption would expire, and when the purchaser would apply for a deed. This requirement was a mere incident to the right of the purchaser to receive a deed; it merely prescribed the manner in which he should proceed to demand the deed to which he was entitled. It was conceded, "for the purposes of the case, that the legislature cannot make an absolute extension of the time for redemption of property previously sold." We think the court below held the right view of the case, and its judgment and order are therefore affirmed.

Beatty, C. J. I dissent. According to the opinion of the court, the plaintiff's action was barred by section 361 of the Code of Civil Procedure, because, and only because, an action by defendants to foreclose would have been barred by said section. I am not satisfied with the reasoning by which the conclusion is reached that the defendants were barred of their action to foreclose before this action was commenced, but, conceding it to be correct, it does not follow, in my opinion, that the plaintiff's right of action was thereby lost. That the right to redeem and the right to foreclose were barred at the same time was undoubtedly the law of this state prior to the Codes, but since they were enacted the right to redeem is unaffected by the extinguishment of the right to foreclose. Code Civil Proc. § 346; Civil Code, § 2903; Raynor v. Drew, 72 Cal. 370, 13 Pac. Rep. 866; Booth v. Hoskins, 75 Cal. 271, 17 Pac. Rep. 225; De Cazara v. Orena, 80 Cal. 134, 22 Pac. Rep. 74; Hall v. Arnott, 80 Cal. 354, 22 Pac. Rep. 200; Warder v. Enslen, 73 Cal. 291, 14 Pac. Rep. 874. In other words, the Codes have prescribed another rule for the limitation of actions to redeem from mortgages and other liens. By the old rule the right to redeem was barred when the right to foreclose was barred, and whether this resulted from the fact that each was covered by the same clause of the statute, or from the equitable doctrine of mutuality of rights and remedies under such contracts, the rule itself had no other effect than to fix a period of limitation to the right to redeem. This rule has been changed, and the period of limitation enlarged, by a law passed since the making of the contract here involved, but before the right of action of either of the parties had been lost, and before the commencement of this suit. The question, therefore, is, which rule applies, the old or the new?

That these provisions of the Codes were intended to apply to all actions commenced after they took effect is to my mind perfectly clear. It is true the Codes are not retroactive, (Civil Code, § 3; Code Civil Proc. § 3,) and it is also true that vested rights should never be impaired by giving a retroactive effect to a law. But a law enlarging the period of limitations upon existing contracts is not a retroactive law, and it impairs no vested rights. Unless restricted in its operation by its own terms, a new rule of limitations necessarily applies to all actions thereafter commenced, and to all causes of action not already extinguished by the running of time under the pre-existing rule. This being so, we have only to look to the express provisions of the Codes to see how far the new rules by them prescribed are restricted in their operation upon actions commenced after they took effect. In section 6 of the Civil Code we find the following provision: "No action or proceeding commenced before this Code takes effect, and no right accrued, is affected by its provisions." Section 8 of the Code of Civil Procedure contains the same language. The clear implication is that actions not commenced and rights not vested prior to the adoption of the Codes are to be controlled by their provisions. The more specific provision respecting the application of the new rules of limitation is found in section 362 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and is as follows: "This title does not extend to actions already commenced, nor to cases where the time prescribed in any existing statute for acquiring a right or barring a remedy has fully run, but the laws now in force are applicable to such actions and cases, and are repealed subject to the provisions of this section." Here the implication is equally clear that the new rules apply to all actions not already commenced, and to all cases where the time prescribed by existing statutes for barring the remedy has not fully run. In this case the time had not run, and the action had not been commenced. The conclusion, therefore, cannot be avoided that the rule of the Code applies, unless its application would have the effect of changing the contract or impairing its obligation. The respondents contend, and the court holds, that such would be its effect. They say that the law of the state of California, as it existed at the date of their deed from John H. Allen, defining the mutual rights and obligations of the parties to the transaction, entered into and became a part of the contract, and that such law gave them (the respondents) an important right which the above-cited provisions of the Codes would take away or materially abridge. If this is true, it must be conceded that the Code provisions are inapplicable. But is it true? What are the rights conferred by the law of 1869 which the Codes take away or impair? They do not take away or impair the right of a mortgagee to foreclose, they merely enlarge the time within which the mortgagor may redeem, and this is all the respondents have to complain of. By the law of California prior to the Codes, they say a mortgage in the form of an absolute conveyance invested the mortgagee with the legal title to the land, leaving in the mortgagor a mere equity of redemption which was barred and extinguished at the same moment that the debt was barred, thereby creating in the mortgagee a title complete, absolute, and indefeasible, without the necessity of a foreclosure; and, therefore, they insist it must be held that this right to obtain a complete title without foreclosure was among the advantages they bargained and paid for, and is a right of which they could not be deprived by subsequent legislation, as they would be if subjected to the Code provisions, (section 346, Code Civil Proc.; section 2903, Civil Code,) under the operation of which they could never perfect their title except by foreclosure, or by five years' adverse possession of the mortgaged premises after condition broken. The completeness of this argument is marred by the fact that it assumes too much for the law of California before the Codes. The decisions relied on by respondents do not go to the extent claimed for them. The cases cited are Hughes v. Davis, 40 Cal. 117; Espinosa v. Gregory, 40 Cal. 58; Pico v. Gallardo, 52 Cal. 206, etc. A critical examination of this line of decisions will show that the only case in which a mortgagee by deed absolute could acquire an indefeasible title to the mortgaged estate without foreclosure was when he had possession. This was the case in Espinosa v. Gregory. The mortgagee was in possession, the right to foreclose was barred, and it was held that the mortgagor had thereby lost the right to redeem. The mortgagee got the land without foreclosure. But in Hughes v. Davis, and Pico v. Gallardo, the mortgagors were in possession, and the mortgagees were suing in ejectment after their right to foreclose was barred. It was held that the mortgagees had the legal title to the lands, and that they were entitled to recover possession, in the absence of allegations in the answers setting forth the equities of the defendants, with an offer to pay the amount of the mortgage liens, and prayer that the conveyances be declared mortgages. In other words, a right of redemption on the usual terms, against the mortgagee out of possession, was distincty admitted, athough the right to foreclose was barred.

Now, what right of these respondents, under the law as declared in the cases referred to, would be taken away or impaired by sustaining plaintiff's action to redeem? They never had possession of the mortgaged premises, and had no right to the possession. If, after their right to foreclose was barred,—if it ever was barred,—they had anticipated the plaintiff in taking possession of the land, their title might thereby have become perfect under the doctrine of Espinosa v. Gregory; but if plaintiff had anticipated them in taking possession, their only remedy would have been to sue in ejectment, in which case he could have set up his equity, and effected a redemption, according to the doctrine of Pico v. Gallardo, upon precisely the same terms that can be imposed in this action. The only difference between this case and the case supposed is that plaintiff, without taking possession, and without waiting to be sued, offers the respondents, in advance, all that he would be compelled to pay in order to redeem if he had taken possession, and waited for them to sue. To allow this would surely not be to deprive the respondents of any valuable right. Enough has been said, I think, to show that respondents never brought themselves within the rule of Espinosa v. Gregory, because they never had possession of the land; but if the fact had been otherwise all the decisions of this court are to the effect that a law extending plaintiff's right of redemption would be valid. Take the case of tax sales: Prior to March, 1885, the purchaser of land sold for delinquent taxes became at once entitled to a tax deed if the property was not redeemed before the expiration of the year. In March, 1885, the law was so amended as to require the purchaser to give 30 days' notice to the owner or occupant of the land of his intention to apply for a deed. This amendment to the law was held to apply to sales made before its adoption. Oullahan v. Sweeney, 79 Cal. 539, 21 Pac. Rep. 960. It is impossible to distinguish that case from this, and if it was correctly decided there can be no doubt of the power of the legislature to extend the right of a mortgagor to redeem. See, also, Moore v. Martin, 38 Cal. 438, and Redemption Co. v. Sedgwick, 15 Cal. 515. In the briefs of counsel a large number of decisions are cited from the reports of other states bearing more or less directly upon this point, with respect to which it can only be said that they are so conflicting as to furnish no ground for reversing our own decision in Oullahan v. Sweeney, supra. A decision on this point by the supreme court of the United States would of course be binding authority, as the immunity asserted arises under the constitution of the United States, but no such decision has been cited. What was said by Judge Taney, in Bronson v. Kinzie, 1 How. 316, has been pronounced obiter, and its authority denied by this court. See dissenting opinion of Judge Heydenfeldt, in Thorne v. San Francisco, 4 Cal. 156, adopted in Moore v. Martin, 38 Cal. 438. Of the cases cited in the department opinion heretofore filed, (27 Pac. Rep. 30,) that of Phinney v. Phinney, 81 Me. 450, 17 Atl. Rep. 405, comes nearer than any other to sustaining the contention of respondents, but even that might be distinguished, for the law there held unconstitutional was one by which the equity of redemption could be indefinitely extended at the suit of a stranger to the mortgage. Finally, it may be said that if the doctrine under discussion is to control the decision of this case, it may be invoked by the appellant with quite as much justice as by respondents. The cases of Hughes v. Davis and Espinosa v. Gregory were not decided until the year following the deed of John H. Allen, and they directly overruled a long line of decisions by this court holding that a mortgage by deed absolute did not pass the legal title. The construction given to our laws by these decisions was the law itself at the date of that deed, and fixed the rights of the parties so that they could not be changed by a subsequent construction any more than by subsequent legislation. Douglas v. Pike Co., 101 U. S. 677; Gelpcke v. Dubuque, 1 Wall. 175. For these reasons I conclude that the finding of the superior court, that plaintiff's cause of action was barred by section 361 of the Code of Civil Procedure, is not sustained by the evidence, and, therefore, that a new trial should have been granted, and that the order appealed from and the judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

Spring Valley Water Works v. Drinkhouse. (No. 12,623.)

Eminent Domain — Possession Pending Litigation—Restitution—Constitutional Law.

1. The power conferred by Code Civil Proc. § 957, providing that when a judgment is reversed the appellate court may make complete restitution of all property and rights lost by the judgment, so far as such restitution is consistent, etc., is discretionary, and where, after an appeal by the landowner from a judgment of damages in condemnation proceedings, the court allows plaintiff to take possession of the land, and occupy it pending the litigation, as authorized by Code Civil Proc. § 1254, on the payment into court of a sum in addition to the judgment, the supreme court, on reversing the judgment and remanding the cause for a new trial as to the amount of damages only, will not put the landowner back into possession unless the circumstances render it just and necessary.

2. Code Civil Proc. § 1254, allowing the court in condemnation proceedings to authorize plaintiff, on the payment of a sufficient amount into court, to take possession of and use the property "during the pendency of and until the final conclusion of the litigation," is not unconstitutional, and the court may, upon payment into court by plaintiff of a sufficient sum, allow him to take and retain possession pending determination of an appeal by the landowner from its judgment, and pending a new trial on the question of damages ordered by the appellate court on reversing the judgment.

In bank. Appeal from superior court of San Mateo county; E. F. Head, Judge.

Condemnation proceedings by the Spring Valley Water Works against Mary Drinkhouse. Plaintiff, on the payment of money into court in addition to the amount of the judgment which had been appealed from, was given possession of the land pending the litigation. The judgment was reversed by the supreme court, and the case remanded for a new trial on the question of the amount of damages only. Defendant now petitions the supreme court for a writ of restitution. Writ denied.

Ben Morgan and A. Ruef, for appellant. Wm. F. Herrin, for respondent.

Garoutte, J. After judgment was entered in the trial court, July 27, 1887, in favor of the plaintiff for the condemnation $14.45 acres of defendant's land to public use as part of a reservoir site, (compensation and damages to defendant being assessed at $5,103 and $100 costs,) and pending defendant's appeal therefrom, the court below, upon due application therefor by plaintiff, entered an order October 8, 1887, under section 1254 of the Code of Civil Procedure, authorizing the plaintiff, upon paying into court $5,000 in addition to the amount of the judgment, to take possession of and use the property condemned "during the pendency of and until the final conclusion of the litigation," and staying all actions and proceedings against the plaintiff on account of such possession and use. In pursuance of this order, after paying into court the sums above required, plaintiff took possession of the land in controversy, and has since used the same as part of the lower Crystal Springs reservoir site, the lower part of the land being now covered with water 30 feet in depth; there being held in this reservoir, above the lowest level of the land in question, 3,682,546,000 gallons of water. The water in this reservoir is used to supply San Francisco and its inhabitants with water, and is necessary to maintain an adequate supply therefor.

Upon defendant's appeal from the judgment and from an order refusing a new trial, this court, on December 29, 1891, (28 Pac. Rep. 683,) entered the following order: "Judgment and order reversed, with directions to the court below to retry the issues as to the value of the land sought to be taken and the damage to the remaining portion of the land not taken; and thereupon to enter judgment in accordance with the prayer of the complaint, and in favor of the defendant for such value and damages and costs." It has therefore been finally determined in this action that the use to which plaintiff proposes to put the defendant's land is a use authorized by law, and that its taking by plaintiff is necessary to such use, and all that remains to be determined upon a new trial is the amount of compensation and damages to be awarded to the defendant.

Appellant now petitions this court for a writ of restitution, under section 957 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which section provides that, "when the judgment or order is reversed or modified, the appellate court may make complete restitution of all property and rights lost by the erroneous judgment or order, so far as such restitution is consistent," etc. It is insisted that the reversal of the judgment gives appellant the absolute right to a restitution of the premises, but the wording of the statute will bear no such construction. The section is not mandatory upon the court, but the power conferred thereby is to be exercised when the circumstances of the case call for the use of a judicial discretion. In a case with conditions similar to the one under investigation, where the judgment has been reversed and the cause remanded for the sole purpose of determining the amount of compensation to which appellant is entitled, and where it is not contended that the amount deposited with the trial court is not amply sufficient to satisfy any judgment for damages which may be recovered at a future trial of the action in the court below, taken in connection with the additional facts heretofore recited, we see nothing to demand the exercise of that discretionary power vested in the court under section 957 of the Code of Civil Procedure. This amount of money was deposited with the trial court under the provisions of section 1254 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which allows certain amounts to be paid into court by plaintiff, whereupon the court "may authorize the plaintiff, if already in possession, to continue therein, and, if not, then to take possession of and use the property during the pendency of and until the final conclusion of the litigation," etc. The final conclusion of this litigation has not yet been reached, and if said section of the Code is not in conflict with the constitution of the state, then this proceeding must fail, for the order of the trial court is still in full force and effect. This section of the Code is not violative of any provision of the constitution, but directly in line with that instrument wherein it treats of such matters. Section 14, art. 1, provides: "Private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation having been first made to or paid into court for the owner." It would seem that the framers of both the constitution and the statute had in view the delays incident to condemnation proceedings, and the necessity in many cases of allowing property to be taken and used for a public use during the progress of the litigation, provided an adequate fund to fully reimburse the landowner was first paid into court. This construction of a quite similar provision of the constitution of the state of Missouri was fully adopted in the case of St. L. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. Evans & Howard Brick Co., 85 Mo. 326. It is conceded that respondent's possession of the premises was lawful down to the time of the reversal of the judgment. The authorities are uniform to that extent. Now, the order of the court, made in the language of the statute, gave respondent possession of the premises "during the pendency of and until the final conclusion of the litigation." If the legislature had the power by statute to give the possession of the premises to the respondent pending proceedings upon appeal, under certain conditions and limitations, it had the same power to extend respondent's possession "until the final conclusion of the litigation." The latter clause is no more violative of the constitutional provision than the former. These views are fully supported in Railway Co. v. Kinsey, 87 Ind. 514.

Subsequent to the final submission of this motion to the court, facts have been presented upon affidavit, pertaining to matters which have arisen since the date of such submission. These matters are foreign to the merits of the motion under consideration, and cannot be considered upon this application. Let the application for the writ be denied.

BARNES v. BARNES. (No. 13,968.)

DIVORCE — EXTREME CRUELTY — WHAT IS — DISMISSAL OF ACTION — CONTINUANCE—DISCRETION OF COURT.

1. The court does not lose jurisdiction of a case by plaintiff's filing a written statement that "the above-entitled action is hereby dismissed," where no judgment of dismissal is entered.

2. As a ground for divorce, Civil Code, § 94, defines extreme cruelty as "the infliction of grievous bodily injury or grievous mental suffering upon the other by one party to the marriage." Held that, where the complaint shows that the acts complained of caused grievous mental suffering, it is sufficient without showing that such acts had an injurious effect on plaintiff's health. Waldron v. Waldron, 24 Pac. Rep. 649, 858; 85 Cal. 251, overruled.

3. In an action for a divorce, after issue was joined, and on October 25th, on motion of plaintiff, trial was set for December 2d. The motion was opposed on the ground that depositions would have to be taken in New York; that defendant was an actress by profession, dependent on herself for a living, and could not attend at that time. Counsel for plaintiff waived notice of the issuance of the commission to take the depositions, but it was not issued until November 18th. December 2d the trial was continued to December 6th, when defendant moved for a continuance to January 15th, on the ground that the depositions had not been returned, and that defendant was ill in Missouri, and unable to attend the trial without endangering her prospects of recovery. From the papers filed in support of the motion it appeared that between November 15th and December 6th defendant had been traveling with her company in several eastern states. Held, that the refusal to grant the continuance was not an abuse of discretion. BEATTY, C. J., and DE HAVEN and HARRISON, JJ., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; WALTER N. LEVY, Judge.

Bill for divorce by Barnes against Barnes. Plaintiff had decree, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. L. Campbell, W. T. Baggett, W. W. Foote, and John P. O'Brien, for appellant. W. S. Hinkle, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Action for divorce upon the ground of extreme cruelty. Judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff, and the defendant appeals.

1. After the filing of the complaint in this action, and before any appearance on the part of defendant, the attorney for plaintiff filed with the clerk of the superior court a paper properly entitled in the cause, and stating, "The above-entitled action is hereby dismissed;" but no judgment of dismissal was entered. It is claimed by appellant that upon the filing of this paper the court lost jurisdiction of the action, and that jurisdiction was not restored by the subsequent appearance and answer of defendant. This objection to the jurisdiction of the court was made in various forms in the court below, and overruled. The court did not err in its rulings upon this point. The filing of the paper referred to was, in effect, an order for a dismissal of the action, and would have been sufficient authority for the clerk to have entered a judgment of dismissal; but until the entry of such judgment the court retained jurisdiction of the case. Page v. Superior Court, 76 Cal. 372, 18 Pac. Rep. 385; Acock v. Halsey, 90 Cal. 215, 27 Pac. Rep. 193; Rochat v. Gee, 91 Cal. 355, 27 Pac. Rep. 670.

2. It is urged by appellant that the facts alleged in the complaint and found by the court do not entitle plaintiff to the decree which he obtained, dissolving the marriage which existed between him and appellant. The cruelty alleged and found is that appellant inflicted grievous mental suffering upon plaintiff by imputing to him, in the presence of others, the grossest immorality and personal impurity. It is not necessary to state here, with any particularity, the language by which these charges were made. It is sufficient to say that such charges, if false, were well calculated to bring upon a person of ordinary sensibility grievous mental suffering. But it is not alleged in the complaint, nor is it found by the court, that the charges of which plaintiff complains had any injurious effect upon his health, and for this reason it is claimed that the complaint and findings do not support the judgment under the law as declared by this court in Waldron v. Waldron, 85 Cal. 251, 24 Pac. Rep. 649, 858. It was held in that case that a finding to the effect that the defendant had inflicted upon the plaintiff therein grievous mental suffering, but without injury to her health, was not equivalent to a finding of extreme cruelty upon the part of the defendant, and would not sustain a judgment for divorce upon that ground; and in discussing the question as to what constitutes such extreme cruelty as will justify a divorce, the court said: "Although the character of the ill treatment, whether it operates directly upon the body or primarily upon the mind alone, and all the attending circumstances, are to be considered for the purpose of estimating the degree of the cruelty, yet the final test of the sufficiency, as a cause of divorce, must be its actual or reasonably apprehended injurious effect upon the body or health of the complaining party." And it was further said in that case "that the practical view of the law is that a degree of cruelty which cannot be perceived to injure the body or the health of the body 'can be practically endured,' and must be endured if there is no other remedy than by divorce; because no 'scale' by which to gauge the purely mental susceptibilities and sufferings has yet been invented or discovered, except such as indicate the degrees thereof by their perceptible effects upon the physical organization of the body." Tested by this rule, it must be conceded that the findings here are insufficient to sustain the judgment. But the case from which we have just quoted was decided by a bare majority of the court as it was then constituted, and, while the conclusion there reached finds support in many earlier cases cited in the opinion, we do not think it can be sustained without a wide departure from the letter and spirit of section 94 of the Civil Code of this state, which declares: "Extreme cruelty is the infliction of grievous bodily injury or grievous mental suffering upon the other by one party to the marriage." The language of this section is plain, and cannot be properly construed as declaring that only grievous bodily injury shall constitute extreme cruelty, and that extreme mental suffering, which is not shown to have injuriously affected the body or health of the complaining party, is not sufficient. The tendency of modern decisions, reflecting the advanced civilization of the present age, is to view marriage from a different standpoint than as a mere physical relation. It is now more wisely regarded as a union affecting the mental and spiritual life of the parties to it,—a relation designed to bring to them the comfort and felicities of home life,—and between whom, in order to fulfill such design, there should exist mutual sentiments of love and respect. "It was formerly thought that to constitute extreme cruelty, such as would authorize the granting of a divorce, physical violence is necessary; but the modern and better considered cases have repudiated this doctrine as taking too low and sensual a view of the marriage relation, and it is now very generally held that any unjustifiable conduct on the part of either the husband or wife which so grievously wounds the feelings of the other or so utterly destroys the peace of mind of the other as to seriously impair the health, * * * or such as utterly destroys the legitimate ends and objects of matrimony, constitutes extreme cruelty under the statute." Carpenter v. Carpenter, 30 Kan. 744, 2 Pac. Rep. 122. Section 94 of the Civil Code is in harmony with the law as thus stated, and under it the infliction of grievous mental suffering is extreme cruelty. It may be true that there is "no scale by which to gauge the purely mental susceptibilities and sufferings" of another, nor is it necessary that there should be any such exact measure. The common judgment of mankind recognizes the fact that there may be unfounded charges and cruel imputations which are not more easily borne than physical bruises, and the necessary effect of which is to cause great mental distress to the person against whom they are made. Whether in any given case there has been inflicted this "grevious mental suffering" is a pure question of fact to be deduced from all the circumstances of each particular case, keeping always in view the intelligence, apparent refinement, and delicacy of sentiment of the complaining party; and no arbitrary rule of law as to what particular probative facts shall exist in order to justify a finding of the ultimate facts of its existence can be given. As said by Mr. Justice McFarland in his dissenting opinion in Waldron v. Waldron, supra: "Every case where a divorce is sought on this ground must depend upon its own particular facts; and a correct decision must depend—as most cases depend—upon the sound sense and judgment of juries and courts." We cannot say in this case that the court was not fully justified in finding that the conduct of the defendant inflicted upon plaintiff grevious mental suffering, as alleged in the complaint. The evidence was sufficient to sustain the finding of the court that plaintiff had been a resident of the state for more than six months prior to the commencement of the action.

The refusal of the court to grant a continuance cannot be held to be an abuse of discretion. In Kneebone v. Kneebone, 83 Cal. 647, 23 Pac. Rep. 1031, the court said: "It is settled law in this state that applications for continuance are addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court, and its action will not be disturbed on appeal, unless the record affirmatively shows that it abused its discretion. In Musgrove v. Perkins, 9 Cal. 212, the court, per Field, J., said: 'The granting or refusing a continuance rests in the sound discretion of the court below, and its ruling will not be revised except for the most cogent reasons. The court below is apprised of all the circumstances of the case, and the previous proceedings, and is therefore better able to decide upon the propriety of granting the application than the appellate court; and when it exercises a reasonable, and not an arbitrary, discretion, its action will not be disturbed.' And similar language has been used in many subsequent decisions." This action was commenced on May 14, 1889. The defendant was personally served with summons nine days later, and on June 21st she appeared, and demurred to the complaint. On July 28th the demurrer was withdrawn, and the defendant was allowed 30 days in which to answer the complaint. She procured further extensions of time, and filed an answer and cross complaint on October 15, 1889. An application was made on the 16th of October to have the cause set for trial, but by reason of the illness of the presiding judge the hearing of the motion was postponed until the 25th, when the cause was set for trial on December 2d following. Counsel for defendant objected to the order of the court setting the case for trial on December 2d on the ground that it would be necessary to take the depositions of witnesses residing in New York; that defendant was an actress by profession, and dependent upon herself for a living; and that her senior counsel would be necessarily absent from the state for about a month. Counsel for plaintiff stated that he would waive service of notice for the issuance of the commission to take depositions, and thereupon the order was made as stated. An application was made on December 2d for a continuance until the 15th day of January, 1890, and the cause was continued until the 6th day of December, 1889, at which time the motion for a continuance to January 15th was made and denied. The commission to take depositions was not issued until the 18th day of November, 1889. When the cause came on for trial, December 6, 1889, counsel for defendant filed an affidavit, and in connection therewith several letters and telegrams received from the defendant, as a basis for his motion for a further continuance until January 15th. It is apparent from the language of the court in denying this last motion that it believed the defendant was not acting in good faith, but was endeavoring to postpone the action of the court until her business engagements would bring her to San Francisco, and we cannot say that such conclusion may not have been fairly drawn from all the circumstances of the case. Defendant had actual notice more than six months prior to the day of the trial of the charge which plaintiff made against her, and the cause was at issue nearly two months before the trial occurred. It appears from the letters and telegrams that the defendant was at Minneapolis, Minn., November 15th; Milwaukee, Wis., November 19th; Marshalltown, Iowa, November 22d; Des Moines, Iowa, November 23d; Kansas City, November 26th and 27th; St. Louis, December 2d, 4th, and 6th; and was informed at these times of all that had occurred. The court doubtless concluded that, if the defendant could thus travel about in the east, she was able to make the trip to San Francisco in time to be present at the trial; and, as stated before, we cannot say that its order was an abuse of discretion. It has been held here that there is no abuse of discretion in refusing a motion for a continuance if the circumstances cast suspicion on the good faith of the application, and induce the belief that it was intended only for delay. People v. Mortimer, 46 Cal. 120. While the trial court should be most liberal in granting continuances in divorce cases, because the public as well as the parties to the action are interested in the result of the suit, a defendant must be held to the exercise of good faith and diligence, and cannot be heard to complain if the failure to present his defense results from an attempt to subordinate the business of the court to his own business engagements and convenience. The judgment and order are affirmed.

De Haven, J. I dissent from the judgment and from so much of the foregoing opinion as holds that the action of the court below in denying the motions of defendant for a continuance was not an abuse of discretion. The defendant is a nonresident of the state, and her answer was filed October 15, 1889, and on the 25th of that month the court, on motion of plaintiff, and against the objection of defendant, set the case for trial on December 2, 1889; and afterwards the time for trial was continued by consent until December 6, 1889, without prejudice to the right of defendant to move for a further continuance. Upon that day the defendant moved for a continuance of the case until January 15, 1890. The motion was upon the ground that depositions of certain witnesses had not been returned, and also for the alleged reason that defendant was ill at Kansas City, Mo., and unable to come to San Francisco without endangering her prospects for recovery. This motion was supported by the affidavit of one of her attorneys, which stated, among other things, "that affiant is further informed by telegrams received from defendant on the 23d, 26th, and 30th days of November, 1889, and also from affidavits of Dr. J. C. Rogers, hereto attached, and affiant believes, and thereupon states, that defendant is now ill at Kansas City, Missouri, and unable to travel without danger to her health." Accompanying this was the affidavit of defendant herself and her physician to the same effect. Many telegrams from defendant to her attorney were also produced. I am unable to find anything in the record which directly contradicts the facts stated in these affidavits in regard to the state of defendant's health. That which comes the nearest doing so is found in the statement or affidavit of plaintiff's father, wherein it is said: "I am informed and believe that she is now performing as an opera bouffe artist with a company, and has been doing so for many months, and is not too sick to come here or travel." Manifestly, this is not an assertion that the defendant was not in fact sick, as stated in the affidavits of herself and physician; but it is argued that the telegrams, dated at different places, show that she was traveling with her company, and, therefore, that she was not sick. These telegrams certainly show that she had not severed her connection with the company, and that she was able to travel between the places, but it does not necessarily follow, because she did this, that it would have been prudent for her to attempt the longer overland journey. The motion for a continuance until January 15th was denied, and upon the next day the defendant moved for a continuance for one week. The motion was made upon the same affidavits, and additional telegrams and a letter from defendant. One telegram was dated upon the previous day, December 6th, and is as follows: "Allow sufficient time for traveling. Last notice too short. Fight for continuance. Telegraph early." The letter was dated December 2, 1889, and was addressed to her attorney. In it she said: "I am very anxious to hear definitely about the trial. I am unable to take so long a journey alone at present. I have worried myself ill, until nervous prostration got the better of me. I am also suffering from rheumatism. I must give notice this week to the company, if I intend to remain with them, and open January 13th in San Francisco. I can't put them off in this matter. I can't hear from you, and every night they send for decided answer, and I am unable to decide. If I come to San Francisco, I give up my engagement in the middle of winter. You say nothing about the divorce being granted to me, if I accept settlement. I have done nothing to grant a divorce, but if there is no other alternative I must." This motion was also denied, and in so doing, as well as in its denial of the previous motion, I think the court erred. The defendant was a nonresident of the state, an actress by profession, and under engagement as such; and while it appears from the letters and telegrams to her counsel that she did not wish to break this engagement if she could avoid it, and that this was one reason why she may have desired a postponement of the trial, still there is nothing in these letters and telegrams to warrant the inference that she and her counsel were acting in bad faith with the court in asking for a continuance upon the ground of the state of her health, as represented in the affidavits of herself and physician, or that such affidavits were untrue.

In actions for divorce public policy imperatively requires that nothing should be done in haste. The public are interested in having no divorce granted except for adequate cause, and the surest way to determine whether there is good cause or not is to hear both sides. In accordance with this rule, it has always heretofore been held by this court that in actions for divorce, applications to set aside a judgment of default, and for leave to answer, a more liberal rule is to be applied than in other cases, in which only private rights of property are involved. Thus in the case of Wadsworth v. Wadsworth, 81 Cal. 182, 22 Pac. Rep. 648, this court reversed the action of the lower court in refusing to set aside a default, although it was admitted that the appellant had been guilty of such negligence as would in an ordinary action have deprived her of the right to such relief. The court there said: "So far as the divorce awarded to the defendant is concerned, the motion should have been granted under the rule laid down in McBlain v. McBlain, 77 Cal. 509, 20 Pac. Rep. 61. In that case the court, per PATERSON, J., said: 'The parties to the action are not the only people interested in the result thereof. The public has an interest in the result of every suit for divorce. The policy and the letter of the law concur in guarding against collusion and fraud; and it should be the aim of the court to afford the fullest possible hearing in such matters.' In the present case there seems to have been an honest desire on the part of the plaintiff to present her side of the case; and while, in an ordinary action, the neglect shown might be sufficient to deprive her of a right to relief, yet in this kind of case a more liberal rule should prevail." It is plain to my mind that if the court below had kept in view the rule as thus declared it would not have denied to the absent defendant a continuance for one week, which would have enabled her to be present, and give evidence in her own defense; more especially when such motion was based upon the solemn affidavit of her counsel, in which he assured the court, upon his information and belief, "that it was the intention of the defendant to be present in San Francisco at said trial on December 2, 1889, and that she was and is prevented therefrom by her said illness, and not otherwise." It is very apparent from all of the telegrams, letters, and affidavits submitted to the court that defendant desired to be present at the trial, and neither of the motions for a continuance called for any unreasonable delay, and there is nothing in this record to show that plaintiff could possibly have been injured if either of them had been granted. Under such circumstances, the refusal of the court to postpone the trial was error, and not within the limits of that judicial discretion which the law intends shall govern and restrain courts in their rulings upon such questions, and which discretion is never capricious, arbitrary, or unjust, but is always "exercised in conformity with the spirit of the law, and in a manner to subserve, and not to impede or defeat, the ends of substantial justice." Bailey v. Taaffe, 29 Cal. 424. Whatever cause may have existed for a divorce in this case, or however unwise or unfortunate the marriage between the parties may have been in the first instance, I can find in such facts no justification for bringing on the trial against a nonresident woman in 53 days after issue joined, in the face of a demand for the limited and reasonable postponement asked for by her counsel, and which motions it must be presumed from this record were made in good faith. The marriage was a lawful one, and gave to the defendant rights of which she should not be deprived without full and complete opportunity for defense. The judgment and order should be reversed.

(Supreme Court of California. June 17, 1892.)

TRUSTS—REVOCATION.

A voluntary conveyance was accepted by the grantee by a written instrument reciting that the grantor had conveyed the land to him in trust, which trust he accepted and agreed to carry out according to the terms of the grantor's will, made the same day. In this will the grantor, after a declaration of trust to take effect after his death, to which the acceptance of the trust by defendant referred, expressly stated that "the said trust property so conveyed as aforesaid forms no portion of my estate herein by this, my last will, disposed of." Held, that the conveyance was not a part of the will liable to be annulled by its revocation, and cannot be declared to have created a naked trust, or be avoided for want of consideration.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; G. W. HUNTER, Judge.

Action by Frederick W. Kopp against Robert Gunther to decree a conveyance of land from plaintiff to defendant to be a naked trust, and for a reconveyance thereof. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Buck & Cutler, for appellant. Chamberlin & Wheeler, for respondent.

MCFARLAND, J. This action was brought to have it decreed that a certain conveyance of lands by plaintiff to defendant created a mere naked legal trust, and to compel defendant to convey said lands to plaintiff. Defendant interposed a general demurrer to the complaint, which was sustained, and, plaintiff declining to amend, final judgment was rendered for defendant. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment.

The conveyance referred to is dated January 23, 1891, and is an ordinary grant, bargain, and sale deed, by which, for a named consideration of $5,000, the plaintiff conveys to the defendant in fee simple certain lots of land in the city of Eureka. It was duly acknowledged and recorded. At the same time defendant executed a written instrument, which, after reciting that plaintiff had conveyed said lots to defendant in trust, proceeds as follows: "I hereby accept such trust, and hereby agree to carry out the terms thereof as the same appear in that certain declaration of trust set forth and contained in the last will and testament of the said Kopp this day made, which said declaration of trust is hereby referred to and made a part hereof." On the same day plaintiff made his will, in which, after providing for the expenses of his last sickness, funeral, etc., he gives all the residue of his estate to one Regine Wagner. The will then proceeds as follows: "Having this day made, executed, and delivered unto Robert Gunther a deed conveying to him lots one and eight in block thirty-six, and the southwest quarter of block ninety-four, in the city of Eureka, according to the official map of said city, said property being conveyed to him in trust to be held, managed, incumbered, or disposed of in accordance with certain directions by me given to him, the said Gunther: Now, in order to avoid any uncertainty in relation to said trust, I hereby declare said trust to be as follows, to wit: (1) That said Gunther is to hold and manage said real property from this date henceforth in such manner as he may deem best; and upon my death he is at once to pay, or cause to be paid, from out said trust property, the following amounts, to wit: To Catarina Kopp, [and five other persons,] the sum of one hundred dollars each. (2) To cause to be erected over my grave a tombstone, to cost about $150. (3) Any money the said Gunther shall pay out of said property, either for taxes, insurance, or otherwise, and any and all sums of money he may advance or loan to me between this date and the time of my death, are to be considered a preferred charge on said lands; and the said Gunther is to first reimburse himself for such amounts so paid from said trust property. (4) Upon the payment of the foregoing, and such additional sums as the said Gunther may deem a reasonable compensation for his services as such trustee, he, the said Gunther, is to at once convey said property as follows, to wit: Unto Regine Wagner the said lots one and eight of block 36; and unto Augusta Wagner, the sister of the said Regine, the said southwest quarter of block 94. (5) Should it be necessary or expedient to sell or incumber said property in order to carry out said trust, said trustee has full power so to do, it being left to his discretion to so act in relation thereto that the diminution in value suffered by said trust property by reason thereof will be borne proportionately by the respective shares of the said Regine and Augusta Wagner. I here expressly state that the said trust property so conveyed as aforesaid forms no portion of my estate herein by this, my last will, disposed of; nor is it my wish or desire that said trust property be administered upon in probate."

The substantial averments of the complaint are these: The plaintiff, at the time of the execution of these instruments, was advanced in years, and in feeble health, and was "harassed by an unconscionable suit," brought against him by a woman who wanted damages for an alleged breach of promise of marriage. "Being oppressed by illness and anxiety about said suit," he sought the advice of defendant, in whom he had confidence, and under these circumstances, and "being thereto advised by defendant," he executed the said instruments. "In the execution of said instruments plaintiff understood and believed that he was making a testamentary disposition of his property; and he did not understand thereby, nor intend thereby, to place said real estate, nor any portion of his property, beyond his control or other disposition thereof." Said deed expresses a consideration of $5,000. No consideration was paid, and it was executed "solely for the purpose of securing defendant for small amounts of money to be loaned to plaintiff by defendant, and as a part of his last will as aforesaid." Since then "said unconscionable suit for breach of promise of marriage has been tried, and judgment thereon was, on the 14th day of March, 1891, duly given and made in favor of this plaintiff [defendant in said action] for his costs." It is further averred that "plaintiff has revoked said will, and every part thereof, and has also revoked the naked trust, if any, created by said conveyance." It is also averred that defendant had advanced to plaintiff about $300; that plaintiff has offered to pay said sum, and is ready to pay any other indebtedness which may be found due defendant; has demanded a reconveyance, and tendered to defendant a deed to be executed by him; but that defendant has refused to execute such deed, and claims to hold the legal title for the benefit of said Regine and Augusta Wagner.

The demurrer was properly sustained. The complaint contains no averments of undue influence, fraud, or any other of the ordinary grounds upon which the avoidance of solemn conveyances of property is usually based. It goes upon the theory that the deed was part of the will, and that plaintiff, by revoking the latter, annulled the former. But this clearly was not so. The revocation of the will released from its operation all property which would have been devised or bequeathed thereby if the testator had died without making the revocation. But the plaintiff in the will did not devise, or attempt to devise, the property conveyed by the deed. On the contrary, the latter was expressly excepted from the will, in which it was expressly stated that "the said trust property so conveyed as aforesaid forms no portion of my estate herein by this, my last will, disposed of." It is true that the instrument in which the will was written also contained a declaration of trust to which the acceptance of the trust by defendant referred; but the declaration of trust was as effective after the revocation of the will as before, and would have been equally effective if the will had never been valid as a will,—that is, if, for want of proper attestation, or from some other defect, it had never been legally executed. The deed is not part of the will, but the declaration of trust contained in it is referred to in the deed for the purpose of showing the nature of the trust. A present interest passed to defendant. He received the title in fee, with full power to control, to incumber, or to sell the property. It was a voluntary trust without power of revocation; and the averment of want of consideration is immaterial. Civil Code, §§ 863, 1040, 2216. The averment of a mistake of law does not bring the case within that extreme class of mistakes of law from which equity will relieve. Id. § 1578; Goodenow v. Ewer, 16 Cal. 471; Kenyon v. Welty, 20 Cal. 640; Burt v. Wilson, 28 Cal. 638. Moreover, it is apparent upon the face of the complaint that plaintiff did exactly what he intended to do. It is also clear that one of the main purposes of the deed was to put plaintiff's property beyond the reach of an unfavorable judgment on the pending action for breach of marriage promise, which, of course, could not have been effected by a mere testamentary disposition of said property.

PEOPLE v. DEVINE. (No. 20,911.)

LARCENY—INTENT.

Under Pen. Code, § 484, providing that larceny is the felonious stealing, leading, or driving away the personal property of another, where one drives away and sells stock of another, thinking it his own, as there is no felonious intent, he is not guilty of larceny.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; WHEATON A. GRAY, Judge.

Devine was convicted of larceny, and appeals. Reversed.

R. Irwin, J. S. Clark, and Bradley & Farnsworth, for appellant. Attorney General Hart, for the People.

SHARPSTEIN, J. "Larceny is the felonious stealing, taking, carrying, leading, or driving away the personal property of another." Pen. Code, § 484. In this case the evidence is sufficient to justify a jury in finding that appellant took and carried away the property of another; but insufficient to justify the finding that appellant feloniously stole the same. Therefore the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict of guilty of larceny against the defendant, and for that reason he is entitled to a new trial. The evidence shows that the appellant and Robert Doherty occupy adjoining tracts of land, and that each of them keeps upon his own tract a considerable number of hogs. Appellant, wishing to sell some of his hogs, directed two men in his employment to collect his hogs in a pen or inclosure, so that he might select therefrom some denominated "feeders," to take and sell to a butcher by the name of Sam Bee, whose place of business was several miles distant from appellant's farm. Out of 40 or 50 hogs in the corral, appellant, with the assistance of his son and the two men who had driven the hogs into the inclosure, selected 11 "feeders," which were loaded on a wagon, and conveyed to Sam Bee's place, and sold to him by appellant. There is evidence tending to prove that 3 of these 11 "feeders" were marked with Doherty's mark, which differed materially from appellant's mark, but the difference was not noticed by any save one of several witnesses who had equal opportunities with the appellant of observing the difference in the marks; and the witness who testified to having detected the difference does not state that he mentioned the fact to appellant, or any one else. Sam Bee, who purchased the hogs from appellant, testified that he did not observe the difference in the marks until his attention was called to it by William Doherty, about a week after the hogs were sold and delivered to him, Bee, by appellant. No part of the transaction was characterized by secrecy or attempted concealment. Appellant acted throughout as he would be expected to act if he thought he was dealing with his own property, and the evidence tends strongly to prove that he really and honestly so thought. We think the evidence, coupled with the presumption of innocence, which attends the accused from first to last, sufficient to overcome the presumption of a guilty intent, arising from a wrongful appropriation of the property of another. He was not informed that any of the hogs he carried away and sold were not his own, and all the evidence tends to prove that he honestly believed they were all his own. There is no evidence to the contrary. The rule applicable to such a case is illustrated by Sir Matthew Hale as follows: "If the sheep of A. stray from the flock of A. into the flock of B., and B. drives them along with his flock, or by pure mistake shears him, this is not felony; but if he know it to be another's, and marks with his mark, this is an evidence of a felony." 1 Hale, P. C. 507. "Every taking, by one person, of the personal property of another, without his consent, is not larceny; and this, although it was taken without right or claim of right, and for the purpose of appropriating it to the use of the taker. Superadded to this, there must have been a felonious intent, for without it there was no crime." McCourt v. People, 64 N. Y. 583. "One person may take or carry away the property of another, of the value of fifty dollars, without being guilty of any offense whatever. But if he does the act feloniously, the statutory crime is committed." People v. Cheong Foon Ark, 61 Cal. 527. "It is clear that a charge of larceny, which requires an intent to steal, could not be founded on a mere careless taking away of another's goods." 1 Bish. Crim. Law, § 320. In a note to State v. Homes, 57 Amer. Dec. 269, Mr. Freeman says: "To constitute the offense of larceny it is absolutely necessary that the taking of the goods be with a felonious intent;" and cites more than a hundred cases in support of that rule. "We cannot sustain the conviction without confounding the distinction between criminal acts and such as, however reprehensible, involve only a violation of private rights and injuries, for which there is a remedy only by civil action." McCourt v. People, 64 N. Y. 583.

We think the verdict in this case was largely, if not wholly, owing to an instruction given to the jury, which, although in the language of section 485 of the Penal Code, was not applicable to this case, and was liable to mislead the jury. The instruction to which we refer reads as follows: "One who finds lost property, under circumstances which give him knowledge of or means of inquiry as to the true owner, and who appropriates such property to his own use, or to the use of another person not entitled thereto, without making a reasonable and just effort to find the owner and restore the property to him, is guilty of larceny." Section 485, of which this instruction is a copy, "relates in terms to property lost (in the apparent possession of no one) and found." People v. Walenzuella, 6 Pac. Coast Law J. 561. There is no evidence in this case of the finding of any lost property. The property was in the apparent possession of the appellant, who could not have intended to steal it unless he knew it was not his own property. The objection to that instruction in this case is that the jury may have construed the instruction to mean that, if appellant had the property of another in his possession, and appropriated it to his own use, without making any effort to find the owner and restore the property to him, he was guilty of larceny, although he may not have known or suspected it to be the property of another. In other words, if, by the exercise of due circumspection, he might have ascertained that some of the hogs in his possession belonged to some one else, he was as guilty as if he had known that they were the property of some one else. There are cases in which all the knowledge which a person might have acquired by due diligence is to be imputed to him. But where a felonious intent must be proven it can be done only by proving what the accused knew. One cannot intend to steal property which he believes to be his own. He may be careless, and omit to make an effort to ascertain that property which he thinks his own belongs to another; but so long as he believes it to be his own he cannot feloniously steal it. We think if this instruction had not been given, the jury, under the instructions which preceded it, would have returned a different verdict. In People v. Buelna, 81 Cal. 135, 22 Pac. Rep. 396, one of the defenses was that the defendant found the property as lost property, and took it up in good faith, to be accounted for to the true owner. In that case section 485 of the Penal Code might properly be given as an instruction to the jury. But in this case there is no such defense or claim set up. The two cases are so clearly distinguishable as to deprive what was said in the earlier case of any weight upon the question we are now considering. In some cases an inapplicable instruction can do no harm; but when it is liable to mislead a jury to the prejudice of one of the parties, it becomes as grave an error as though it were not "correct as an abstract proposition of law." We agree with appellant's counsel that "the statements, questions, and remarks of the district attorney were peculiarly calculated to prejudice the substantial rights of the defendant." We think what was said by this court in People v. Lee Chuck, 78 Cal. 327, 20 Pac. Rep. 719, and People v. Bowers, 79 Cal. 415, 21 Pac. Rep. 752, peculiarly applicable to the conduct of the district attorney in this case, and we hope the court may not again have occasion to animadvert upon similar conduct of a prosecuting officer. The record presents no other material errors. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

McFARLAND, J. I concur.

DE HAVEN, J., (concurring.) I am not prepared to say that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict, but I concur in the judgment of reversal because of the error in giving the instruction referred to in the opinion of Mr. Justice SHARPSTEIN,—as to what facts are sufficient to show a larceny of lost property,—and also because of the misconduct of the district attorney in asking the defendant upon cross-examination certain questions, and in making a statement in reference thereto in the presence of the jury. The questions were as follows: "You know, as a matter of fact, you had been stealing his hogs right along?" and, "The only reason you have got right now for swearing that you believe that Robert Doherty had an antipathy towards you is because about six years ago he caught you dressing one of his hogs. Isn't that the only reason?" The questions being objected to by the defendant's attorney, they were followed by this statement, made by the district attorney: "I want to show that the only reason that the witness had for believing as he did was because Robert Doherty caught him one time killing one of his hogs. He had testified that Robert Doherty, he believed, had an antipathy against him. We desire to explain why he had that antipathy." It is not argued here, nor could it be with any degree of seriousness, that these questions were proper, or that the fact offered to be shown was one competent for the jury to consider for any purpose in passing upon the issues involved in the case they were trying. On the contrary, it is apparent that the only object sought by this course of examination, and in the statement made to the court, was to convey to the jury a knowledge of the alleged fact that the defendant was at some prior time guilty of an offense similar to that for which he was then on trial, and that he was at that time caught under such circumstances that he could not interpose the defense of a taking by mistake,—the only defense relied upon in the present case. Such a fact, thrown before the jury, and offered to be proven by the testimony of the defendant himself, could not have failed to prejudice the case of defendant. In this case the taking by defendant of the hogs alleged to have been stolen was not disputed; but the defendant claimed that he had not observed that such hogs bore the mark of the prosecuting witness, and his whole defense depended upon whether the jury should believe his evidence on this point. Under these circumstances it was very damaging to bring before the jury, in the manner adopted by the district attorney, the fact that upon a previous occasion the defendant had been caught dressing a hog belonging to the same person who was prosecuting him for larceny in this case. In the case of Leahy v. State, (Neb.) 48 N. W. Rep. 390, the defendant was on trial for a rape alleged to have been committed upon one Lizzie Schultz, and upon the cross-examination of the defendant the prosecuting attorney asked him, among other questions, if he did not go to the residence of one B., on the day succeeding that on which he had made the assault on Miss Schultz, and there, meeting Miss B. alone, attempt to kiss her, and drag her to a lounge. An objection to the question was sustained, whereupon the prosecuting attorney said in the presence of the jury: "We intend to follow this matter up, and show that he went right over to B.'s, and there tried to hug and kiss Miss B., and drag her to the lounge." The supreme court held that this was error, and said: "It is the duty of a prosecuting officer to conduct the trial of a criminal case according to established rules. He acts in a semijudicial capacity, and is supposed to act alone from principle, and without bias or prejudice. The state has guarantied to every one a fair trial, and such trial cannot be had if the prosecution can resort to tricks to secure a conviction. If such practice was sanctioned, it would result, in many cases, in the conviction of innocent persons. The plaintiff in error was on trial for the crime charged in the information. So far as appears, he had not been charged with any other offense, and certainly was not on trial for the second. The statements of the attorney were improper, and in the highest degree prejudicial, and for those causes the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial." The case of People v. Cahoon, 88 Mich. 456, 50 N. W. Rep. 384, and that of People v. Ah Len, 92 Cal. 282, 28 Pac. Rep. 286, are the same in principle as the one from which I have just quoted, and I think under the rule of these cases it must be held that the substantial rights of defendant were prejudiced by the mode of examination adopted by the district attorney and by his statement of the fact which he desired to show. The court below sustained objections to the questions, but this did not, in my judgment, obviate the injury which the questions and statement must have produced.

DIETZ v. MISSION TRANSFER CO. (No. 13,915.)

RESERVATIONS IN DEED — CONSTRUCTION — RES JUDICATA.

1. Defendant was the owner of a ranch, a portion of which had been conveyed to plaintiff by its grantors. This conveyance to plaintiff excepted oils, petroleum, etc., and reserved "the right to erect machinery, sink wells, bore, tunnel, dig for, work on, and remove the same from the premises, together with a right of way over and through any and all parts of said premises, for the purpose of going to and coming from said works, and transporting machinery, tools, implements, and supplies for said works, and of transporting said substances to market, and the right to lay pipes to conduct oil." Held, that defendant was not thereby authorized to use the land conveyed to plaintiff for the purpose of pumping or storing oil found in other portions of the ranch.

2. Defendant is not confined in its operations to portions of the land sold to plaintiff, where oil is found on the surface only, but is entitled to go on any portion of the land, and there use any reasonable means to develop oil.

3. Before the sale to defendant, plaintiff had leased the whole ranch for a certain period, and, to recover possession thereof from plaintiff, defendant had to bring suit. The only question determined in that suit was the right of plaintiff to retain possession under his lease. Held, that a judgment for defendant in that suit was no bar to a subsequent proceeding in ejectment to determine plaintiff's right to the portion of the ranch purchased by him.

4. Plaintiff conveyed to defendant all his right and title to "all the buildings, tanks, derricks, pipes, pipe lines, fixtures, and all other personal property whatsoever," situated on any portion of the ranch. Held, that by such conveyance not only did defendant become the owner of the property therein specifically mentioned, and property of a kindred nature, but it also acquired the right to operate them in the manner they had theretofore been operated. HARRISON and DE HAVEN, JJ., dissenting.

Ejectment by one Dietz against the Mission Transfer Company. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

PATERSON, J. Ejectment. On December 20, 1881, Carpentier & Steinbach were the owners in fee of a tract of land consisting of about 20,000 acres, in Ventura county, and known as the "Ex-Mission Rancho." On that day they entered into a contract of lease with the plaintiff herein, by the terms of which plaintiff was to have the possession of the land, together with the buildings and improvements thereon, and the right to use all necessary land for the purpose of digging, boring for, developing, and taking oils, petroleum, asphaltum, and other kindred substances, and the right of way over the lands of the ranch for roads where necessary for the purpose of transporting substances to market. The lessors retained the right to pasture their cattle and sheep on the land, and to farm and cultivate all that portion of the premises not occupied for the purposes aforesaid. The lease was to continue for the term of three years from the 1st day of January, 1882. It was provided that, in case the lessors should at any time sell the premises, or the right to take oil, petroleum, and kindred substances, the contract should "ipso facto terminate six months from a written notice of such sale," but that the plaintiff should not in any event be required to quit and deliver up possession of the premises before the 1st day of July, 1883. Dietz was to have the option of purchasing the property and privileges leased to him for the sum of $150,000 at any time within three years from the date of the lease. While the owners reserved the right to sell the lands with or without the rights referred to, to any other person at any time within the three years, it was provided that they should first give Dietz 30 days' notice for the exercise of his option to take the property at $150,000, or any less sum which they might be willing to take. If he did not purchase within 30 days after the notice, then the owners were to have the privilege of selling to any other person. On October 25, 1882, Carpentier & Steinbach notified Dietz that they had an offer of $100,000 for the property and rights named in his lease, which offer they were willing to take, and requiring him within 30 days of the notice to exercise the option reserved to him in the lease. It does not appear whether Dietz made any reply to this notice. On November 23, 1882, Carpentier & Steinbach made, executed, and delivered to Dietz a deed, grant, bargain, and sale in form, conveying, in consideration of the sum of $2,400, about 400 acres of the 20,000-acre tract above referred to. This deed excepted from the operation of the grant "all oils, petroleum, asphaltum, and other kindred mineral substances," and contained a reservation of "the right to erect machinery, sink wells, bore, tunnel, dig for, work on, and remove the same from the said premises, together with the right of way over and through any and all parts of said premises, for the purpose of going to and coming from said works, and transporting machinery, tools, implements, and supplies for said works, and of transporting said substances to a market, and the right to lay pipes to conduct oil, and the right to dispose of said substances, and of transferring to their grantees thereof the same rights as are herein reserved to the parties of the first part; but not to destroy or injure any crops growing upon or any improvements on said premises, such as buildings, trees, vines, roads, inclosures, without making just compensation for such injury or destruction. Reserving also to the parties of the first part the right of way for a road or roads over and across said premises, for the use of tenants or vendees of adjoining and other lands of said rancho." The party referred to in the notice of October 25th, as having made an offer of $100,000, was F. J. Whaley, with whom Carpentier & Steinbach had entered into an agreement on October 21st, by the terms of which they agreed to sell to him the property and rights described in the lease to Dietz, for the sum of $100,000, "subject to the pre-emption right of Alfred C. Dietz, as contained in the indenture of lease between Horace W. Carpentier and Rudolph Steinbach, dated the 20th day of December, A. D. 1881." By the terms of this agreement the purchaser was to pay $10,000 when possession was delivered on July 1, 1883, and the balance in certain installments named; but it was provided that "the title of the said right is to be retained by the first party until performance." On November 25, 1882, Carpentier & Steinbach notified Whaley that they had given Dietz the notice required in the lease to him on October 25th; that the 30 days allowed him in which to exercise his option had expired November 24th; and that he had elected to purchase. On December 12, 1882, Dietz was notified that Carpentier & Steinbach had sold the property and rights described in his lease, and that his lease would therefore terminate on July 1, 1883, at which time they would require of him to quit and surrender up the possession of the premises. The deed from Carpentier & Steinbach to Dietz was recorded November 27, 1882. Whaley conveyed all his right, title, and interest to the defendant on October 28, 1882, and the latter has thus far complied with all the terms of the agreement with Carpentier & Steinbach.

The first matter presented for consideration is the question as to the effect of these conveyances and notices. It is claimed by respondent that "on the 24th day of October, 1882, and before the deed to Dietz of November 23, 1882, the Mission Transfer Company had acquired, through the assignment of the contract with Whaley, the general right over the entire tract to the mineral oils and asphaltum in the ground, to the right of entry upon the whole tract to mine and explore for oils and asphaltum, with the right of way over every part of it for the transportation of the oils, and every other right which was necessary to the enjoyment of the interest which they had acquired. They, therefore, had this right before the deed to Dietz was made, and whatever estate or interest in the particular 400-acre tract he obtained by that deed was subject to the rights of the Mission Transfer Company under the agreement of Carpentier & Steinbach with Whaley." We cannot agree with respondent in this contention. Under his agreement with Carpentier & Steinbach, and the notice which they gave him, Dietz had the right to purchase the property at any time before November 25, 1882. The 30 days' notice was served on him on October 25, 1882. This gave him to and including November 24th in which to exercise his option. While he was thus in possession of the land under his lease, and entitled to purchase, the owners of the land, by a deed of grant, bargain, and sale, conveyed a part of the rancho to him for the consideration of $2,400. So long as the owners of the land were willing to convey 400 acres of the entire tract nobody could be heard to complain, so far as Deitz was concerned. If Whaley or the transfer company had any ground of complaint, it was against Carpentier & Steinbach. The contract between these parties could in no way bind Dietz. He became the owner of the 400 acres before the expiration of the time within which he was required to exercise his option, and the fact that his grantors had entered into agreement for the sale of an interest in the property to Whaley could not deprive him of the benefit of his agreement and his conveyance. We do not see how the defendant can be heard to complain unless it be held that plaintiff was bound to purchase the entire tract of 20,000 acres, or none at all,—a proposition which cannot be maintained. Our conclusion, therefore, on this branch of the case, is that the defendant acquired no right by virtue of its purchase from Carpentier & Steinbach to use the land in controversy for the purpose of operating an oil plant in developing, transporting, and storing oil found on other portions of the rancho. Its right in this regard is acquired solely through the exceptions and reservations found in the deed to plaintiff, and the conveyance to it by Carpentier & Steinbach. It has the right to go upon the land in controversy, under those exceptions and reservations, for the purposes therein named; but its operations, under the terms of the deed, must be confined to the 400-acre tract. The plaintiff's grant conveyed to him the absolute title to the 400-acre tract, with the exception of the oil, asphaltum, and other kindred mineral substances therein, and the right reserved to erect machinery, sink wells, etc., on said tract.

It is contended by appellant that the exceptions and reservations in the deed to Dietz do not give the defendant the right to go upon the 400-acre tract for the purpose of developing oil, and that, as the evidence shows there is no oil on that portion of the ranch, the defendants have no right there; but the plain meaning of the language used in the deed does not support this theory. The terms "sink wells, bore, tunnel, dig for" certainly mean the right to develop. The fact, if it be a fact, that there are no oil croppings on the surface will not prevent defendant from digging, tunneling, etc., to ascertain whether any exist below the surface. How much tunneling, boring, digging, etc., may be done by the defendant for the purpose of developing oil cannot be determined in advance. "All that can be said in that regard is that they would be held to a reasonable exercise of the right to develop the [oil] water." Painter v. Water Co., 91 Cal. 86, 27 Pac. Rep. 539.

The defendant pleaded in bar of plaintiff's cause of action a judgment entered in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, on June 30, 1884, in an action between Steinbach, Carpentier, and the Mission Transfer Company, plaintiffs, and Dietz, Hill, and Adams, defendants. The plaintiffs in that action alleged all the facts we have stated above in relation to the transactions between the various parties, excepting the fact of the conveyance from Carpentier & Steinbach to Dietz, and claimed that Dietz had lost all rights under his lease from Carpentier & Steinbach by failure to purchase within the 30 days following the notice given, and by virtue of the provisions of the lease requiring him to quit and deliver possession on July 1, 1883; but nevertheless he was unlawfully holding, and claiming the right to hold, possession of the land for the purpose of extracting oils, etc., and, although demand had been made, he had refused to permit the respondent to enter upon the land for the purpose of exploring, developing, or extracting the oil therefrom. In his answer to this claim Dietz denied that he had lost his rights under the lease, and insisted that he was still entitled to retain possession of the lands for the purposes named therein. The court's findings of fact were confined to the matters averred in the complaint, and denied in the answer, and its conclusion of law was that "said grant or license to said Dietz, and all the rights and privileges thereunder, did actually and ipso facto cease and determine on the 1st day of July, 1883." It is true the court decreed that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment restraining the defendants from hindering, delaying, or preventing the transfer company "from entering into and occupying, all and singular, the lands and premises, and from erecting and constructing thereupon buildings, tanks, pipe lines, machinery, and other apparatus, and from drilling and sinking wells;" but this provision must be read in connection with the issues made, and the court's findings of fact and conclusion of law. If the plaintiffs in that action had alleged, in general terms, the ultimate fact of their right to the possession of the land for the purposes named, the contention of respondent would doubtless be sound. This they did not do, but preferred to set forth specifically the facts upon which Dietz had acquired the right to possession of the land for the purpose of exploring for oil, and the reasons why such right had ceased to exist. Deitz was not bound to, and did not in fact attempt to, go beyond the case made by the complaint. The only thing considered and determined in the case was the right of Dietz to retain possession of the land under his lease from Carpentier & Steinbach, and for the purposes therein specified. In this case another and entirely different question is presented, namely, plaintiff's right to the possession as owner in fee of a part of the tract. The question as to his right to extract oil from the land, or any part of it, is not here involved; he makes no such claim; nor does he dispute the right of the respondent to occupy any portion of the land for the purpose of taking oil therefrom, provided oil exists therein. He insists that no oil exists in this 400-acre tract owned by him, and for that reason the respondent has no right to be there at all.

On May 29, 1886, Dietz and Hill, by a deed of grant, bargain, and sale, conveyed to the respondent all their right, title, and interest in and to "all the buildings, tanks, derricks, pipes, pipe lines, fixtures, and all other personal property whatsoever," situated upon any portion of the rancho. Upon a further consideration of the terms of this instrument and the circumstances under which the deed was made, we are convinced that it conveyed to the defendant not merely pipes, tanks, derricks, buildings, etc., as personal property, but that the transfer necessarily carried with it the right to operate the same in the manner they theretofore had been operated by the defendant. That such was the intention of the parties we think is clear from the language of the deed. "Granted, bargained, sold" are words usually employed in instruments conveying real property. The instrument speaks of pipes, pipe lines, and fixtures. The term "pipe line" evidently means something different from "pipes," and conveys the idea of a line of pipe running upon or in the earth, carrying with it the right to the use of the soil in which it is placed. The use of the phrase "other personal property" does not militate against the construction we place upon the deed. Some of the things mentioned are shown to be affixed to the soil and a part of the realty. The phrase referred to covers simply personal property not previously mentioned, but of the same kind or nature. It certainly would not be contended that the words "other personal property" would include the cattle and other stock running on the rancho.

In view of what has just been said, it is unnecessary for us to consider the question of title by adverse possession. The deed referred to conveyed the plant as it existed on the 400-acre tract in 1886, and it is not claimed that any right by adverse possession to any additional property has been acquired since that time. The evidence shows that the plant which defendant now claims the right to operate is substantially the same as it was on May 29, 1886.

Our conclusions upon the whole case are: (1) That the conveyance from Carpentier & Steinbach to defendant does not invest the latter with authority to use the land in controversy for the purpose of pumping or storing oil found in other portions of the 20,000-acre tract, but that the interest acquired by plaintiff through his deed from Carpentier & Steinbach is subject to the right of the defendant on the 400-acre tract only to take and do the things named in the exceptions and reservations contained in the deed of November 23, 1882; (2) that the judgment of June 30, 1884, is not a bar to plaintiff's cause of action; (3) that by the deed of May 29, 1886, from Dietz and Hill to defendant, the latter became the owner of all the "buildings, tanks, derricks, pipes, pipe lines, fixtures," on the land in controversy, and all other personal property of a similar nature connected therewith, and the right to occupy sufficient land for the use of said property, for the purposes and in the manner it had theretofore been operated by the defendant; (4) that defendant is not confined in its operations to portions of the land in controversy where oil is found upon the surface only, but that it is entitled to go upon any portion of the land, and use any reasonable means to enjoy the exceptions and reservations named in the deed of November 23d. Upon the evidence the court properly found that plaintiff could not maintain ejectment, but the decree awards to the defendant greater rights and privileges than it is entitled to. As some of the findings, however, are not warranted by the evidence, we could not, without making new findings, direct a modification of the judgment. The judgment and order are reversed.

We concur: McFarland, J.; Sharpstein, J.; Garoutte, J.

Harrison, J. I concur in reversing the order and judgment appealed from, and I also concur in the opinion of Mr. Justice Paterson, except in that portion thereof wherein he holds that the deed to the respondent of May 29, 1886, carried with it the right to operate and use the property therein conveyed for the purpose and in the manner it had been theretofore operated by the defendant, and also the right to occupy sufficient land for the purpose of such use and operation. The instrument itself purports to be nothing more than a transfer of the interest of the plaintiff and Hill "in and to the buildings, tanks, derricks, pipes, pipe lines, fixtures, and all other personal property" that was then or at any other time upon the 20,000-acre tract of land. There is nothing in the instrument which requires a construction to be given to it that will include more than is expressed in the words of the description, nor is there any evidence of surrounding circumstances which justifies an inference that the parties to the instrument had in their minds any other property than that which is described, or that it was their intention to transfer any right in addition to the property therein specified. With the exception of "pipe lines," the terms of description used in the instrument are peculiarly applicable to personal property, and the subsequent clause, "and all other personal property," shows that only personal property was intended. A "building" without any qualification or other term of description is essentially personal property, and in this state especially it is frequently the subject of sale and transfer as personal property. Whether, in any instance, it is other than personal property by virtue of its being attached to the soil, is a question of fact to be determined from the circumstances of that case. Miller v. Waddingham, 91 Cal. 379, 27 Pac. Rep. 750. Even if any of the buildings that were upon the land in question had been so affixed, they would have passed by the subsequent term "fixtures," which was doubtless used to obviate the possibility of any dispute concerning the character of the property transferred. Although the title to fixtures will pass under a grant of the realty, it is not the rule that the realty or a right to its use will pass under a transfer of the fixtures. In the absence of any other evidence, the use of the term "fixtures" in the instrument would be limited to the fixtures themselves, and would imply that they were to be severed and taken away. A sale of the "trees" upon a tract of land is not a transfer of the land itself, and gives to the grantee merely the permission to go upon the land for the purpose of removing the trees; and the transfer of buildings or other improvements upon land is not within the statute of frauds, and may be made by parol. The use in the instrument of the words "grant, bargain, and sell" does not vary the construction to be given to it. These terms are expressly limited therein to the "interest" of the grantors in the property described, and the other terms "transfer and set over," which are used therein instead of the word "convey," have reference exclusively to personalty.

It is held that a conveyance of a "mill" or a "wharf" or a "well" or a "bridge" will, without the use of any term expressly descriptive of real estate, pass the land connected therewith, upon the principle that in such a case the land is an essential element of the thing described, and passes by the use of a term which is sufficiently comprehensive to include it. So, too, when a conveyance is made of a "dwelling house" or a "barn," and it is shown that the parties to the transaction were negotiating in reference to the place, including the land on which the structure was situated, it is held that the land will pass. Such construction rests upon the principle that when land is occupied or improved by a structure designed for a particular purpose, which comprehends a practical enjoyment and use of the land, and in which the land is of subordinate consideration to that of the purpose, a term which is descriptive of the purpose to which the land is appropriated will be as apt for a conveyance of the land as would a description of the land itself. Johnson v. Rayner, 6 Gray, 110. There is nothing, however in the term "building," or in any of the terms used in the present instrument, which can be said to be descriptive of any purpose or use in which the land is an essential element for its enjoyment; nor does the record in the present case disclose the nature or character of the "buildings" or "fixtures" intended by the transfer, or throw any light upon the circumstances attending the transaction; and, in the absence of such evidence, there is no warrant for giving to the terms of the instrument any other than their ordinary construction. It does appear, however, from the record that Dietz had been the lessee from Carpentier & Steinbach of the entire tract of 20,000 acres, and had made improvements upon the portions outside of the 400-acre tract involved in this controversy, and it is as consistent to suppose that the terms used were intended to have reference to the improvements outside of the 400-acre tract. It also appears that, after the deed to Dietz of this 400-acre tract, the defendant had erected the improvements in question within the boundaries of that tract. Whether these structures were of such a character as to become fixtures, and thus belong to Dietz, or whether they were of a temporary character, does not appear; but the use of the term "fixtures" in the instrument of transfer, in addition to the term "buildings," would imply that the buildings themselves had not become fixtures.

It is not shown whether the pipe lines were upon the ground, or imbedded beneath its surface, nor whether or to what extent they were used as conduits for oil from without the 400-acre tract. If these pipe lines were part of a continuous conduit, or were imbedded beneath the surface of the ground, the effect of their conveyance would be to create an easement in the ground for their use, and to authorize their continuance in the same position for such use, with the right to the defendant to enter upon the land for necessary repairs; but the transfer to it of the other property named in the instrument gave to it no right to occupy the land for its use, and the plaintiff had the right to maintain this action for the purpose of removing the defendant from the land held by it for the purposes of such use.

ORDER GRANTING NEW TRIAL—GROUNDS—INSUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE.

1. An order granting a new trial on defendant's motion, for error in overruling his motions for a nonsuit made after the closing of plaintiff's case, and after the hearing of all the evidence, practically grants it on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict for plaintiff, and an appeal from such an order raises the question of whether the trial court abused its discretion by so holding.

2. A new trial granted by the trial court for error in overruling defendant's motion for a nonsuit made after the closing of plaintiff's case shows the court's belief that all the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict for plaintiff.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. H. CLARK, Judge.

Motion by the Southern Pacific Company against C. A Fox for a new trial. Granted. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. T. Kendrick and J. C. Rives, for appellant. John T. Bicknell, for respondent.

MCFARLAND, J. The verdict and judgment were for plaintiff. On motion of defendant, the court below granted a new trial, and plaintiff appeals from the order granting said motion. The motion was made upon nearly all the statutory grounds, including insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict. The order granting the motion is as follows: "Defendant's motion for a new trial granted upon the following grounds, to wit: First, court erred in overruling motion for nonsuit made when plaintiff rested her case and before any evidence was introduced by defendant; second, that the court erred in overruling defendant's motion for nonsuit made after the evidence was closed, and before said cause was submitted to the jury." If the court had merely granted the new trial without stating the grounds upon which it was granted, or if "insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict" had been stated as one of the grounds, it is probable that this appeal would never have been taken; for, in that event, it could not have been argued with any plausibility that setting aside the verdict for want of evidence was an abuse of discretion. But, practically and substantially, the court did grant a new trial on the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict, although the judgment of the court to that effect was expressed in the roundabout way of holding that the motions for nonsuit should have been granted. If the court believed that the evidence for plaintiff was insufficient to justify the verdict in her favor, and that, therefore, the first motion for a nonsuit should have been granted, it must necessarily have believed that all the evidence in the case was insufficient to justify such a verdict; for clearly what was introduced after plaintiff had closed her evidence in chief did not in any way strengthen her case. But there was a second motion for nonsuit made after all the evidence was in, and the rule with respect to such a motion is that "a court is justified in granting defendant's motion for nonsuit, after the evidence on both sides has been heard, in a case where, if the motion had been denied and a verdict found for plaintiff, it would have been set aside as not supported by, but contrary to, the evidence." Geary v. Simmons, 39 Cal. 224. Practically, therefore, the real question in the case at bar is whether or not the court abused its discretion in holding that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict; and it is clear to us, from an examination of the evidence, that this question must be answered in the negative. The order appealed from is affirmed.

HILL v. BOARD OF SUP'RS OF VENTURA COUNTY. (No. 14,718.)

LAYING OUT HIGHWAYS—PETITION—FILING BOND—APPROVAL OF SURETIES.

1. Pol. Code, § 2682, prescribes the requirements of a petition in condemnation proceedings to lay out a public road, which do not include a statement of the width of the road. By section 2681 the road must be 40 feet wide, but the viewers are authorized to report upon the "necessity of a greater, or the practicability of a less, width of road than petitioned for." Held, that the failure to state the width in such a petition did not render the proceedings void.

2. A bond, not marked "Filed," to accompany a petition to lay out a public road, dated 10 days after the petition was marked "Filed," appeared by the minutes of the county board of supervisors to have been presented at the same time with the petition, and ordered filed. By a nunc pro tunc order, made after service of the writ in a proceeding to review the board's action, the bond was approved, and ordered filed, and the petition was acted upon by the appointment of viewers. No action was had or asked before the bond was presented. Held, that the bond was properly approved and filed to accompany the petition.

3. Failure by the sureties to such bond to justify as required by law is an irregularity only, which does not affect the private rights of a party applying for a review of the board's actions.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Ventura county; B. T. WILLIAMS, Judge.

Proceeding by Aranetta Hill against the board of supervisors of the county of Ventura to review the board's action in laying out a public highway in that county. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. N. Wilde, for appellant. H. L. Poplin, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This appeal is from a judgment in a proceeding to review the action of the board of supervisors of the county of Ventura in laying out a public highway in that county. The affidavit or petition upon which the writ was issued is not in the record, as the statute does not make that a part of the judgment roll. From the writ we learn that the alleged want of jurisdiction on the part of the board consisted solely in that the petition asking the board to lay out the road did not state the width of the proposed road, and was not accompanied by a bond, as required by section 2683, Pol. Code, and that no bond was approved, as required by section 2683, Pol. Code. The return shows a petition and a bond, the latter not marked "Filed," but dated some 10 days after the petition was filed, the appointment of viewers, and an order approving the report, and declaring the amount of damage awarded to each nonconsenting landowner; and the amount awarded was ordered set apart from the proper road fund, as directed by the statute. As the plaintiff did not accept the award, the final order declaring the proposed road a public highway open to the public was never made. In the judgment it is adjudged that all the proceedings subsequent to the appointment of viewers "be, and the same are hereby, set aside and annulled;" and all the proceedings prior to and including the qualification of viewers "be, and the same are hereby, affirmed." The alleged defects of jurisdiction, if sustained, would seem to render the entire proceeding void. The record discloses no special attack upon the proceedings subsequent to the appointment of viewers, or any attack upon any part of the proceedings, except as above stated. It is not easy, under the circumstances, to understand the judgment. But appellant is not aggrieved by that part which is in his favor, and the defendant has not appealed. The proceedings are left still pending, with the report of the viewers made, but not acted upon. The writ did not and could not run to the action of the viewers. That could only have been set aside by taking from it its support by annulling the previous proceedings. Whether these proceedings are void is the point of the appeal. It is well to remember that this is a proceeding to condemn land. By this proceeding no one is, or can be, deprived of his property, save by his consent. It is the exercise of a legislative power, delegated to the board, though the procedure requires also action of a quasi judicial character. The legislature might have conferred the power without the procedure, and without requiring notice or granting a hearing to property holders. It would then have been only a power to determine whether the land to be taken was needed for public uses; and the property owner, in the proceedings to condemn, which would follow as a consequence of such determination, would have his opportunity to be heard. The procedure here prescribed leads to but the same determination as to the necessity of taking the land. It was not meant specially for the protection of the individual, but to secure to the public a fair and intelligent use of the power delegated. The mode is here, no doubt, in some sense, the measure of the power, and there must therefore be a substantial compliance with the conditions prescribed, or the action of the board will be void. Whether there has or has not been a substantial compliance must be determined with a view to the purpose of the limitations. In effect, the statute (section 2681, Pol. Code,) requires as a prerequisite to the exercise of this power on the part of the board a petition signed by at least 10 freeholders of the road district in which it is proposed to lay out the road. The next section is as follows: "2682. Petition must set forth and describe particularly the road to be abandoned, discontinued, altered, or constructed, and, if the road is to be altered, laid out, or constructed, the general route thereof, over what lands, who the owners thereof are, whether such of them as can be found consent thereto, and, if not, the probable cost of such right of way where such consent is not had, the necessity for, and the advantages of, the proposed road." When such a petition has been filed, evidently the conditions have been complied with which were required to set the power in motion, and the board may act. Appellant attempts to import into these requirements a statement as to the width of the road, because in section 2681, Pol. Code, the viewers are authorized to report upon the "necessity of a greater or the practicability of a less width of road than petitioned for;" and from the fact that there is no other direction for ascertaining the width,—and all roads must have width,—and whether this be more or less, affects the questions which the board is called upon to determine. This seems quite plausible, but we are not here dealing with a court which is confined to the facts contained in a written statement, but with a legislative body, exercising a power ample as the subject to be dealt with, only as limited by express provision as to the mode. The road must be at least 40 feet wide. Section 2681, Pol. Code. The petition was therefore for a road at least 40 feet wide, even if no width is mentioned.

The statute above shows that the board may fix upon a different width from that stated in the petition, and, after the filing of the report of the viewers, the landowners are allowed an opportunity to be heard, and may present their views upon this very subject. The statute is imperfect, and does not expressly prescribe what shall be done in case the board disagrees with the viewers as to the width, or elects to establish a road upon a different route; but still it is evident that such power is vested in the board. I think, therefore, although some provisions of the statute were evidently written under the impression that the petition would state the width of the road, yet, since the legislature has expressly declared in section 2682 what the petition must contain to set the power in motion, and does not require such fact to be stated, the failure does not render the proceedings void. The petition was marked "Filed" a few days before the date of the bond, but both seem to have been presented together. Of course no action was had or asked before the bond was presented, and, as shown by the nunc pro tunc order, was approved and ordered filed by the board. This order was complained of, because it was made after service of the writ herein. This was not an attempt surreptitiously to change the record so as to avoid an objection. If the recitals are true, I see nothing wrong in it. Whether it is conclusive is not involved here. The minutes before amendment showed that the bond was ordered filed, and the petition acted upon by the appointment of viewers. In Humboldt Co. v. Dinsmore, 75 Cal. 604, 17 Pac. Rep. 710, these acts seem to have been held to indicate that the bond was approved. While it must appear that the statute has been substantially complied with, courts make very liberal indulgences in favor of these records, which, although of great importance, seem nearly always very imperfect. As to the point that the bond was approved, although the sureties had not justified as required by law, it is plainly an irregularity only, and one which did not affect the private rights of the appellant. The validity of the proceedings establishing public highways cannot be made to depend upon the correctness of the judgment of the board as to whether the justification of a surety was in accordance with the statute. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

Ex parte Flood.[1]

Superior Court of San Francisco — Criminal Jurisdiction—House of Correction.

Const. 1879, art. 22, § 1, retains Act April 1, 1877, § 3, which provides that, in certain courts, persons who might be sentenced to state prison may be sentenced to the house of correction. Const. art. 22, § 3, abolishes the courts named; and article 6 creates the superior court of San Francisco as their successor, with similar powers. Held, that under these provisions the superior court of San Francisco had jurisdiction to sentence a defendant to the house of correction, instead of to the state prison.

In bank. Application by James Flood, sentenced to the house of correction on conviction of grand larceny, for writ of habeas corpus. Writ dismissed.

John D. Whaley, for petitioner. Alfred Clarke, for respondent.

McKee, J. In the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco the petitioner, having been convicted of the crime of grand larceny, was sentenced to imprisonment in the house of correction of said city and county for the term of three years. The sentence was imposed under the provisions of a statute passed April 1, 1877, entitled "An act in relation to the house of correction of the city and county of San Francisco." St. 1877-78, p. 953. By section 3 of the act, it was provided that "all persons appearing for sentence in the police judge's court, the city criminal court, or the municipal criminal court of the city and county of San Francisco, who might be sentenced to imprisonment in the county jail or in the state prison, may, instead thereof, be sentenced to imprisonment in the house of correction in said city and county, subject, however, to the provisions of section 4; and no person shall be sentenced to imprisonment in the house of correction except under the provisions of this act." All the courts enumerated in the above section of this act, except the police judge's court, were abolished by the constitution of 1879, (section 3, art. 22, Const.;) and the cases in those courts, together with the records, books, and papers appertaining to them, were, by command of the constitution, transferred on January 1, 1880, to the superior court of the city and county, (article 6, § 5, Const ;) and by section 3 of an act to transfer the records, papers, and business of the courts existing on the 31st of December, 1879, to the present existing courts, passed February 4, 1880, the provisions of the constitution in that regard were carried into effect. When transferred, the superior court was authorized to "exercise jurisdiction over such cases, records, books, and papers as if they had been, in the first instance, commenced, filed, or lodged therein." The case in hand, however, was not one of that class of cases. It had not been commenced and was not pending in any of the abolished courts on or before December 31, 1879; and there were no records, papers, or books appertaining to it, transferable or transferred to the superior court. As a transferred case, the superior court had therefore no jurisdiction over it. It was commenced in the superior court, and prosecuted to the conviction of the defendant under the original jurisdiction conferred upon the court "over all criminal cases amounting to felony and cases of misdemeanor not otherwise provided for," (section 5, art. 6, Const.,) and under the provisions of the Penal Code applicable to the crime of which conviction was had, and to which was annexed as a punishment imprisonment in the state prison of not less than one nor more than ten years, (section 489, Pen. Code.) But, if the case had been in any one of the courts which were abolished by the constitution, that court would have been authorized, by the law of 1877, to punish the petitioner for the crime of which he stood convicted, by imprisonment in the house of correction instead of by imprisonment in the state prison. The abolition of those courts did not wipe out the laws which were applicable to them, nor has the law of 1877 been repealed. On the contrary, the framers of the constitution retained the law of 1877, (section 1, art. 22, Const.,) and made it applicable to the superior court, which they created as the successor of the courts that had been abolished, (sections 3, 11, art. 22;) and it results that as the law of 1877 was applicable to the superior court, and the circumstances of the case brought the case itself within the provisions of the law, the court had jurisdiction to sentence the defendant in the case to the house of correction instead of to the state prison. The judgment under which the petitioner has been committed is therefore valid, and the petitioner is lawfully held in custody. Writ dismissed, and petitioner remanded.

Code Civil Proc. Cal. § 1365, provides that administration of the estate of an intestate shall be granted in the following order: "* * * (8) The public administrator; (9) the creditors. * * *"

Conklin & Hunsaker, for appellant. F. L. Aude, for respondent.

MYRICK, J. One Stockton presented a petition as creditor for letters of administration. Ubach and Keating also presented a petition as creditors, and thereafter said Stockton presented his petition as public administrator. After due notice given on each, all the petitions came on for hearing, when Stockton withdrew his petition as creditor. Thereupon the court made the following order, which order is appealed from: "At this time the court denies the petition of T. C. Stockton for letters of administration herein as public administrator, and grants the petition of A. D. Ubach and Michael Keating, asking that letters of administration be granted to A. D. Ubach and Michael Keating, the court holding that said Stockton waived his right as public administrator to have letters herein when he applied first for letters as a creditor, and that he was thereby estopped from a right to make the second application as public administrator, and he having dismissed his application only at the hearing, and petitioners Ubach and Keating having filed their petitions for letters after Stockton's petition for letters as a creditor, but before his petition for letters as public administrator was filed. And thereupon the court made its order in the usual form, directing that letters of administration upon the estate of said deceased be issued to said Ubach and Keating, upon their taking the oath and filing a bond according to law, in the sum of three thousand five hundred dollars." In withdrawing the petition as a creditor, and in standing on the other petition, there was no waiver of the latter, nor was Stockton estopped from urging his claim to letters as public administrator. As such officer he was entitled to letters in preference to creditors. Section 1365, Code Civil Proc. The order is reversed, and the cause is remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with this opinion.

LOS ANGELES CEMETERY ASS'N v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES. (No. 14,711.)

RESCISSION OF CONDITIONAL DEED — FORFEITURE.

The resolution, pursuant to which plaintiff cemetery association conveyed a strip of land to defendant city, provided that the same be "granted for a public road and highway, on the condition that the fence be removed and reset on the line of the road, said work to be done at the expense of the city, and also that the street be graded at the city's expense." Defendant accepted the grant, removed the fence, and placed the street in a condition for travel, but no grading was done. Held, that defendant did not forfeit the grant because it did not grade the street when required to do so by plaintiff; but when it is apparent that defendant will not grade the street at its own expense, or at all, plaintiff may demand a reconveyance.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; LUCIEN SHAW, Judge.

Action to quiet title by the Los Angeles Cemetery Association against the city of Los Angeles. Defendant had judgment, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

M. C. Hester and Judson & Wood, for appellant. C. McFarland, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This action was brought to quiet title to a strip of land in the city of Los Angeles. The plaintiff, a corporation formed for cemetery purposes, owned about 70 acres of land in the city aforesaid, which included that in controversy here. Its board of directors passed a resolution which ran thus: "Aug. 25, 1885. The board held a special meeting this date; all the directors, to wit, A. H. Judson, V. Ponet, I. W. Lord, Fred. Dohs, and A. E. Pomeroy, being present. It was moved and carried that a strip of land forty feet in width off and along the south line of the present Evergreen cemetery lands, and being the south line of lots one and two in block 73, Hancock's survey, be granted for a public road and highway, on the condition that the fence be removed and reset on the line of the road, said work to be done at the expense of the city, and also that the street be graded at the city's expense. On motion, meeting adjourned. Attest: A. E. POMEROY, Sec." The president of the corporation, A. H. Judson, on the 7th of September, 1885, made a conveyance of the land described in the resolution to the defendant, which, after describing the land, reads thus: "Said piece of land being for the purpose of a street or highway; and, in the event of its ceasing to be used as such public street or highway, the said land to revert to the said corporation grantor. Grantor reserving the right to remove the fence on said land at any time within six months from the date of the acceptance of this deed." The defendant, in pursuance of the resolution, removed the fence, and within a very short time after the 7th of September, 1885, the strip of land began to be and has been ever since used for public travel; and in the year 1887 the defendant, by its proper officers, changed the name of this strip of land from "Aliso Avenue Extension" to "First Street." It also appears that the property owners on the side of this strip opposite the cemetery property, from which it was taken, deeded to the city certain land which was also used as part of this public street. It further appears that the city by ordinance established the grade of this land as a public street. And that on the 30th of September, 1885, the conveyances of these lands, including that in controversy here, were presented to its "council," and referred to the board of public works, and that on recommendation they were accepted and ordered filed for record with the recorder. There has been work done many times upon this road by the city in the way of repairing, fixing, and putting it in order for travel, but it has not yet been graded. And the removal of the fence by the defendant was shortly after the 7th of September, 1885, and under the plaintiff's direction. There was also evidence that the words "at the city's expense," in the resolution of the board of directors of the plaintiff, were written some time after the meeting at which the resolution was passed, although the board had intended it in the beginning to be placed in the resolution as passed. The findings of the court were to the effect that the plaintiff was not the owner of the land in fee, and had not been such owner since the 11th of September, 1885. That the defendant at the time of the beginning of this action was and now is the owner of the strip of land described in the complaint, for the purpose of using it as a public street, and of permitting the public to use it as such, subject to the condition subsequent that it shall revert to the plaintiff in fee simple as its property, and subject to the further condition and charge that, whenever graded for street purposes, the costs and expenses of such grading shall be paid by the defendant, and not by the plaintiff. That said strip of land has been duly dedicated as a public street of said city, and has been accepted as such by the city, subject to said conditions, and has been used as such by the public ever since the year 1885, and still is used as such street." The conclusions of law are that the defendant is entitled to judgment for its costs against the plaintiff, and to a decree declaring said strip of land to be a public street subject to the conditions set out in finding 2, and that defendant holds title thereto for the purpose of causing the same to be used as a public street, etc. The judgment follows in accordance.

The plaintiff contends that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings. It may be conceded that the deed of conveyance of the president of the cemetery was defective, and not authorized in some of its recitals, and that the defendant must depend for the right of possession and use of the land in question upon the language of the resolution of the board of directors, and the acceptance by the city of the land, and the use of it as a public highway, according to the offer of dedication contained in the resolution of the board of directors. And it may further be conceded, without deciding, that some of the findings are not supported by the evidence in some of their statements. Nevertheless we are of opinion that the evidence fully sustains the fourth and last finding as to dedication of the land for street purposes, and its acceptance as such; and that finding is perfectly intelligible when construed with reference to such statements in the other findings as are entirely consistent with those of the fourth finding and supported by evidence. It makes no difference, therefore, whether the defendant had or not any right to this land except to use it as a public street, and to observe the condition, when it conveniently can do so, of grading the same at its expense. It does not seem to us that the attempted rescission of the contract by plaintiff could be accomplished until the city had declared or made apparent the fact that it would not grade the street at its expense. The main idea in the resolution seemed to be to grant the land to the city for street purposes, and to make the city remove the fence, and when it graded the street to do it at its own expense, and not at that of the plaintiff. It does not seem to be contemplated, if the city did not grade it when required to do so by the plaintiff, that it forfeited its right to use the land as a public street; but, when it is apparent that the city will not grade it at its expense or at all, then the plaintiff might demand the land back. We perceive no error in the record, and advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

Joyce v. White. (No. 14,657.)

Assumpsit—Quantum Meruit—Entire Contract.

Where plaintiff contracted with defendant to do work and furnish materials, and defendant prevented his completion of the work, though the contract was entire, he may recover the value of the labor done and materials furnished and used.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Walter Van Dyke, Judge.

Action by Thomas F. Joyce against John E. White. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Jones & Carlton, for appellant. R. Dunnigan, for respondent.

Vanclief, C. The defendant having a contract with the superintendent of streets in the city of Los Angeles to construct a sewer, with manholes and flush tanks, through certain streets in that city, entered into a written contract with the plaintiff, by the terms of which the plaintiff agreed to construct all the manholes and flush tanks required in connection with the sewer, according to the specifications contained in defendant's contract with the superintendent of streets, at such time as the defendant might direct, so as not to delay the work of constructing the sewer; to furnish all the material therefor; to do the work subject to the inspection and directions of the superintendent of streets as to manner and materials, and to complete the work in such condition that it would be accepted by the superintendent of streets. The defendant agreed to pay per each manhole and flush tank $38.50, when the same should be accepted, and a sufficient amount collected from the property owners for that purpose. The plaintiff alleges in his complaint that, after constructing a certain number of manholes and flush tanks, according to the contract, and while he was proceeding to perform the contract on his part, the defendant wrongfully and without any justifiable cause prevented him from completing the same; and that the work done and materials furnished by him under the contract were reasonably worth $633.87, for which he prays judgment. The defendant admits the contract, and that plaintiff commenced the work, but denies that he prevented the plaintiff from proceeding with or from completing the work according to the contract; denies that the work done or materials furnished were of any value whatever; alleges, as a counterclaim, that plaintiff voluntarily abandoned the work, and failed and refused to perform his part of the contract, to the damage of the defendant in the sum of $1,000, for which he prays judgment. The case was tried by a jury, whose verdict was for plaintiff in the sum of $464.37, in accordance with which judgment was entered. The defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

Counsel for appellant contend that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict, in that it does not tend to prove that defendant prevented plaintiff from doing the work according to the contract. Upon this point the evidence is conflicting, but I think the evidence on the part of the plaintiff so clearly tends to prove the averments of the complaint in this respect that it is unnecessary to make a detailed statement of it here. Undoubtedly the contract is an entire contract; yet if, as alleged, the defendant, without justifiable cause, prevented the completion of the work, he was liable to plaintiff for the value of the labor done and materials furnished and used.

Four distinct instructions were given to the jury at request of plaintiff, and one at request of defendant. In respect to these, counsel for appellant merely say in their brief: "In view of the evidence the instructions of the court were clearly error." No particular error in the instructions is specified in the statement on motion for new trial, wherein it is merely said: "The court erred in giving to the jury instructions asked by plaintiff." If there is error in the instructions, counsel for appellant have failed to specify it sufficiently, either in their brief, or in their statement, to enable me to discover it. Read together, the instructions seem to have presented the case to the jury fairly. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

Action by Childs and others against Kincaid and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Dismissed.

Willis & Cole and E. E. Rowell, for appellants. Bicknell & White and S. M. White, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The judgment in this case was entered July 19, 1890, and the order denying a new trial was made and entered March 16, 1891. On the 21st of July, 1891, the defendants filed and thereafter served a notice of appeal from said judgment and order. The respondents now move to dismiss the appeals upon the ground that neither of them was taken within the time prescribed by law. As the appeal from the judgment was not taken within a year after its entry, and the appeal from the order denying a new trial was not taken until more than 60 days after its entry, the motions must be granted; and it is so ordered.

CUYAMACA GRANITE CO. v. PACIFIC PAV. CO. (No. 14,712.)

PARTNERSHIP—ACTION FOR ACCOUNTING—PARTIES—PLEADING.

1. Where two persons are partners with a certain company in a street-paving contract and in the profits arising therefrom, and an assignment is made by one only of the said persons to a third party of his interest, the other is still a necessary party to any complete determination of the partnership affairs, and should be brought in, therefore, under Code Civil Proc. § 389.

2. A complaint, in such a case, by the assignee, alleging that by the contract between the partners the company was to appoint a bookkeeper, who was to collect all moneys coming due, but that this had not been done, and that a large sum remained uncollected, without alleging that the company had failed to perform any of the conditions of the contract, or was neglecting or refusing to collect the unpaid money, or was insolvent, or that there was danger the money when collected would be misappropriated or lost, does not disclose a cause of action.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county.

Action by the Cuyamaca Granite Company against the Pacific Paving Company for an accounting, etc. There was a demurrer to the complaint, which was sustained, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Hunsaker, Britt & Goodrich, for appellant. Luce & McDonald, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. It is alleged in the complaint in this case that at all the times mentioned therein both the plaintiff and defendant were corporations, organized under the laws of this state; and that in 1889 A. Haskins and A. R. Schulenberg made and entered into a certain contract of copartnership with the defendant, a copy of which is set out, and marked "Exhibit A." This contract was to the effect that Haskins and Schulenberg would use their best endeavors to secure from the city of San Diego contracts for bituminous rock street pavements in that city, and, in the event of obtaining any such contracts, would immediately assign and transfer the same to the defendant; that, upon such contracts being secured and assigned, the work therein provided for should be done by Haskins and Schulenberg and the defendant as partners; that the defendant, at its own expense, would appoint a bookkeeper, who should keep all accounts, pay all bills, and collect all moneys belonging to the copartnership; and that the profits arising from the work should be equally divided, one half to Haskins and Schulenberg and the other half to the defendant. It is then alleged that, in pursuance of the terms of the said contract of copartnership, Schulenberg, on behalf of Haskins and himself, procured from the city of San Diego, in December, 1889, a contract for the paving and curbing of Sixth street in said city, and assigned the same to the defendant; that the work provided for was done as agreed, and was completed and accepted by the city on or about July 25, 1890, the said partnership being in effect thereby dissolved; that the total value of the work performed under the contract amounted to the sum of $51,680.72; that in January, 1891, Schulenberg assigned and transferred all his interest and claim in and to the said contract and the profits arising therefrom to the plaintiff; "that no settlement of the copartnership accounts has ever been made between plaintiff and defendant, nor between Haskins and Schulenberg and defendant, nor between said Haskins or said Schulenberg and defendant, though plaintiff has requested and demanded a final settlement of defendant with respect thereto, which defendant has refused, except on terms unjust and unfair to plaintiff, and not in accordance with said contract;" that plaintiff is informed and believes that upon a true and just settlement of said accounts a large sum of money, to wit, about $15,000, would be due from defendant to plaintiff; and that, according to plaintiff's information and belief, there is outstanding and due from various persons to said corpartnersip concern about $19,000; and that defendant, assuming that it has the sole and exclusive right to collect the outstanding claims at such times and in such manner as suits its convenience, and to postpone the settlement of the partnership accounts between it and plaintiff until said outstanding accounts are all collected, refuses to make any settlement with plaintiff, though requested so to do. And the prayer is for an accounting, for the appointment of a receiver to collect the outstanding demands, and for judgment etc. The defendant demurred to the complaint on the grounds: First, that there was a defect of parties plaintiff, in that A. Haskins was a necessary party to the complete determination of the several matters and things complained of; and, second, that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The court sustained the demurrer, and, the plaintiff declining to amend, gave judgment for the defendant, from which the plaintiff appeals.

1. It is clear, we think, that the demurrer was properly sustained upon the first ground specified therein. It appears that Haskins and Schulenberg were partners with defendant in the street-paving contract, and were jointly interested with defendant in the profits arising therefrom. The plaintiff, by the assignment, succeeded only to Schulenberg's interests in these profits, and was thereafter jointly interested in them with Haskins. No settlement of the partnership matters had ever been made between any of the parties. It is apparent, therefore, that no complete determination of the controversy could be had without the presence of Haskins. This being so, he was a necessary party, and should have been brought in. Section 389, Code Civil Proc.; Harrison v. McCormick, 69 Cal. 620, 621, 11 Pac. Rep. 456. If his consent to be joined as plaintiff could not be obtained, then he should have been made a defendant; the reason therefor being stated in the complaint. Section 382, Code Civil Proc.

2. We also think that the demurrer was properly sustained upon the second ground specified. It appears that it was expressly stipulated in the agreement made between Haskins and Schulenberg and the defendant that the defendant should appoint a bookkeeper who should collect all moneys becoming due under the contract with the city, and that the sum of about $19,000 remained uncollected when this action was commenced. It is not averred that the defendant had failed to perform any of the conditions of the agreement to be performed on its part, or that it was neglecting or refusing to collect the unpaid money, or that it was insolvent or likely to become so, or unable or unwilling to respond to any just claim or demand against it, or that there was any danger that the money, when collected by defendant, would be by it misappropriated, squandered, or lost. Under these circumstances, we fail to see how any right of action had arisen in favor of the plaintiff when this action was instituted. We advise, therefore, that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; HAYNES, C.

INSTRUCTIONS—ERRORS CURED.

Where several instructions, taken together, are correct, the fact that two of them are indefinite on a certain point, and so misleading, is not cause for reversal.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. A. GREGG, Judge.

Action by J. R. Doty against E. F. O'Neil. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Graves & Graves, for appellant. W. B. Dillard and Wilcoxon & Bouldin, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to recover the possession of personal property or the value thereof. Trial by jury. Verdict and judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. The property consists of live stock—principally dairy cows—which plaintiff claims to have purchased from his father, B. F. Doty. The defendant, as sheriff of San Luis Obispo county, took the property by virtue of an execution against B. F. Doty, and his defense to the action is that the property in question was the property of B. F. Doty, and subject to the execution by virtue of which he took it.

1. Counsel for appellant claim that the evidence was insufficient to prove that the sale of the property from B. F. Doty to the plaintiff was accompanied by an immediate delivery, or followed by an actual and continued change of possession; and that it was therefore void, as against the creditors of B. F. Doty. The only evidence as to immediate delivery and change of possession is the testimony of plaintiff and B. F. Doty; and their testimony not only tends to prove, but, if true, is sufficient to prove, an immediate delivery, followed by an actual and continued change of possession. Nor is there anything in the nature of their testimony, or in the circumstances disclosed, tending to discredit these witnesses.

2. The second and fourth instructions given to the jury at the request of plaintiff are as follows: "Second. Every transfer of personal property, if made by the person having possession or control of the property, must be accompanied by an immediate delivery, and followed by an actual and continued change of possession of the thing transferred, or the transfer is conclusively presumed to be fraudulent and void against those who are his creditors while he remains in possession. But a change in location of the property intended to be transferred is not in all cases essential to constitute a valid transfer. In all cases due regard must be had to the character of the property, the nature of the transaction, the position of the parties, and the intended use of the property. And if you find from the evidence that there was an immediate delivery of the actual possession and control of all the property described in the bill of sale from B. F. Doty to plaintiff, at the date thereof, and that such delivery was followed by an actual and continued change of possession and control in plaintiff from that time to the taking by defendant, you will be justified in finding that there was a proper delivery under said bill of sale." "Fourth. In determining what it takes to constitute a delivery and change of possession of personal property upon a sale of it, the jury should take into consideration the character of the property, and the situation of the parties at the time of the sale; and in this case, if the jury find from the evidence that the plaintiff purchased the property in good faith, and for a valuable consideration, before the execution introduced in evidence was levied upon the property; that plaintiff had done everything which could have reasonably been done under the circumstances, by the way of taking possession of the property under the sale to him, then the property would not be liable to be taken on execution, unless you should find from the evidence that the sale was not accompanied by immediate delivery, followed by an actual and continued change of possession of the property sold, the rule of law requiring the change of possession of personal property upon the sale of it, in order that the sale be not fraudulent as against creditors, only requires such a change of possession as the articles sold will conveniently and reasonably admit of." Counsel for appellant contend that these instructions are erroneous, in that they tended to mislead the jury "to infer that constructive possession would answer the purpose." At request of defendant, the court further instructed the jury as follows: "Every transfer of personal property, and every lien thereon, other than a mortgage when allowed by law, is conclusively presumed, if made by a person having at the time the possession or control of the property, and not accompanied by an immediate delivery and followed by an actual and continued change of possession of the thing transferred, to be fraudulent, and therefore void against those who are his creditors while he remains in possession, and the successors in interest of such creditors. The word 'actual' means existing in fact, and truly and absolutely so; really acted or acting; carried out; opposed to 'potential,' 'possible,' 'virtual,' or 'theoretical.' If you find from the evidence that at the time of the transfer by B. F. Doty to the plaintiff of the property described in the complaint, the said B. F. Doty was in the actual and exclusive possession of the tract of land from which the said property was taken by the sheriff, and had been so in possession for a long time prior thereto, and that the said transfer took place upon the said tract of land, you must find for the defendant, unless you should find that the possession of the land changed with the personal property sold and delivered as I have instructed you. Neither the fact of the payment of a valuable consideration by plaintiff to B. F. Doty for the property in controversy, nor that said sale was honest, is of any consequence. If you still believe that said sale from B. F. Doty, to J. R. Doty the plaintiff, was not accompanied by an immediate delivery, and an actual and continued change of possession, you should find for the defendant." Taken together, these instructions seem to preclude any inference by the jury that merely constructive possession would be sufficient. If the two instructions objected to were not sufficiently definite as to the nature of the possession required, those given at request of defendant supplied the defect. The instructions given at request of plaintiff are not inconsistent with those given at request of defendant. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

VANCLIEF, C. This is an action to quiet the alleged title of plaintiff to lots numbered 7, 8, and 9, in block 42, of the town of Ontario, in the county of San Bernardino. The cause was tried by the court, and the judgment was in favor of plaintiff for lots 8 and 9, and in favor of defendant for lot numbered 7. Each party moved for a new trial upon a distinct bill of exceptions. Both motions were denied, and each party has appealed; the defendant from the judgment against him as to lots 8 and 9, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial, and the plaintiff from the judgment against her as to lot 7, and from the order denying her motion for a new trial. Both appeals are brought upon the same transcript.

1. Upon the appeal of defendant it will be necessary to consider only one question, viz., did the defendant serve his notice of intention to move for a new trial within the time prescribed by section 659 of the Code of Civil Procedure? The decision of the court was rendered on December 27, 1890. Written notice of defendant's intention to move for a new trial was not served until January 24, 1891, when defendant's attorneys admitted the service, but expressly reserved and saved their right to object to the notice on the ground that it was too late. Section 659, Code Civil Proc., requires the notice of intention to move for a new trial to be served upon the adverse party "within ten days * * * after notice of the decision of the court," and respondent (on this appeal) contends (1) that appellant had actual notice of the decision of the court on December 29, 1890, and then so acted upon such actual notice as to waive formal written notice; and (2) that respondent served written notice of the decision upon appellant's attorneys on January 6, 1891. The first of these contentions is grounded upon the following facts of record: "On the 29th day of December, 1890, [two days after the decision,] counsel for defendant and counsel for plaintiff, upon notification by counsel for defendant, and defendant in person, made argument in open court, before said judge, upon the apportionment of the costs of said trial under the decision of the court; and, said judge announcing thereafter that each party should pay its own costs of trial, it was then suggested and consented by the respective parties, that the said judge might insert in the conclusions of law in said case that each party should pay his own costs." The ground of the second contention, viz., that written notice of the decision was served on January 6, 1891, is that on that day respondent served on the attorneys for defendant her written notice of intention to move for a new trial, which, among other things, stated: "The defendant will take notice that the plaintiff intends to move the court to set aside and vacate the decision and judgment heretofore rendered and entered herein, and to grant a new trial in this case upon the following grounds: "First. Insufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings and decision," etc. Service, by copy, of this notice on January 6, 1891, was admitted by defendant's attorneys. As to whether the actual notice to defendant of the decision of the court, and his action upon that notice, on December 29th, constituted a waiver of formal written notice of the decision, the cases seem not quite harmonious. See Biagi v. Howes, 66 Cal. 469, 6 Pac. Rep. 100; Gray v. Winder, 77 Cal. 527, 20 Pac. Rep. 47; San Fernando F. H. A. v. Porter, 58 Cal. 81; Barron v. Deleval, Id. 95; Mullally v. Benevolent Soc., 69 Cal. 559, 11 Pac. Rep. 215; Dow v. Ross, 90 Cal. 562, 27 Pac. Rep. 409. Perhaps they may be so reconciled as to sustain the position of respondent; but it is unnecessary to decide this question, since I think that, under the circumstances, plaintiff's notice of intention to move for a new trial, served on defendant January 6th, contained a sufficient notice in writing that a decision of the court had theretofore been rendered in this case, although that notice also stated that plaintiff intended to move for a new trial. The notice contained the title of the cause, and the language is, "the decision and judgment heretofore rendered and entered herein," which means the decision which was heretofore rendered herein, and must have been so understood. The Code requires no particular form of notice. Nor does it require notice of what the decision was. Simple notice in writing that a decision has been rendered is all that is required. Such notice was served on defendant on January 6, 1891, yet defendant did not give notice of his intention to move for a new trial until the 24th day of that month. No point is made on defendant's appeal from the judgment.

2. On the appeal by the plaintiff from the judgment as to lot 7 no point is made; but on her appeal from the order denying her motion for a new trial her counsel contend that the finding by the court to the effect that lot 7 was conveyed to her by her husband without consideration, and for the purpose of delaying and defrauding his creditors, is not justified by the evidence. But after a careful examination I think the evidence on the part of the defendant has a substantial tendency to prove the findings in question. I think the entire judgment and both orders appealed from should be affirmed.

Per Curiam. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and orders appealed from are affirmed.

Townsend v. Tufts et al. (No. 14,619.)

Land Contract—Rescission—What is.

A complaint, in an action by the vendee named in a land contract against the vendor to recover the amount paid thereon, which fails to show payment or tender of the deferred installments and demand of conveyance, or refusal or inability of defendant to convey, is bad on demurrer; the mere failure of defendant to tender conveyance and demand payment on the day named not being sufficient to operate as a rescission of the contract. Drew v. Pedlar, 25 Pac. Rep. 749, 87 Cal. 443, and White v. Buell, 27 Pac. Rep. 19, 90 Cal. 177, distinguished.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; William P. Wade, Judge.

Action for money had and received by Frank N. Townsend against J. Q. Tufts and A. B. Cass. Defendants had judgment on demurrer, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Jones & Carlton and R. L. Horton, for appellant. Albert M. Stephens, for respondents.

Haynes, C. Defendants demurred to the complaint, the demurrer was sustained, and, the plaintiff having declined to amend, judgment passed for defendants, from which judgment the plaintiff appeals. The facts alleged in the complaint are that on March 6, 1888, the defendants entered into a contract with one Parkovitch, whereby they agreed to sell, and said Parkovitch agreed to buy, a certain parcel of land for the sum of $2,400, of which sum one third was paid down, and the remaining two thirds was agreed to be paid down in two equal annual payments, the last of which fell due March 6, 1890; "at which time, [the complaint alleges,] by the terms of said agreement, defendants were to execute and deliver to said Parkovitch or his assigns a good and sufficient deed of grant, bargain, and sale, conveying to him or his assigns the title to said land." The complaint further alleges that time was made the essence of the contract by express terms; that on March 28, 1889, Parkovitch assigned said contract, and all sums of money paid thereon, to the plaintiff, of all which defendants had notice; that at the maturity of the contract defendants failed and refused, and ever since have failed and refused, to convey; that neither plaintiff nor Parkovitch have ever been in possession, (the lands being vacant and unoccupied,) and that defendants have not paid to plaintiff any part of the $800 so received by them. The complaint contains no allegation of the payment, nor of any tender or offer to pay either of the deferred payments, nor of any demand for a deed of conveyance, nor of any inability to convey, nor of any rescission, mutual or otherwise, of the contract, unless the failure of the defendants to make and tender a deed to the plaintiff on the 6th day of March, 1890, (that being the day specified in the contract for the payment of the last installment of the purchase money and for the conveyance of the land,) should be held to operate as a rescission or termination of the contract; and this is the sole ground upon which appellant seeks to reverse the judgment. The appellant contends that by the failure of defendants to tender a deed on that day the contract ceased to exist, and that thereupon he became entitled to recover back the money paid, and cites Cleary v. Folger, 84 Cal. 316, 24 Pac. Rep. 280; Drew v. Pedlar, 87 Cal. 443, 25 Pac. Rep. 749; and White v. Buell, 90 Cal. 177, 27 Pac. Rep. 19. The last two cases cited are clearly distinguishable from the case under consideration. In Drew v. Pedlar the plaintiff paid $1,000 upon the execution of the agreement, but failed to pay the $7,500 when the same became due, and never offered to pay the same until about 10 months after maturity, when he tendered full payment, and demanded a deed for the land. The defendants then refused to accept payment or to execute a deed, and also refused to refund the $1,000 paid, and elected to rescind the agreement. Thereupon the plaintiff brought suit to recover the $1,000, and alleged in his complaint the facts above stated, as well as a portion of the contract which provided that upon his failure to make the deferred payment the defendants should be released from all obligation to convey, and all money paid thereon should be as liquidated damages for plaintiff's nonfulfillment of the contract. Under these circumstances this court held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the $1,000 paid by him, less such actual damages as the defendants might have sustained by plaintiff's breach of the contract, if such damages had been pleaded, following, in this respect, Cleary v. Folger. In Drew v. Pedlar, it must be observed there was a tender by the plaintiff, a demand for a deed, and an express rescission of the contract by the defendant, as was his right under the terms of the contract, and that the plaintiff acquiesced in the rescission by bringing his suit. In the case at bar, however, there was no tender of payment or demand for a deed; and hence the defendants were not called upon to elect whether they would insist upon performance, as they might have done under the authority of Wilcoxson v. Stitt, 65 Cal. 596, 4 Pac. Rep. 629; Smith v. Mohn, 87 Cal. 489, 25 Pac. Rep. 696; and Banbury v. Arnold, 91 Cal. 606, 27 Pac. Rep. 934; and, that being true, the mere neglect of both parties to perform the contract on the day fixed for its performance could not, without anything more, operate as a rescission. The complaint, it is true, alleges that defendants "failed and refused" to execute to plaintiff a deed; but in the absence of an allegation of tender of the purchase money and demand for a deed, this allegation must be read in the light of the terms of the contract, which does not make the execution and delivery of the deed a condition precedent to the payment of the last installment of the purchase money, but does fix the time for the execution of the deed at the time fixed for such final payment. Under the well-settled authorities, the plaintiff, under the terms of this contract, must have tendered performance and alleged such tender to enable him to maintain his action, unless he could excuse his failure to make the tender by alleging his ability and readiness to pay, and that the tender was not made because of defendants' refusal to perform on their part. Besides, in the absence of an allegation that the first deferred payment had been made, the plaintiff having specified and seeking to recover only the payment made at the date of the contract, the complaint shows a breach of the contract on his part a full year before defendants were required to convey. In White v. Buell, 90 Cal. 177, 27 Pac. Rep. 19, cited by counsel, the purchaser had the right, under the contract, to terminate it by forfeiting the first payment of $1,000, his failure to pay either the first or second deferred payments operating, by the express terms of the contract, as a termination of it; the penalty therefor being the forfeiture of the payment made at the date of the contract only, and not of the subsequent payment which he was permitted to recover back. Cleary v. Folger, 84 Cal. 316, 24 Pac. Rep. 280, also cited by counsel for appellant, has been overruled, upon the point to which it is cited, in Newton v. Hull, 90 Cal. 487, 27 Pac. Rep. 429. The complaint contains four counts or causes of action, each upon a separate contract; but as all are stated in the same terms, and allege the same facts, it is not necessary to notice them further. For the reasons above given we advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: Vanclief, C.; Belcher, C.

Per Curiam. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

Smith v. Whittier et al. (Nos. 13,833, 14,453.)

Stipulations between Attorneys—Negligence—Falling of Elevator—New Trial—Offer of Compromise—Damages.

1. The fact that an agreement, made by attorneys in a certain action, to allow the stenographic notes of the testimony of a witness in a previous action, brought by another plaintiff against the same defendant, in which they were also attorneys, to be used in evidence, without again calling the witness, is not filed with the clerk until after the substitution of another attorney for one of the parties, does not, after the death of the witness, bring the case within Code Civil Proc. § 283, which declares that an attorney may bind his client by an agreement so filed, "and not otherwise," but the provision quoted has reference merely to agreements which are executory.

2. In an action for personal injuries sustained by a passenger in the falling of an elevator, evidence of advice given by one who put the elevator into place, as to how it should be handled or used, and what the effect would be if such directions were disregarded, is admissible for the purpose of showing that defendant had knowledge of what would constitute negligence.

3. Where, on a motion for a new trial, it appears that a party had prepared affidavits, but inadvertently omitted to file them within the prescribed time, the court may disregard such error or defect under Code Civil Proc. § 475, as one not affecting any substantial right, and allow them to be filed after the prescribed time.

4. A statement made by one of several defendants to his codefendants, advocating the settlement of plaintiff's claim, is not within the rule excluding offers made for the purpose of compromise, but is competent as an admission of liability. De Haven, J., dissenting.

5. A verdict for $30,000, recovered in an action brought for personal injuries occasioned by the fall of an elevator, will not be set aside as excessive where it appears that plaintiff was a man 36 years of age, in good health, and engaged in an extensive business requiring great physical activity, and that he was so affected by several bad fractures, concussion of the spine producing permanent partial paralysis, and other serious injuries, as to render him scarcely able to walk, and prevent him ever after from resuming his business, or engaging in any other active pursuit.

Action by George J. Smith against W. F. Whittier and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

D. M. Delmas, for appellants. Lloyd, Newlands & Wood and Garber & Bishop, for respondent.

Harrison, J. Action to recover damages for personal injuries, caused by the falling of an elevator. The facts out of which the cause of action arose are the same as those which were presented in the case of Treadwell against the same defendants, reported in 80 Cal. 624, 22 Pac. Rep. 266; the plaintiff and Treadwell having both been passengers on the elevator at the time of the accident. A verdict was rendered in favor of the plaintiff for $30,000, and from the judgment entered thereon, and also from the order of the court denying a new trial, the defendants have appealed to this court.

1. The Case of Treadwell was tried in April, 1883, and a verdict rendered in favor of the plaintiff. While that cause was pending in the superior court on a motion for a new trial, the attorneys for the parties to the present action, who were also the attorneys for the respective parties in the Treadwell Case, entered into the following stipulation: "Stipulated that the testimony of D. A. Bangs, as given and taken down by the phonographic reporter on the trial of the case of John Treadwell vs. Said Defendants, W. F. Whittier et al., when written out in longhand, and certified as correct by said reporter, may be read and used in the trial, or in any proceedings in the said case of George J. Smith vs. W. F. Whittier et al., with like force and effect as if said Bangs was on the stand and testifying in open court, subject only to such objections or exceptions as might be made if said Bangs was testifying in open court in said last-named cause, and also subject to the right of defendants' attorneys to contradict or impeach said Bangs on any matter testified to by him, without first calling his attention thereto, or making preliminary proof as to such contradictory matter. San Francisco, Nov. 1, 1884. McAllister & Bergin, Attorneys for Defendants. Lloyd & Wood, Attorneys for Plaintiff." Before the trial of the present case the witness Bangs left the state and died; and on the second day of the trial the plaintiff offered to read his testimony in the former case, under the foregoing stipulation. To this the defendants objected, upon the ground that the stipulation had not been filed with the clerk until after McAllister & Bergin had ceased to be the attorneys for the defendants, and therefore was not binding upon the defendants. Mr. Delmas had become the attorney for the defendants in place of McAllister & Bergin prior to the commencement of the trial, but his substitution as such attorney was not made a matter of record until after the trial had begun; and on the same day, about two hours after the filing of the order of substitution, the plaintiff caused the foregoing stipulation to be filed with the clerk.

Section 283, Code Civil Proc., provides: "An attorney and counselor shall have authority (1) to bind his client in any of the steps of an action or proceeding by his agreement, filed with the clerk, or entered upon the minutes of the court, and not otherwise." The evident object of this section is that, whenever the attorney shall enter into an agreement for the purpose of binding his client, there shall be such a record thereof as will preclude any question concerning its character or effect, and that the extent of the agreement may be ascertained by the record, if oral, that it shall be entered in the minutes, and, if written, that it shall be filed with the clerk. "It is not intended to enlarge or abridge the authority of the attorney, but only to prescribe the manner of its exercise." Preston v. Hill, 50 Cal. 53. The section does not require a construction that in no instance shall an agreement which the attorney may make in behalf of his client be binding unless entered in the minutes of the court or filed with the clerk. Its provisions have reference to executory agreements, and not to those which have been wholly or in part executed, and it was with reference to oral agreements of this character that the court said in its opinion in Borkheim v. Insurance Co., 38 Cal. 628: "Of such agreements, therefore, there can be no specific performance." If under the terms of a mutual stipulation, which was only verbal, one party has received the advantage for which he entered into it, or the other party has at his instance given up some right, or lost some advantage, so that it would be inequitable for him to insist that the stipulation was invalid, he will not be permitted to repudiate the obligation of his own agreement upon the ground that it had not been entered in the minutes of the court. Himmelman v. Sullivan, 40 Cal. 125; Hawes v. Clark, 84 Cal. 272, 24 Pac. Rep. 116; People v. Stephens, 52 N. Y. 306. If the party admits that he made such verbal stipulation, it will be as binding upon him as if it had been entered in the minutes of the court. Patterson v. Ely, 19 Cal. 36; Reese v. Mahoney, 21 Cal. 306. If, however, the terms of the verbal agreement are disputed, courts refuse to settle such disputes, or to try a collateral issue for the purpose of determining whether any agreement had been made In Patterson v. Ely the verbal agreement was not entered of record until after the trial had begun, and in Hawes v. Clark, although the minutes contained no record of the agreement, the court nevertheless enforced it, notwithstanding the objection upon that ground. The same principles are applicable to the enforcement of a written agreement which has not been filed as to a verbal one which has not been entered in the minutes of the court. If the parties have acted upon such written agreement to such an extent that it would be inequitable not to recognize its binding effect, as, for example, if a party has obtained under the agreement that in consideration of which the other became bound thereby, or has been relieved of some burden which was the consideration for which it was given, or if the other party has been reasonably led thereby to forego any step which but for the agreement he would have taken, courts will not allow the agreement to be repudiated upon the ground that it had not been filed with the clerk.

The stipulation in the present case was one which was within the authority of McAllister & Bergin, as attorneys for the defendants, to make. It pertained to the conduct of the suit for which they had been employed, and, when made, was binding upon the defendants, and remained binding upon them until they should be relieved therefrom. They were not relieved from the obligation created by it by the mere fact that Mr. Delmas had been substituted as their attorney in the place of McAllister & Bergin. An attorney who is substituted for another in a cause has no greater rights than his predecessor, nor is his client's position in the case in any way changed by such substitution. He steps into the place of his predecessor, and stands, with reference to the case, and to the other party, precisely as did his predecessor, and can repudiate or be relieved from an agreement that had been made by him only to the same extent and in the same manner as could his predecessor. The natural effect of this agreement was to induce the plaintiff to forego the taking of the deposition of Bangs; and the agreement itself, in the absence of any showing in reference thereto, may, from its terms, be regarded as having been entered into for the mutual benefit and convenience of both parties, inasmuch as Bangs had been fully examined and cross-examined in the trial of the Treadwell Case by the same attorneys for the respective parties, and each was by this agreement relieved of the labor and time that would have been required in taking his deposition for the purpose of re-examining him upon the same subject. It was not necessary that the agreement should have been filed by the plaintiff immediately upon its execution, under the penalty of not being able to avail himself of it. Its execution by McAllister & Bergin was a continuing consent on their part that it might be filed at any time thereafter, unless they should in some direct and express mode signify their withdrawal of such consent; and upon the death of Bangs before such consent was withdrawn the position of the plaintiff in reference to having his testimony for use at the trial of the present case became so changed that thereafter the agreement could not have been revoked, or the consent of the attorneys to its filing withdrawn. When it was afterwards filed, the effect of such filing operated and became binding upon the defendants as from its date.

2. At the trial the defendant Ravekes was called as a witness on behalf of the plaintiff, and was asked whether he had received any directions from those who put the elevator in the building as to how it should be handled or used, and whether anything was said as to what the effect would be if he did not carry out those instructions; and answered that he had received from them instructions to start slowly at first, and always, when reaching either floor at which to leave the elevator, to decrease the speed by shutting off the water, and never allow the elevator to stop of its own accord; that otherwise the effect would be to break a portion of the machinery in the basement. These questions were objected to by the defendants upon the ground that they were "irrelevant and immaterial," and the overruling of their objection is assigned as error. The argument of the appellants upon this assignment is, however, mainly upon the ground that the evidence was incompetent, for the reason that it was hearsay. The evidence given by the witness in answer to the questions was both relevant and material. The main issue between the parties to the action was whether the defendants had been negligent in the mode in which they had run the elevator at the time of the accident, and upon that issue the plaintiff had the right to introduce any competent evidence that would tend to establish such negligence. Negligence is opposed to diligence or carefulness, and is never absolute or intrinsic, but is always relative to some circumstance of time, place, or person. The definition which is most frequently given is that formulated by Baron ALDERSON in Blyth v. Water Works Co., 11 Exch. 784, as "the omission to do something which a reasonable man, guided upon those considerations which ordinarily regulate the conduct of human affairs, would do, or doing something which a prudent and reasonable man would not do." "It must be determined in all cases by reference to the situation and knowledge of the parties, and all the attendant circumstances What would be extreme care under one condition of knowledge and one state of circumstances would be gross negligence with different knowledge and in changed circumstances." Nitro-glycerine Case, 15 Wall. 536. The Civil Code, § 1714, makes every one responsible "for an injury occasioned to another by his want of ordinary care or skill in the management of his property;" and "ordinary care" is that which every person of ordinary prudence takes of his own concerns, or would employ under similar circumstances. In Hoffman v. Water Co., 10 Cal. 413, the test is stated to be "what discreet and prudent men should do, or ordinarily do, in such cases, where their own interests are to be affected, and all the risk their own."

As negligence is the violation or disregard of some duty or obligation which one owes to another, it is evident that a knowledge of the facts out of which the duty springs is an essential element in determining whether there has been any negligence. In certain relations such knowledge is conclusively presumed, while in others it devolves upon the party charging the negligence to show that the knowledge existed. Especially is such knowledge an element in determining the care to be exercised in the use of some mechanical or natural agency whose superior force demands skill in its management to prevent its getting beyond ordinary control. The amount of care requisite in such a case depends upon the extent to which the knowledge goes. The mode in which an appliance involving such agency is to be used is as material as the manner in which it is constructed, and, if one mode of its use is free from danger and another not, it is relevant and material to show whether the defendant knew how to use that mode which was free from danger, since his knowledge of the proper mode, and his failure to exercise it, would be evidence of negligence. "Facts which were known to him, or by the use of proper diligence would have been known to a prudent man in his place, come into account as part of the circumstances." Pol. Torts, 356. In the case of Hoffman v. Water Co., supra, it was held that the knowledge of the defendants respecting the character of the ground upon which the dam was constructed was an element to be considered in determining whether they had been guilty of negligence in constructing it; and the Nitro-glycerine Case went upon the proposition that the defendants were ignorant of the proper mode of handling the article. The negligence of the master in the retention of an incompetent servant, or in the use of defective machinery, is frequently shown by evidence that he had been informed of previous negligent acts on the part of the servant, or of the defects in the machinery. Malone v. Hawley, 46 Cal. 409. The negligence of the servant, or the defects in the machinery, must still be shown in the particular case; but the presumption that the master had fulfilled his obligation to select competent servants, or provide suitable machinery, is overcome by proof that such information had been communicated to him. Whenever the knowledge or information of the party charged to have been negligent is a factor in determining such question, it is proper, for the purpose of showing such knowledge or information, to show that notice was given to him, and that he was informed of the facts which would constitute negligence, and there is no better mode of showing this than by the evidence of the party himself that he had received the information. Whether, in fact, such information was or was not correct, is immaterial for the purpose of determining its admissibility, and hence it is no objection to its admission that it was not given under the sanction of an oath, or that the opposite party had no opportunity of cross-examining the informant. The truth of the information is a distinct issue, and must be established by competent evidence; but upon the theory that the information was correct the plaintiff in the present instance had the right to show that the defendants had received such information, and thus obviate any claim that might be made by them that they had exonerated themselves from liability by procuring the elevator to be constructed by a competent and reputable manufacturer.

The evidence thus introduced was not, moreover, within the rule which excludes hearsay. Hearsay is a species of derivative evidence which is offered for the purpose of establishing some specific fact in a case, and rests on the veracity and competency of some other person than the witness. Such testimony is excluded whenever it appears that a higher degree of evidence of that fact can be obtained by the production of the person from whom the evidence offered was derived; but whenever the testimony of such person is of no higher degree in establishing the fact to be shown than the evidence offered, either is original and primary evidence of that fact. If the fact sought to be established is that certain words were spoken, without reference to the truth or falsity of the words,—as, for instance, that a certain statement was made by a party to the action as an admission of a fact, or was made to him as a notice, or under such circumstances as to require action or reply from him,—the testimony of any person who heard the statement is original evidence, and not hearsay. Whart. Ev. § 254; Greenl. Ev. § 100; People v. McCrae, 32 Cal. 98; People v. Estrado, 49 Cal. 171. Such evidence is admitted for the purpose of establishing merely the utterance of the words, and not their truth; but the admission in evidence of the words spoken is not to be used in determining the issue of their truth. Necessarily the words so spoken are brought before the jury, but the jury can readily be instructed by the court that they are not to regard them as proof of the facts that are stated. People v. Estrado, 49 Cal. 173. "It sometimes happens that a declaration is evidence for a particular purpose, although it is not to be taken as evidence to prove the truth of the facts declared; for the rule seems to be that, if the declaration be evidence as a circumstance in the action for any purpose, it is to be received; and the jury are to be directed not to consider it for other purposes for which abstractly it could not have been received." Starkie, Ev. 89. Upon these principles, when Ravekes was told in what way the elevator should be run, and what would be the consequence of running it otherwise, the receiving of that instruction became a distinct fact in the case, and could be shown by any one who heard it. His own admission, whether upon the record or as a witness at the trial, that such instruction was given him, obviated the proof by any other witness, but cannot be considered as hearsay. "As matter of evidence and practice, proof of actual knowledge may be of great importance. If danger of a well-understood kind has, in fact, been expressly brought to the defendant's notice as the result of his conduct, and the express warning has been disregarded or rejected, it is above hearsay, and more convincing to prove this than to show in a general way what a prudent man in the defendant's place ought to have known." Pol. Torts, 356.

3. The court did not err in allowing the plaintiff to read certain counter affidavits upon a motion for a new trial. Spottiswood v. Weir, 80 Cal. 451, 22 Pac. Rep. 289. One of the grounds of the motion was the misconduct of the jury, and in support of this ground the defendant had filed and served certain affidavits to the effect that one of the jurymen had made inquiries about the workings of an elevator outside of the court room. Within five days after these affidavits had been filed the plaintiff caused certain affidavits which were directly responsive to them to be prepared, but they were not filed until more than ten days thereafter. Upon affidavits on the part of the plaintiff showing these facts, together with an affidavit for the purpose of showing that it was by reason of the inadvertence and excusable neglect of his attorneys that they had not been filed, the court allowed them to be filed and read. This ground of the motion for a new trial, as well as the subject-matter of the affidavits, made it essentially proper that the court should allow the plaintiff an opportunity to reply to these affidavits, if it was within its power to do so; and matters presented in support of a claim of inadvertence and excusable neglect are so greatly within the discretion of the court to which they are addressed that, unless there should appear to be an abuse of that discretion, we would not interfere with its action. The defendants were not entitled to a new trial upon this ground, unless the facts upon which it was based existed, and the time within which the plaintiff might controvert such affidavits is not made by the statute jurisdictional, or declared to be a limitation upon the exercise of such right. It is only a rule of procedure, and, in the absence of statutory limitation, is subject to the equitable control of the court; and the court should disregard any error or defect in the proceedings whenever a substantial right of a party is not affected. Code Civil Proc. § 475. Rules of procedure, whether statutory or made by the court, are intended to facilitate courts in doing justice between the parties. They are framed with a view to enable litigants to properly present their cause for determination; and courts, in the exercise of their supervisory care over them, should be inclined to take that course which will enable them to ascertain the actual facts in a cause. For the guidance of parties certain formalities are required, and certain times specified within which the several steps are to be taken, but, except in matters which are jurisdictional, these provisions are intended for the convenience of courts and litigants, and should be liberally construed.

4. Upon the cross-examination of the defendant Ravekes the defendants endeavored to show that he had taken no part in the defense of the present action; and upon his redirect examination, he was asked whether he had not advocated with his firm a settlement of the case, to which the defendants objected upon the ground that it was "incompetent and irrelevant," but did not specify the grounds upon which they claimed it to be incompetent. The court overruled their objection, and it is now contended by them that in this ruling the court violated the rule which precludes a party from giving evidence relative to offers for a compromise, which have been rejected. In the present case, however, there was no treaty for a compromise depending between the parties, and the testimony introduced did not relate to the offer of any terms of compromise, or to any dealing with the adverse party upon the subject of a compromise; and the rule which excludes offers made for the purpose of settlement is inapplicable. The statement of a party against whom a claim is made that he is willing to settle the claim is a declaration by him against his interest, sometimes called a "self-disserving" or "self-harming" statement; and section 1870 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that upon the trial of a cause evidence may be given of "(2) the act, declaration, or omission of a party, as evidence against such party." Such declarations are classed in books on evidence under the head of "Admission." Mr. Stephen, in his treatise on Evidence, defines an admission to be "a statement, oral or written, suggesting any inference as to any fact in issue, or relevant, or deemed to be relevant, to any such fact, made by or on behalf of any party to any proceeding." Within this definition the testimony sought from the witness Ravekes was admissible. Such a declaration, in the absence of any other evidence than that he made it, would justify a jury in drawing the inference that he considered himself liable for the claim, since ordinarily men are willing to settle only those claims for which they are liable, and consequently the statement is admissible upon the same principles as would be his direct statement that he was liable for the claim. The making of such admission is a fact which is relevant to the issue upon his liability. Proof of making the admission is not, however, proof of the fact of his liability, but is only evidence in support of proving that fact; and the weight of such evidence, as well as its sufficiency for authorizing such inference, must be determined by the jury. The declaration may have so little weight in itself that the jury would not regard it as entitled to any consideration; and the party making the declaration may countervail its entire weight and sufficiency by showing the circumstances under which it was made, or the purpose for which he made it, as, for example, that he made it under a misapprehension of the facts, or with a view to a speedy determination of the controversy, or out of a charitable regard for the claimant; but the declaration itself is admissible upon the ground that the facts implied therein are relevant to the issue in the case. Admissions are generally regarded as weak evidence for the proof of a fact, and are never conclusive of the fact stated, or of the inference to be drawn therefrom, and our statute requires the jury to be instructed on all proper occasions "that the evidence of the oral admissions of a party ought to be viewed with caution." Code Civil Proc. § 2061. (4) An exception to the admissibility of such admissions exists when they are made by way of an offer to buy peace, or with reference to negotiations with the adverse party for a compromise of the dispute. Under such circumstances, except as they are admissions of distinct facts, they are regarded as hypothetical admissions from which it is not proper to draw any inference of liability, and therefore are not to be received in evidence. The rule, however, which excludes offers made for the purpose of a compromise, does not apply to statements made by a party which are in no wise connected with any attempt at a compromise, whether these statements are made to a stranger or to his codefendant. West v. Smith, 101 U. S. 273; Ashlock v. Linder, 50 Ill. 169; Marvin v. Richmond, 3 Denio, 58; Molyneaux v. Collier, 13 Ga. 415; McLendon v. Shackelford, 32 Ga. 474; Clapp v. Foster, 34 Vt. 580; Gulzoni v. Tyler, 64 Cal. 334; Greenl. Ev. § 192; 1 Phil. Ev. (Cow. & H. notes) note 124; Whart. Ev. §§ 1077, 1090. The question asked of the witness Ravekes concerning the statements of Smith when he came up in the elevator was so clearly connected with the accident as to be relevant to the issue between the parties, and the reply was of such a nature that the defendants could not have been prejudiced thereby.

5. We cannot hold that the damages were so excessive as to appear to have been given by reason of any passion or prejudice on the part of the jury. The plaintiff, at the time of the accident, in 1878, was 36 years of age, in good health, and engaged in an extensive business, which required great physical activity. The elevator fell with him from the upper floor of the building to the basement, a distance of from 40 to 45 feet, and by the fall he was so injured as to prevent him from continuing his business, and to disable him from engaging in any active occupation. It is unnecessary to recount in detail all the various injuries which he received, or the sufferings which he endured during the time that he was under the care of the surgeon. He was confined to his bed for nearly a year, and it was three years before he could walk the distance of a block. When he was first carried to his house his limbs were completely paralyzed, his right leg broken with a comminuted fracture, and the bones of the shin protruding from his flesh and clothes, the bones of one ankle broken, and the arch of his foot so injured as to destroy the joint and deprive him of all control of the foot. His spinal column received such concussion as to produce a partial permanent paralysis in his legs. At the time of the trial, 10 years after the injury, it was shown by the testimony of the surgeons who then examined him that his right leg had only one fourth of its original vigor, and but little power of motion, and that his other leg was atrophied by reason of the injury to his spinal column, and that he would never recover any further use of his limbs; and, also, that as he grew older he would be likely to lose their use entirely. In addition to this, he received serious injury to his bladder, which remained paralyzed for many months, and caused him to suffer greatly; and also to the rectum, from which he had not become free at the time of the trial. The jury, in addition to the testimony concerning his injuries, had an opportunity to see the plaintiff himself and determine how far the testimony was corroborated by his appearance. It is not contended by the appellants that the record discloses any indication of passion or prejudice on the part of the jury in determining the amount of damages which they awarded, other than the mere fact of its amount. The judge before whom the case was tried approved the verdict, notwithstanding the objection to the amount made by the appellants, and in consideration of the character and extent of the injuries shown to have been sustained by the plaintiff, we are not inclined to disregard his action. The judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: McFarland, J.; Garoutte, J.

De Haven, J., (concurring.) concur in the judgment and in the opinion of Mr. Justice Harrison, except that part which holds that the testimony of the witness Ravekes, upon his redirect examination, to the effect that while a member of the firm of Whittier, Fuller & Co., he had advocated a settlement of plaintiff's claim for damages, was competent as an admission of a fact by one of the parties in interest, and admissible as such against the other defendants. I cannot accept this as a correct rule of evidence. But still, in my opinion, the ruling of the trial court in admitting this evidence can be justified upon another ground. The witness, in his examination in chief, testified to material facts tending to show negligence on the part of the servant of defendants in his mode of operating the elevator at the time of the accident, which resulted in the injury of which plaintiff complains. The entire purpose of the cross-examination, which was conducted with great skill on the part of the attorney for the defendants, seems to have been to show that some time after the accident the witness was compelled to withdraw from the firm of which he and the defendants were members, because he had overdrawn his account with the firm without the consent of his copartners; and that they had charged him with peculation, and in consequence that their relations were unfriendly at the time of the trial. The inference, of course, sought to be drawn from this fact was that the matters testified to by the witness were not true, and that his testimony was simply the result of the subsequent trouble between himself and the defendants.

Under these circumstances, it was not improper to show by the witness that, prior to any difficulty with defendants, his advice to them was entirely consistent with his present testimony, and such as would probably have been given in view of the existence of the facts about which he testified. It is held that former consistent statements of a witness are admissible to support his testimony when it is charged to have been a recent fabrication, in which case, in order to repel such an imputation, it is proper to show that the witness made a similar statement at a time when the supposed motive for such fabrication did not exist, (Rap. Wit. 369, 370;) and the evidence under discussion comes within the spirit and reason of the rule just stated. If the defendants desired to show that this advice was not based upon the facts about which he had given testimony, but such action was simply urged upon the ground that it was wise to avoid a lawsuit, and better to pay an unfounded claim than to be involved in litigation, they should have further cross-examined the witness, and, if this had been made to appear, the evidence could have been stricken out; but, in the absence of any explanation, the evidence tended in some degree to support the original testimony of the witness, and to rebut the inference which the defendants evidently sought to draw from the circumstances under which they claimed he retired from the firm. In the examination of a witness for the purpose of showing motive, interest, or prejudice, or in rebutting an imputation of giving testimony from some unworthy motive, much is necessarily left to the discretion of the judge of the lower court, and it does not seem that in this instance there was any improper exercise of discretion in the ruling upon the question referred to.

WOODWARD et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. (No. 14,945.)

RECEIVERS — APPOINTMENT IN PARTITION PROCEEDINGS—PROHIBITION—WHEN LIES.

1. Code Civil Proc. § 564, authorizes the appointment of a receiver in certain cases. Subdivision 6 provides that a receiver may be appointed "in all other cases where receivers have heretofore been appointed by the usages of courts of equity." Held, that the superior court has jurisdiction to entertain a motion for the appointment of a receiver in proceedings for partition, and, having jurisdiction of the parties and subject-matter, prohibition does not lie to determine the legality of the action on the motion. Per PATERSON and GAROUTTE, JJ. BEATTY, C. J., dissenting.

2. Where an order of sale is void on its face, prohibition does not lie to prevent its execution, since a purchaser would take no title, and could be treated as a trespasser. BEATTY, C. J., dissenting.

In bank.

Original application of one Woodward for a writ of prohibition to William T. Wallace, judge of the superior court of city and county of San Francisco. Denied.

Wilson & Wilson and Estee, Wilson & McCutchen, for petitioners. Dunne & McPike, for respondents.

PATERSON, J. This is an application for a writ of prohibition commanding the respondent to refrain from further proceedings upon an order which had been made appointing a receiver in the case of Woodward et al. v. Raum et al., and authorizing him to sell an undivided interest in the property. The petition shows that the petitioner and Mary C. Raum, Helen J. Hutchinson, and Sarah B. Melone were, on the 11th of February, 1888, the owners of certain real estate in the city of San Francisco, and known as "Woodward's Gardens," and that on said day petitioner and Mary C. Raum, Ely I. Hutchinson, and Sarah B. Melone were the owners of the personal property used in connection with said gardens, and consisting of animals, curiosities, pictures, statues, etc.; that on said 11th of February, 1888, petitioner and Sarah B. Melone commenced an action in which they prayed for a partition of said real estate, and, if a partition could not be had without great prejudice, then for a sale of the premises, and a division of the proceeds among the parties according to their rights; that thereafter the defendants therein, Mary C. Raum and George E., her husband, Helen J. Hutchinson and Ely, her husband, filed an answer in which they claimed that partition could be made without prejudice to the owners, and that a sale was unnecessary; that on March 5, 1891, after trial, the court decided that the land could be partitioned without prejudice to the owners, and adjudged that it be divided equally among them; that on September 1, 1888, said Ely Hutchinson and Mary C. Raum commenced an action against the petitioner and Sarah B. Melone for a sale of the personal property above referred to, and a division of the proceeds in accordance with the interests of the parties; that an answer was filed therein by the defendants in which they denied that said Ely Hutchinson was the owner of any interest in said personal property, and alleged that the one fourth interest claimed by him was owned by his wife, said Helen J. Hutchinson; that the latter should be made a party to the action; that there was an action pending in which the question was involved as to whether all the property, real and personal, should be sold in its entirety, and the proceeds thereof divided among the parties thereto, and that, if the personal property should be sold separately from the land comprising "Woodward's Gardens," it would bring very little money, whereas, if sold with and as a part of the gardens as a whole, the result would be greatly to the advantage of all the parties interested in the property; that on the 5th day of March the court rendered judgment in that action in favor of the plaintiffs, and decided that said Helen J. Hutchinson was not at the time of the commencement of the action the owner of the personal property, or any part thereof, and that the property was of such a character that partition in specie could not be had, and that it should be sold under the direction of the court, and the proceeds, after deducting expenses, be equally divided among the owners; that on the 23d day of May, 1891, the respondent, at the instance of said Sarah B. Melone and her husband, Drury Melone, and against the objections of these petitioners, appointed L. N. Daugherty receiver, with directions to take and keep possession of the property, real and personal; that a receiver was unnecessary, because it was not shown or claimed that said Sarah B. or Drury Melone had been excluded from possession of any of the property, or from any of the proceeds thereof, but that, on the contrary, petitioners had offered in writing to allow said Sarah B. and Drury Melone to take exclusive possession of all the property until final determination of the action, which offer was declined; that on the ——— day of June, 1891, the court made an interlocutory decree in the action of Woodward et al. v. Raum et al., directing a partition of the property among the parties according to their respective interests; that on the ——— day of June, 1891, a final decree was entered in the action of Hutchinson et al. v. Woodward et al., directing that the personal property described in the complaint be sold at public auction, and after payment of the costs that the proceeds be divided equally among the parties to the action; that thereafter said Sarah B. and Drury Melone moved for a new trial in each of said actions, which motions were denied, and from the orders and the interlocutory decree made in the case of Woodward et al. v. Raum et al., and from the judgment in the case of Hutchinson et al. v. Woodward et al., they appealed to this court; that in November, 1891, the receiver filed an account showing his receipts and disbursements, to the approval of which petitioners filed objections on the ground that the order appointing the receiver was in excess of jurisdiction, that the parties to the two actions were not the same, and the court had no power to adjudge that the property involved in one action was liable or chargeable for expenses incurred in preserving the property involved in the other action; and that these objections were overruled, and the court upon the evidence introduced ordered that the account stand approved; that on the 19th day of December, 1891, the court, against the objections of petitioners, made an order authorizing the receiver to borrow the sum of $494.64, the amount of indebtedness which he had incurred in caring for the property, and to issue therefor his certificate; that thereafter the receiver filed a second account, showing that the balance due him was the sum of $877.15, and this account was approved; that on the 14th day of January the receiver represented to the court that he had been unable to raise any money on the certificates authorized by the court, and that it was necessary to sell an undivided interest in all of the property to raise funds for the payment of expenses; that on the 18th day of January, 1892, the court, against the objection of petitioners, made an order authorizing the receiver to sell at public sale to the highest bidder for cash the smallest undivided interest in the real and personal property that would realize, besides expenses of sale, the sum of $8,591.71, and to give his certificate therefor. It is claimed that the order appointing the receiver, and the orders settling and allowing the receiver's account, and directing him to sell an undivided interest in the property, are all in excess of the jurisdiction of the superior court.

1. The superior court has jurisdiction to appoint a receiver in an action of partition. Section 564, Code Civil Proc., provides that a receiver may be appointed by the court "(6) in all other cases where receivers have heretofore been appointed by the usages of courts of equity." The action of partition, "though regulated to a great extent by the statute, partakes more fully, both in respect to the remedies provided and the mode of procedure, of the principles and rules of equity than those of law," (Gates v. Salmon, 35 Cal. 593; Emeric v. Alvarado, 90 Cal. 456, 27 Pac. Rep. 356;) and, whenever it appears necessary to protect the interests of all the parties during the prosecution of an action for partition, the court will, upon proper application, appoint a receiver, (17 Amer. & Eng. Enc. Law, 764; Beach, Rec. § 492; Goodale v. District Court, 56 Cal. 29.) It is claimed by the petitioners that no sufficient showing was made in the court below for the appointment of a receiver; but we think this is a matter which cannot be considered in this proceeding. The court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the parties. It had the power, therefore, to hear and determine a motion for the appointment of a receiver, and its action thereon cannot be regarded as in excess of its jurisdiction. If error was committed, the law has provided an ample remedy. Wreden v. Superior Court, 55 Cal. 504; Clark v. Superior Court, Id. 199; More v. Superior Court, 64 Cal. 346, 28 Pac. Rep. 117. Where the petitioner "has a speedy and adequate remedy in due course of law, the writ cannot issue." Murphy v. Superior Court, 84 Cal. 596, 24 Pac. Rep. 310; High, Extr. Rem. § 772.

2. The order of sale is clearly void. The court had no power in the case of Woodward et al. v. Raum et al. to direct the sale of property involved in the case of Hutchinson et al. v. Woodward et al. The real estate and personal property, respectively, are owned by different parties, and were considered and disposed of by the court in two independent actions. The burden of maintaining the personal property cannot be put upon the owners of the real estate, nor could the court link the two properties together, and render the owners of the personal property answerable for any part of the expense incurred in preserving the real estate. If Mr. Hutchinson succeeded to the rights of his wife in the personal property,—and the court found that he did,—it needs no argument to show that no order could be made charging his property with the expenses incurred by the receiver in caring for property involved in another action to which he was not a party, and in which he had no interest. But the invalidity of the order of sale appears upon the face of the proceedings. The petitioners cannot, therefore, be injured by a sale. A purchaser would take no title, and could be treated as a trespasser. This being so, no case is made for the issuance of a writ of prohibition. Ex parte Braudlacht, 2 Hill, 369. The application is denied, and the writ is discharged.

Garoutte, J. I concur.

De Haven, J.; Harrison, J.; Sharpstein, J. We concur in the judgment upon the ground last discussed in the opinion of Mr. Justice Paterson. As to the other point relating to the question of the jurisdiction of the superior court to appoint a receiver of the property in the actions referred to, we express no opinion.

Beatty, C. J. I dissent. In my opinion the writ of prohibition should be made peremptory. A sale of property under an order of court void on its face will of course confer no title upon the purchaser, and there are remedies by which the owners may ultimately secure a judicial determination of the invalidity of the purchaser's claim, but in the meantime the marketable value of the property is impaired, if not destroyed, and this injury can be prevented in no other way than by prohibition. No other remedy is fully adequate to prevent injury. But, aside from this, I think the order appointing a receiver of the real property was an excess of jurisdiction. The superior court has no power to appoint a receiver except as authorized by the statute, and the only authority claimed for the court in this case is subdivision 6 of section 564 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which reads as follows: "In all other cases where receivers have heretofore been appointed by the usages of courts of equity." There has never been any usage of courts of equity to appoint receivers in actions for the partition of lands between cotenants, unless superadded to the facts justifying a partition there were other facts of an equitable nature rendering such appointment necessary. In this case the petition shows affirmatively that no such facts existed in the action to partition the realty, and consequently there was no case for the appointment of a receiver of the realty. Without a case the power does not exist. The decision in Goodale v. District Court, 56 Cal. 26, is entirely consistent with these views.

Aliso Water Co. v. Baker et al. (No. 14,817.)

Condemnation of Water Rights—Petition.

1. Plaintiff water company averred that it owned the water rights in a creek appertaining to the riparian lands on both sides within certain defined limits, and that to supply said "farming neighborhood" with water it was necessary to condemn and take a portion of the waters of the creek. Held, that the averments failed to show that the condemnation was for the use of the public.

2. A complaint asking condemnation of all the water of a certain creek, except what the riparian owners had a right to use for domestic purposes, and for the irrigation of their riparian lands, is defective, as not sufficiently describing the property sought to be condemned.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county; W. B. Cope, Judge.

Action by the Aliso Water Company against H. G. Baker and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

James L. Baker and Thomas McNulta, for appellant. Wright & Day and E. W. Squier, for respondents.

Temple, C. This appeal is from a judgment against plaintiff upon demurrer. The action is to obtain, by condemnation, certain water rights and a strip of land five feet wide upon a defined line. It is alleged that plaintiff is a corporation whose object and purpose is to take water from Sycamore creek and canon, and to use and distribute the same in supplying, for domestic use and irrigation, a certain farming neighborhood composed of land riparian to said creek. That plaintiff is the owner and in possession of certain rights in the waters of Sycamore creek, said rights being all those rights appertaining to the riparian lands on both sides of said creek, within certain defined limits. It is also averred that each of the defendants, except Baker, who is said to be a mortgagee of one of the other defendants, owns a tract of land, also riparian upon both sides of said creek. That to carry out the purpose of the plaintiff to supply said farming neighborhood with water, it is necessary that plaintiff appropriate, condemn, take, and use all the waters of Sycamore creek, excepting such quantity or portion thereof as the defendants, respectively, have or may have the right, as riparian owners, to use for domestic purposes, and for irrigation of their lands bordering on and riparian to said creek; that is to say, that it is necessary for plaintiff to have the right to appropriate, condemn, take, and use every right of said defendants, respectively, in and to all the waters of said creek, whether acquired by appropriation, adverse use, and possession, or prescription as owners of riparian lands. It avers that more water flows in the creek than is necessary for the reasonable and proper use of said defendants as riparian owners for domestic purposes and the irrigation of said riparian lands; but plaintiff is unable to state the quantity of water which flows in said creek in excess of that which is required by said defendants for domestic purposes and irrigation as aforesaid, or the quantity that said defendants, respectively, may be entitled to use as riparian owners for the purposes aforesaid." The complaint does not show whether the "farming neighborhood," which it is proposed to supply with water, is inhabited, except by the use of the term, and the statement that water is to be supplied for domestic purposes. It does not appear that it is composed of more than one farm, and, in fact, since the pleading must be taken most strongly against the pleader, it must be understood that there is but one, and that the property of plaintiff, which has certain riparian rights in the stream, and the lands of the farming neighborhood are also said to be riparian. The term "neighborhood" is an indefinite phrase, and, if there are two houses upon plaintiff's farm, it would be proper to call it a "neighborhood," though it would not be a public for whose use property can be condemned. It seems to me, therefore, that the complaint not only fails to show that the use for which it is proposed to condemn the property is a public use, but that it shows affirmatively that it is not. But this point, although raised by the demurrer, is not urged by respondents here. They submit the appeal upon the proposition that the complaint is uncertain, in this: that it cannot be ascertained from it what property the plaintiff seeks to condemn,—what water rights it proposes to purchase from the defendants. As shown above, the description is all the rights of each of the defendants, whether as riparian owners or acquired by appropriation, adverse use, or prescription, except for domestic use and reasonable irrigation of their riparian lands. One reason given by appellant's counsel for the generality of the description is that they cannot know what rights defendants may claim by adverse use or otherwise, and they contend that defendants must describe what they have or claim, and have it valued; and they must necessarily contend, further, that defendants would be estopped from hereafter asserting any rights which they neglect to set out. But this proceeding cannot thus be converted into an action to quiet title.

It is an attempt to purchase property against the will of the owners, and for that purpose to have a value placed upon it by the court. There is nothing more obviously essential to plaintiff's case than a sufficient description of that which it proposes thus to acquire. If the defendants make default, the plaintiff must still have a valuation made, and tender the amount to the defendants as a consideration for property acquired through the proceeding. And the judgment, which cannot include what is not in the pleadings, constitutes its muniment of title. If it has sufficiently described what it wishes to take, it may require the defendants to set out the extent of their interest in that, but plaintiff cannot put upon the defendants the burden of determining what or how much the plaintiff requires to accomplish its purpose. What it seeks here are certain rights in property, and it should specify with exactness what they are. It appears that plaintiff's land is below the land of the defendants. If it were to divert the water at a point below the defendants' land, the excepted rights, which it does not seek to condemn, would include all riparian rights except water for stock, which is no doubt omitted from the exception by mere oversight. There would then be nothing to condemn except such rights as were held by adverse use, prescription, or appropriation; and the complaint would contain no attempted description of the property which the plaintiff seeks to purchase. The diversion contemplated seems to be at a point above the land of defendants, and it is said that the plaintiff proposes to take the riparian right to have water not needed for the excepted uses run idly by. If this were a sufficient description of that right, and I think it can be easily shown that it is not, there would be no attempted description of all other rights of the defendants, which nevertheless, in such general language, the plaintiff seeks to acquire. There is nothing upon which the judgment of the court could be invoked, or a question propounded to a witness as to value. Conceding that rights not riparian are included in the general description, it cannot be ascertained from the complaint what they are, and, as against the special demurrer, the pleading is insufficient. The defendants' lands are not included within the "farming neighborhood," which it is proposed to supply with water. Whether, by such a proceeding as is attempted here, water rights could be acquired from one set of riparian owners for the use of another under any possible pleadings, has not been argued and is not passed upon. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C., BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

BROWN v. O'NEAL, Sheriff. (No. 14,707.)

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES—UNDIVIDED INTEREST IN CHATTELS.

Civil Code, § 3440, which provides that every sale of personal property is void as to creditors unless accompanied by an immediate delivery and followed by actual continued change of possession, applies to a sale of an undivided interest by a joint tenant of a chattel in actual possession.

Action by W. J. Brown against E. F.

O'Neal, as sheriff, to recover the possession of a horse. From a judgment in favor of defendant the plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Wilcoxon & Bouldin, for appellant. Graves & Graves, for respondent.

Belcher, C. This is an action to recover possession of a horse alleged to have been wrongfully taken by the defendant from the plaintiff, or, in case delivery cannot be had, for the value of plaintiff's one-half interest in the animal, and damages for its detention. The facts of the case, as found by the court below, are substantially as follows: On February 5, 1890, R. S. Brown and W. H. Taylor were the joint owners of a stallion, each owning a half interest. Taylor was an invalid, and Brown, by agreement between them, had possession of the animal, and was to manage him during the breeding season of that year, lasting from February 1st to July 15th, and, after paying all expenses, divide equally the proceeds arising from his services. On the day named Brown sold and by bill of sale conveyed all his interest in the stallion to W. J. Brown, the plaintiff, for the sum of $650, which sum was paid by plaintiff at the time. Taylor was spoken to about the sale at the time it was made, and refused to give his consent thereto unless the seller should retain possession of the stallion. Plaintiff consented to this arrangement, and the horse remained in possession of R. S. Brown until about February 1, 1891, when Taylor, plaintiff, and R. S. Brown entered into a new agreement, whereby the latter was to have the possession, control, and management of the stallion during the breeding season of that year, and pay all expenses of his keeping, care, and management, and receive one third of the proceeds derived from his services, and the other two thirds of the proceeds were to be equally divided between Taylor and the plaintiff. On March 15, 1891, R. S. Brown and P. W. Murphy jointly executed their promissory note to the Bank of San Luis Obispo for the sum of $1,057.30, due one day after date. On April 7, 1891, the note not being paid, the bank commenced an action thereon in the superior court of San Luis Obispo county, and took out a writ of attachment. The writ was placed in the hands of the defendant, who was then the sheriff of the county, and under it he, as such sheriff, levied upon, seized, and took into his possession the said stallion. The value of the stallion was $3,000, and the levy of the attachment upon him, as aforesaid, constitutes the taking alleged in the complaint. The plaintiff demanded the return of the animal to himself, and, his demand being refused, he commenced this action on April 10, 1891. Upon these facts the court below gave judgment for the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals on the judgment roll.

The first question presented for decision is, was the sale void, as against the creditors of the seller, under the provisions of section 3440 of the Civil Code? That section is as follows: "Every transfer of personal property * * * is conclusively presumed, if made by a person having at the time the possession or control of the property, and not accompanied by an immediate delivery, and followed by an actual and continued change of possession of the things transferred, to be fraudulent, and therefore void, against those who are his creditors, while he remains in possession," etc. Appellant contends that this section has no application to the case, for the reason that "the property sold—an undivided interest in a stallion—was not capable of delivery," and, as the other joint owner objected and refused to consent to a change of possession of the animal, no actual change was necessary. "In other words," he says, "his position is that the possession of Taylor was the possession of plaintiff, and that from the time of the sale the property was in Taylor's possession, and, the possession of one joint tenant being the possession of the other, that plaintiff at all times after the transfer was in possession of the horse." If Taylor had sold his interest in the horse, and one of his creditors had afterwards taken it under attachment, the rule invoked would have been applicable, but it is not applicable to the facts shown here. The law on this subject is stated in Freeman on Cotenancy, § 167, as follows: "If A. and B. together own personal property of which A. is in actual possession, and B. sell his moiety to C., the possession of A. immediately becomes the possession of C. also. Therefore, being at once, by presumption and construction of law, put in possession as tenant in common with A., it is not necessary that C. should take actual possession with A. to make his purchase good under the statute of frauds as against the creditors of B. If A., the cotenant in possession, had sold his interest, then the sale should have been followed by an actual change of possession, because there was no cotenant whose actual possession could have operated for the benefit of A.'s vendee." And again, in his work on Executions, § 153, the same author says: "If the cotenant selling is in the sole possession, he ought to give possession to his vendee; but if the other cotenants are in possession, the vendor has no right to take it from them. He may therefore, from necessity, make a valid sale, without placing the property in the custody of his vendee." And see Brown v. Graham, 24 Ill. 630, and Newell v. Desmond, 63 Cal. 242. The law being as above stated, it is clear that judgment was properly entered against the appellant, unless his second contention can be sustained. That contention is that the Bank of San Luis Obispo was not a creditor of Brown until more than a year after the sale, and consequently was not in a position to attack the sale. And it is said: "The statute, we think, visits no such penalty upon a bona fide purchaser as to declare a transfer void as to subsequent creditors." The obvious answer to this position is that the statute (section 3440, Civil Code) "denounces the transfer as fraudulent and void, as against the claims of a creditor who is such creditor during any of the time that the person who made the transfer remains in possession, after a transfer which is not accompanied by an immediate delivery, and followed by an actual and continued change of possession. Such a transfer being void as to the creditor, he may cause the property to be seized in the same manner as he might have done had there been no attempted transfer by the debtor." Watson v. Rodgers, 53 Cal. 401. The law is so written, and, though it may sometimes seem to work a hardship, the courts cannot evade its force and effect by an inquiry into the consideration paid by the purchaser, or the good faith of the transaction. Woods v. Bugby, 29 Cal. 467. It results that the judgment should be affirmed, and we so advise.

JOHNSON v. SWEENEY. (No. 14,672.)

OPENING DEFAULT—STIPULATION OF COUNSEL.

Though, as a general rule, a stipulation of counsel cannot be enforced unless put in writing or entered on the court minutes, yet, where the making of an oral agreement for an extension of time to answer or demur is not denied, and was relied on by defendant, a judgment of default taken against him in violation of such agreement will be set aside.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Solano county.

Action by Cassius J. Johnson against Owen Sweeney. Judgment for plaintiff by default. From an order refusing to set aside the judgment, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Raleigh Barcar, for appellant. A. J. Dobbins, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. The defendant moved in the court below for an order setting aside a judgment taken against him by default, entered in open court on an ex parte application of plaintiff on April 28th, and in support of his motion filed an affidavit made by his attorney, showing, among other things, the following facts: The summons was served upon defendant in the county where the action was commenced on April 17, 1891. The defendant had, therefore, to and including the 27th day of April, 1891, to appear and answer or demur. His counsel was engaged in the trial of a case in the superior court on the last day for answering, and in the evening after adjournment, while riding to Vacaville with the plaintiff's attorney, he asked the latter if he would accept service of a general demurrer, waive copy, and give him more time in which to prepare and serve a special demurrer, saying that he would like until Saturday, May 2d. Thereupon the attorney for plaintiff said he could have until Saturday, or longer, if he desired it, in which to file a special demurrer, and that he would accept service of a general demurrer that evening. When the demurrer was presented to the attorney for the plaintiff in the evening, he indorsed upon it his acceptance of service, qualified, however, by the words, "reserving all rights in the premises regarding default in the within entitled action." The attorney for defendant did not notice the fact that plaintiff's attorney had qualified his acceptance of service of the demurrer until a late hour that night. On the following morning the demurrer, with proof of service, was filed in the clerk's office, before default was entered. The affidavit states that the affiant relied on the conversation with the attorney for the plaintiff as an agreement to give the defendant until Saturday to prepare a special demurrer. No counter affidavits were filed. We think that upon this showing the motion ought to have been granted. It is a general rule that a stipulation of counsel cannot be enforced unless put in writing, or entered in the minutes of the court; but where an oral agreement for an extension of time to answer or demur is admitted, and has been relied on by the defendant, a judgment by default taken against him in violation of the terms of the stipulation will be set aside. If the party against whom a verbal stipulation is invoked denies that such a stipulation was made, the court will not hear the parties for the purpose of settling the dispute; but where the facts relied upon by the moving party are not controverted there is no reason for the application of the rule, and it is too late to repudiate the stipulation after it has been executed. People v. Stephens, 52 N. Y. 310. In Huart v. Goyeneche, 56 Cal. 429, it was held that the defendant was not guilty of negligence in relying upon an oral promise for an extension of time to answer; and an order refusing to set aside a judgment taken against him by default while relying upon such promise was reversed. In Woodward v. Backus, 20 Cal. 137, the court held that the court below did not abuse its discretion in setting aside a judgment by default, although the affidavits of the plaintiff denied that an oral extension of time had been granted. It is true, the question as to the necessity for a written stipulation was not considered by the court in either of the last two cases cited, although it was discussed by counsel in Woodward v. Backus; but the weight of authority is against the application of the general rule to cases of default judgments, and no case has been cited in which a party has been permitted to retract and take advantage of his adversary's acts or omissions, based on reliance upon his oral promise or stipulation. In the brief, counsel for respondent states that at the hearing of the motion to set aside the default in the court below, he offered to make and file an affidavit to the effect that he had at no time agreed or stipulated with defendant's attorney that the time for filing an answer or demurrer should be extended, but that the court held it could take no notice or cognizance of an oral agreement or stipulation made between attorneys out of court; but the fact does not appear in the transcript, and we are guided only by the record made in the court below and certified to us. Judgment reversed, and cause remanded, with instructions to set aside the default, and permit the defendant to answer.

CORKER et al. v. CORKER. (No. 14,691.)

DEED—DELIVERY—EVIDENCE.

1. In an action by the widow of a grantor to cancel a deed on the ground of nondelivery, the evidence showed that some months prior to the grantor's death he made the deed conveying land to defendant, his son; that the day prior to his death the grantor delivered the instrument to one W., who took it to the register, stating that the grantor wished the same recorded, and then sent to defendant, which was done. Held, that the evidence failed to show a nondelivery.

2. Delivery of a deed cannot be disproved by the testimony of a third person, with whom the grantor left it, that, if he had afterwards called for it, he would have given it to him, since such testimony does not tend to show the grantor's intention.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WALTER VAN DYKE, Judge.

Action by Aurelia J. Corker and others against John Frederick Corker to cancel a deed. Defendant had judgment, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Edwin Baxter, for appellants. J. L. Murphey, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. Some months prior to his death, John R. Corker made and acknowledged his deed to certain real estate, situate in the county of Los Angeles, wherein his son, residing in the territory of Utah, was named as grantee. The day prior to his death he delivered the deed to one White, who carried it to E. F. Spence, stating that Corker, the grantor, desired him to record the same, and then deliver it to the grantee, John Frederick Corker. Upon the following day the grantor died, and subsequently the deed was recorded by Spence, and delivered in pursuance of his instructions. This action was brought, and the appeal is prosecuted by the widow and the remaining heirs at law of the deceased against the grantee in said deed, asking that the deed be canceled, and the realty therein described be declared the community property of the estate of said deceased, upon the ground that said deed was never delivered to the grantee, and for the further reason that it was made in fraud of the rights of the wife to the community property. Plaintiffs were nonsuited, and the evidence heretofore quoted is substantially all that is found in the record. The judgment should be affirmed, as evidence to support the complaint is lacking in many respects. An issue is created as to whether the realty is separate or community property, but plaintiff offered no evidence to support the allegations of the complaint in this regard. Again, conceding the realty to be community property, a deed of gift by the husband of community property, in order to be a fraud upon the wife, must be made with a fraudulent intent. "A deed of gift of a portion of the common property by the husband is not void per se." Lord v. Hough, 43 Cal. 585. In this case neither the complaint nor the evidence indicates any attempt to defraud the wife of her rights; and, as far as the record discloses, the realty transferred to the son may have been a just and proper advancement, leaving an abundant residue for the widow and remaining heirs.

An objection was sustained to the following question asked the witness Spence: "If, after you received this deed from Mr. White at that time, John R. Corker had called for it, or sent for it, would you have delivered it back to him?" The ruling of the court was correct, and is directly supported by Dean v. Parker, 88 Cal. 288, 26 Pac. Rep. 91, where the question addressed to the witness was: "Supposing the father had come in a year after he had left the deed with you, or in two or three weeks afterwards, and asked you for the deed again, would you have given it to him." As to this interrogatory the court said: "The objection to this question should have been sustained, as the evidence sought by it was irrelevant. The matter to be determined was, what was the intention of plaintiff's father in leaving this deed with the witness? and for the purpose of arriving at this intention evidence of any declarations made or conversations had in relation to that subject by the said John Dean, at that or any subsequent time, would have been competent; but what the witness would have done if the deed had afterwards been called for can have no tendency to show whether the father did or did not intend, in what he did, to make a delivery of the deed for the benefit of his son." The evidence is entirely lacking to prove a nondelivery of the deed to the grantee. Conceding the law to be as appellant claims it, still it is not shown but that the deed was delivered to Spence in pursuance of a prior mutual understanding and agreement between the parties. There is nothing in the record to indicate but that every act of the grantor pertaining to the transfer of the realty was done with the consent and assent of the grantee. It is not even shown that White was authorized to deliver the deed to Spence for any purpose, or under any instructions from the grantor. The burden of proof was upon the plaintiff, and the allegations of the complaint in many respects stand without support in the evidence. Let the judgment be affirmed.

SHAW v. MAYER. (No. 14,724.)

LANDLORD AND TENANT — RENTING ON SHARES— VOLUNTEER CROP.

In consideration of "one fifth of the crop, delivered clear of expense," plaintiff agreed to furnish defendant "140 acres of land, more or less, to sow in wheat." Defendant sowed but 19 acres, and on the balance of the land grew a volunteer crop of wheat. Held, that defendant was not entitled to harvest any portion of the volunteer crop.

Action by D. W. Shaw against Rudolph Mayer to recover a quantity of wheat. Plaintiff had judgment and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Spencer, for appellant. Graves & Graves, for appellee.

FOOTE, C. It appears from the record here that the defendant, Mayer, entered into a written contract with one Pond, which is as follows: "Articles of agreement entered into this 18th day of October, 1889, between J. H. Pond and Rudolph Mayer. I, J. H. Pond, party of the first part, hereby agree to furnish to R. Mayer 140 acres of land, more or less, to sow in wheat the coming season. In consideration I shall receive one fifth (1-5) of the crop delivered in Paso Robles, clear of all expenses pertaining thereto. I, Rudolph Mayer, party of the second part, agree to plow and put in wheat the above-mentioned land in good, farm-like style, and in due time for the season of 1889 and 1890 to furnish seed and all expenses appertaining thereto. In witness we have attached our signatures. J. H. POND. RUDOLPH MAYER." Pond, the admitted owner of this land when the above contract was made, sold it to the plaintiff, Shaw, by proper conveyance in February, 1890. Shaw also at that date obtained from Pond an assignment of the agreement between the latter and the defendant. Mayer only sowed in wheat 19 acres of the land included in the contract, and upon 95 aces of it there grew a volunteer crop of that grain. Before any of the crops were harvested, the plaintiff notified the defendant not to cut any of the volunteer crop of grain. But this notice was disregarded, and the defendant harvested and threshed all of the grain,—that sowed by him, and the volunteer crop as well. In the aggregate there were 372 sacks of wheat and 21 sacks of screenings. It appears that the volunteer crop was about the same per acre as the sown crop. The plaintiff brought an action of claim and delivery for the 372 sacks of wheat and the screenings. The jury who tried the case found under the instructions of the court that he was the owner of and entitled to recover 250 sacks of wheat and six sacks of screenings, and that they were of the value of $250. In pursuance of the statute in such cases, an alternative judgment for plaintiff following the verdict was entered. From that and an order denying a new trial this appeal is taken.

The argument for appellant is that the contract was a lease of 140 acres of land, and that the defendant was entitled to his share of all that grew on the whole tract, whether sowed in wheat or not; and that, being a tenant in common with the plaintiff, the latter could not maintain this action. And because the court below refused to grant a nonsuit on the motion of the defendant, and gave instructions to the jury not in accord with the theory of the defendant, it is claimed that the judgment and order should be reversed, and a new trial granted. The whole question involved is one, we think, to be determined from the language of the written contract between Pond and Mayer. As we construe that instrument, whether it be called a "lease" or a "cropping contract," the defendant has no right in any of the land, except that which he sowed in wheat. As to the land which he did not sow, he was not entitled to anything which grew upon or was harvested therefrom. The whole idea pervading the contract is that, as to so much of the 140 acres as the defendant sowed in wheat, he was to have a certain fixed portion of the crop grown thereon, and the owner of the land, who furnished it to be sown in wheat, the balance. As to the other part of the land, not sown in wheat by the defendant, he had no interest in it or what grew upon it. Having harvested, threshed, and taken into his possession the wheat that voluntarily grew on the land of the plaintiff, the defendant was liable in the action brought against him, and the recovery had against him should be upheld. We therefore advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; TEMPLE, C.

MERRILL v. MERRILL. (No. 14,799.)

RECOVERY BY VENDEE OF PURCHASE MONEY.

Plaintiff bought property of defendant, paying part of the price in cash, and agreeing to pay the balance at stated times, and defendant's deed to the property was placed in escrow till the balance should be paid. Held that, in an action to recover money paid on the contract of sale, averments in the complaint that defendant "reclaimed" the escrow deed from the holder, and denied plaintiff's right to purchase under the contract with intent to rescind the contract, showed a sufficient excuse for plaintiff's failure to tender the unpaid balance of the purchase money and to demand the deed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WILLIAM P. WADE, Judge.

Action by Mattie H. Merrill against F. H. Merrill to recover money paid under a contract of sale. From judgment on an order sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Brousseau, Hatch & Thomas and Waldo W. York, for appellant. J. M. Voss and R. Dunnigan, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. On August 29, 1887, a written contract was executed by and between F. H. Merrill, Otto Froelich, and C. T. Hopkins, by the terms of which Merrill agreed to sell to Froelich an undivided one-sixth part in the S. ½ of the N. E. ¼ and the S. E. ¼ of section 21, township 2 S., range 13, W., San Bernardino base and meridian, known as the "Merrill and Hancock Tract," and "being the interest to which said Merrill is entitled under the will of his late father, Ed. Merrill, deceased, for the sum of $12,500, to be paid as follows:" $1,500 on the execution of the agreement, the receipt of which is acknowledged; $1,500 in 60 days from date of agreement; $4,750 in 6 months, and $4,750 in 9 months, from date. The agreement then proceeds as follows: "The deed of said lands from said Merrill to said Froelich is placed herewith in escrow, with said Hopkins, * * * to be held by said Hopkins until the final payments are made to said Merrill as above stated. In case of the default in the payment of the sums of money paid as herein named, * * * then said sums of money are to be considered forfeited by said Froelich to said Merrill, and said Hopkins hereby agrees to return and deliver said deed to said Merrill. In the event of the payment of the sums of money to said Merrill as herein specified, then said Hopkins is to deliver said deed to said Froelich, and said Hopkins hereby agrees so to do. The proceedings now pending for distribution of said property to said Merrill in the superior court of Los Angeles county, state of California, are hereby held in abeyance, and continue so till default shall be made in this agreement, when said Merrill shall be at liberty to revive said proceedings for such distribution; but, in case this contract is fulfilled according to the terms above mentioned, then said proceedings for distribution are to be dismissed."

It is averred in the complaint that in making this agreement Froelich acted solely as agent for the plaintiff, and that it was made for her benefit alone, of which defendant had notice at the time it was made; and that plaintiff paid to defendant the first two installments with her own money according to the agreement, of which defendant also had notice at the times those payments were made. The complaint then proceeds as follows: "(5) That at the ——— of the execution of the said contract the said F. H. Merrill had no right or title in or to said lands described in said contract; that the said Froelich and said plaintiff did not know that the said defendant had no right or title to said lands; and the said Froelich and the said plaintiff believed that the said F. H. Merrill had the right and title to a one-sixth undivided interest in and to said lands. (6) That on or about the 1st day of March, 1889, the said defendant reclaimed the deed mentioned in the said contract, which he had theretofore, in accordance with the terms of said contract, executed and placed in the hands of said Hopkins in escrow, and rescinded the said contract, and denied the right of said Froelich and the said plaintiff to purchase the same under and by virtue of said contract; that the said defendant gave plaintiff no notice of his intention to rescind said contract, and did not at any time demand of plaintiff the balance due thereon, or any payment or payments thereon, and did not at any time tender to her, or offer to deliver to her, the said deed on the payment of the said balance due, and did not notify her that he had rescinded said contract, and plaintiff had no knowledge that defendant had rescinded said contract or taken back said deed until after the 1st day of March, 1889. (7) That on the 27th day of March, 1888, the said F. H. Merrill acquired a one-sixth undivided interest in and to the tract of land described in said contract, and has been ever since that time and now is the owner thereof. (8) That the said defendant, notwithstanding the facts aforesaid, has not repaid to plaintiff or the said Froelich the said sum of $3,000, or any part thereof, but claims and asserts that the said $3,000 has been forfeited to him, the said defendant, by the said plaintiff, and refuses to pay her or said Froelich the same or any part thereof. (9) That, since the said surrender of said deed by said Hopkins to said defendant, the said Froelich, by an instrument in writing, duly assigned, transferred, and set over to said plaintiff whatever claim he, the said Froelich, had for the recovery of said $3,000, and all causes of action he might have against said defendant, relating thereto, or arising from or under said contract." The prayer is that plaintiff have judgment against the defendant for $3,000 and interest; that the judgment be declared a lien upon the land; and that the land be sold, etc. The defendant demurred to this complaint on the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The court sustained the demurrer, and, as plaintiff elected to stand upon her complaint without amendment, gave judgment for defendant. The appeal is from the judgment upon the judgment roll, and presents the question whether, as against a general demurrer, the complaint is sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to any relief whatever.

Some parts of the complaint are indefinite and uncertain, and apparently inconsistent with each other, but, exclusive of these, I think the complaint states a cause of action for the recovery of the purchase money paid by plaintiff. The only ground upon which respondent's counsel undertake to justify the judgment is that it is not averred in the complaint that plaintiff ever tendered payment of either of the last two installments of the purchase money; and no doubt this point should be sustained, unless the complaint shows a sufficient excuse for having omitted to make such tender. In the leading case on this point, (Englander v. Rogers, 41 Cal. 420,) the court, by CROCKETT, J., said: "The covenants of the vendor and vendee were mutual and dependent, and neither could put the other in default, except by tendering a performance on his own part, unless the other party either waived the tender, or by his conduct rendered it unnecessary. To entitle the plaintiff to maintain the action on the contract set out in the complaint, he should have averred a tender of the unpaid portion of the purchase money, or some sufficient excuse for the omission to tender it." There is nothing in conflict with this in the case of Dennis v. Strassburger, 89 Cal. 583, 26 Pac. Rep. 1070, cited by respondent. See, also, Drew v. Pedlar, 87 Cal. 443, 25 Pac. Rep. 749; and Newton v. Hull, 90 Cal. 487.[1] I think, as against a general demurrer, the sixth paragraph of the complaint shows a sufficient excuse for the omission of plaintiff to tender the purchase money and demand a deed before the commencement of this action. The facts substantially alleged that defendant "reclaimed" (withdrew) the escrow deed from Hopkins, and denied the right of plaintiff to purchase under the contract, with intent to rescind the contract, show that a tender of the purchase money and demand for the deed would have been of no avail. Dowd v. Clarke, 54 Cal. 48. In Wood v.

[1] 27 Pac. Rep. 429.

McDonald, 66 Cal. 547, 6 Pac. Rep. 452, the court, by Mr. Justice McKinstry, said: "Proof of any circumstance which would satisfy a jury that a demand would be unavailing—as a refusal by the defendant to listen to one, or a statement in advance that he will not deliver—will be sufficient to excuse proof of a demand." I think the judgment should be reversed, with leave to defendant to answer; and also with leave to plaintiff to amend her complaint, if so advised.

We concur: Belcher, C.; Temple, C.

Green v. Fresno County. (No. 14,684.)

Officers—Compensation—How Ascertained.

1. Under Const. art. 11, § 5, requiring the compensation of officers to be "in proportion to their duties," what compensation satisfies this requirement is a question of fact to be determined by the legislature, and not by the court.

2. In an action by a constable against a county for fees, where the agreed statement of facts shows that part of the claim was rejected by the board of supervisors, but does not show the ground of rejection, such action will be presumed to have been correct unless the agreed statement shows it to have been erroneous.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. Harris, Judge.

Action by J. W. Green against Fresno county on a claim for official services as constable. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Newman Jones and W. R. Jacobs, for appellant. W. D. Tupper, Dist. Atty., and H. H. Welsh, for respondent.

Vancliff, C. This case was submitted to the trial court upon an agreed statement of facts, substantially as follows: In May, 1891, the plaintiff presented to the board of supervisors of the county of Fresno, in due form, his claim for official services as constable of township No. 1, rendered in criminal cases, and for money expended during the month of March of that year, amounting to $412.40. This claim was allowed for all items of money expended, amounting to $32.80, and for $125 for services, but was rejected as to the balance of $254.60 claimed for services. In April, 1891, C. W. Fraser, as constable of township No. 3 of that county, duly presented to the board of supervisors his claim for $332.90 for official services in criminal cases, rendered during the same month, (March, 1891,) which was allowed for $125, but rejected for the balance of $207.90. The fees charged for services in each case were such as are allowed by law. Neither plaintiff nor Fraser accepted the sum allowed him. Fraser assigned his entire claim to plaintiff, who, upon the stipulated facts, seeks to recover the full amount of both claims. Prior to March 31, 1891, Fresno county was a county of the twenty-sixth class, according to the classification made by the county government act of March 14, 1883; but by the revision of that act, approved March 31, 1891, it became a county of the eighth class. Since January 1, 1891, there have been 14 constables in said county, 9 of whom have not earned or presented claims for more than $125 for any one month since January 1, 1891, on account of services in criminal cases, "but each of said nine constables has, during each of the months since January 1, 1891, earned in such cases, * * * and presented claims for the same, various sums less than the $125 per month, all of which last-mentioned claims have been allowed and paid in full." The judgment was for defendant, and the plaintiff appeals therefrom upon the judgment roll, which wholly consists of the stipulated statement of facts and the judgment.

During the month in which the services were performed, section 188 of the county government act, as amended March 16, 1889, (St. 1889, p. 279,) was in force; and, so far as applicable to constables, was as follows: "Sec. 188. In counties of the tweny-sixth class, the county and township officers thereof shall receive as compensation for the services required of them by law or by virtue of their office the salaries as follows, to wit: * * * (14) Constables. Such fees as are now or may be allowed by law: provided, that no constable shall receive more than $1,500 per annum for all services rendered by him in criminal cases, or in actions or proceedings to which the people of the state of California are or may be parties; and no claim of any such constable in excess of the sum last named shall be allowed or paid, but all fees collected by such constable in criminal cases in excess of one thousand five hundred dollars shall belong to and be the property of the county in which said constable acts. * * * The provisions hereof shall not affect the present incumbents." By the act of March 31, 1891, (St. 1891, p. 345,) the above section was amended and re-enacted as "section 170." As thus re-enacted, section 170 of the act of 1891 not only limits the compensation of constables in Fresno county, now ranked in the eighth class, for services in criminal cases, to $1,500 per annum, but requires it to be paid in monthly installments not to exceed $125 in any one month. Section 234 of the same act—March 31, 1891, (St. p. 421)—is as follows: "Sec. 234. The provisions of this act, unless otherwise herein provided, so far as it relates to the fees and salaries of all officers named, except justices of the peace and constables, shall not affect the present incumbents: provided, that when the salary of any such officer, or fees in lieu of such salary, is not now fixed by law, the same shall, as to such officer, take effect immediately."

1. Counsel for appellant contend that each of the above-quoted sections is unconstitutional. But the record raises no question as to the constitutionality of sections 170 and 234 as enacted March 31, 1891. There is nothing in the act purporting to give either of these sections any retroactive effect. Nor is there anything in the record indicating that the trial court applied them to this case.

2. It is insisted, however, that section 188, as amended March 16, 1889, does not regulate the compensation of constables "in proportion to duties," and therefore is repugnant to section 5, art. 11, of the constitution. What compensation of an officer should be deemed in proportion to his duties is matter of fact to be ascertained and determined by the legislature, and not by the courts. Longan v. County of Solano, 65 Cal. 122, 3 Pac. Rep. 463. In the class of counties to which the defendant county belonged when the services in question were performed, the legislature determined that certain fees allowed by law for services in civil cases, and also the fees allowed by law for services in criminal cases, not exceeding $1,500 per annum, would be in proportion to the duties of constables in that class of counties. Had the legislature given to each constable a salary of $1,500 per annum, it would not be pretended that the courts could interfere on the ground that such salary is not in proportion to the duties of each constable; yet the mode adopted by the legislature by which to regulate the compensation of constables effects a nearer approach to a just proportion between the compensation and duty of each constable of the class than would a fixed salary common to all. Dougherty v. Austin, (Cal.) 29 Pac. Rep. 1092.

3. The agreed statement of facts shows that the board of supervisors rejected portions of each claim for fees, but does not show upon what ground they were rejected. Upon this statement alone the superior court was asked to review and reverse or modify the action of the tribunal having original jurisdiction of the subject-matter. Under these circumstances the superior court was justified in presuming that the action of the board of supervisors was correct, unless the agreed statement affirmatively showed it to have been erroneous. If the claims may have been properly rejected by that board, upon any ground not negatived by the statement, the superior court may have presumed that they were properly rejected upon that ground. For aught that appears, that portion of each claim that was rejected may have been wholly in excess of $1,500 already allowed to each claimant for services rendered in criminal cases during the year 1891. This not being negatived, the presumption here must be that the superior court did not err in giving judgment for defendant. The obligation of the defendant to pay more than was allowed by its board of supervisors is not a necessary consequence of the stipulated statement of facts. The conclusion of law from the facts stated is merely that the plaintiff is entitled to recover such portion of his demands as will not effect a transgression of the $1,500 limit fixed by section 188, above quoted. But whether or not the effect of a recovery of any sum would be to exceed that limit does not appear. The defect of the statement is not merely a failure to state the breach of an obligation, but also consists of a failure to show that defendant was ever under any obligation to pay the claims disallowed by the board of supervisors. The fact that an allowance of the claim in question would not have transgressed the statutory limit of $1,500 was necessary to constitute the obligation, and therefore the insertion of it in the agreed statement could not have been regarded as a reply to an anticipated defense. Both an obligation and a breach of it must have been stated before any defense was necessary. The averment that the claims in question had not been paid, without showing an obligation to pay them, is of no consequence. As this case was submitted upon an agreed statement of facts under section 1138 of the Code of Civil Procedure, "the consideration of the court was restricted to the facts admitted, and its judgment could not be based upon any other facts which it may have supposed the plaintiff could establish." Crandall v. Amador Co., 20 Cal. 73. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; TEMPLE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment is affirmed.

LATTIN v. GILLETTE et al. (No. 14,608.)

ABSTRACTORS OF TITLES—WRONG CERTIFICATES—LIMITATION OF ACTIONS.

1. A cause of action against an abstractor of titles for giving a wrong certificate of title accrues at the date of the delivery, and not at the time the negligence is discovered or consequential damages arise.

2. A written certificate of title, given by an abstractor, is not an "instrument of writing" within the meaning of Code Civil Proc. § 339, which provides that an action on a contract, obligation, or liability not founded on an instrument of writing must be commenced within two years.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WALTER VAN DYKE, Judge.

Action by B. C. Lattin against J. W. Gillette and F. A. Gibson, abstractor of title, for giving a wrong certificate of title. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. D. Bethune and A. W. Hutton, for appellant. Chapman & Hendrick, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. In June, 1886, the plaintiff employed the defendants, who were engaged at Los Angeles in the business of searching public records and examining titles to real estate, to examine the title of one Birnbaum to a tract of land in Los Angeles county, for which he had made a contract of purchase, and ascertain if his title was good, and paid them $1,000 for their services. The defendants, under said employment therein, made a report to the plaintiff, and gave him a certificate in writing, on the 12th day of June, 1886, that the title to the land was vested in Birnbaum free of all incumbrances. Thereupon the plaintiff purchased and paid for the land. Afterwards, and within two years prior to the commencement of this action, a suit was brought in the superior court of Los Angeles county in reference to the title to said land, which the plaintiff was subjected to the cost and expense of defending, and in which a judgment was rendered to the effect that at the date of said certificate an undivided one half of said land was vested in the heirs of one Smith; and the plaintiff herein was thereupon deprived of the said half of the land. In May, 1890, he commenced this action against the defendants for damages resulting from their negligence in the examination and report upon the condition of the title. Defendants demurred to the complaint upon the ground, among others, that the suit was not brought until more than two years after the cause of action had accrued, and was therefore barred by the statute of limitations. The court sustained the demurrer to the complaint, and judgment was rendered against the plaintiff, from which he has appealed.

Section 339, Code Civil Proc., provides that an action upon a "contract, obligation, or liability, not founded upon an instrument in writing," must be brought within two years after the cause of action shall have accrued. This provision was declared in Piller v. Railroad Co., 52 Cal. 44, to be "applicable to all actions at law not specifically mentioned in other portions of the statute." The word "liability" is the most comprehensive of the several terms used in this section, and includes both of the others, inasmuch as it is the condition in which an individual is placed after a breach of his contract or a violation of any obligation resting upon him. It is defined by Bouvier to be: "Responsibility; the state of one who is bound in law and justice to do something which may be enforced by action. This liability may arise from contracts, either express or implied, or in consequence of torts committed;" and this definition was approved in Wood v. Currey, 57 Cal. 209. The statute of limitations begins to run against a cause of action as soon as the right of action has accrued. Upon the breach of any special contract the contract begins to run at the date of the breach, and a right of action growing out of the negligence of another accrues whenever the act of negligence is complete. "When misconduct or negligence constitutes a cause of action, the statute of limitations begins to run from the time when the defendant had been guilty of such misconduct or negligence." Wood v. Currey, supra. Whether the negligence out of which the cause of action arises is the breach of an implied contract, or the affirmative disregard of some positive duty, is immaterial. In either case the liability arises immediately upon such breach of contract or disregard of duty, and an action to recover the damages which are the measure of such liability may be immediately maintained. The right to maintain the action is distinguished from the measure of damages, and, although the entire damage resulting from such negligence may not have been sustained, or the fact that the negligence occurred may not have been known until the right to a recovery is barred, yet the time within which an action may be brought is not thereby prolonged.

In the present case the obligation assumed by the defendants arose out of their agreement that they would examine the title of the property, and ascertain if the same was good in Birnbaum, and report the same to the plaintiff. Having held themselves out as examiners of titles, they were bound to exercise skill and care in making such examination, and became liable in damages for a failure to exercise such skill and care; and the breach of their agreement for which they became liable is alleged in the complaint to have been that they "negligently and unskillfully conducted such examination, and did not truthfully report the condition of the title to the plaintiff," but reported on the 12th of June, 1886, that the title was vested in Birnbaum free of all incumbrances; whereas in fact at the date of said certificate he was the owner of only an undivided one half thereof, and the same "appeared of record on the public records of said county." The giving of this certificate was the breach of their agreement, and constituted the negligence for which they became liable. No further or subsequent act was done or contemplated to be done by them under their employment. Their liability for this negligence, if any existed, arose immediately, and an action therefor could have been immediately commenced against them, and, unless commenced within two years thereafter, was barred by the statute of limitations. The running of the statute was not suspended by the fact that the plaintiff did not ascertain the error in the certificate, or by the fact that the existence of the error was not determined by the superior court until more than two years had expired. The judgment of the court did not constitute the negligence of the defendants, but was only evidence that they had been guilty of negligence, and the eviction of the plaintiff under such judgment was not the cause of action against the defendants, but was merely an element in determining the amount of damages that he had sustained by reason of their negligence. "Where an attorney is sued for malpractice the cause of action arises from the time when such malpractice occurred, and that without any reference to the circumstance whether the client then knew the fact or not." Wood, Lim. § 122. In cases of damages resulting from malfeasance or misfeasance, "the cause of action arises immediately on the happening of the default, and is not postponed to the damage thereby occasioned." Ang. Lim. § 136. "In actions for official or professional negligence the cause of action is founded on the breach of duty which actually injured the plaintiff, and not on consequential damage. Thus, in an action against an attorney for neglect of professional duty, it has been held that the statute of limitations begins to run from the time when the breach of duty was committed, and not from the time when the consequential damage accrued." 2 Greenl. Ev. 433. In Troup v. Smith, 20 Johns. 33, a surveyor had been employed to survey a tract of land into lots suitable for sale, but did his work so unskillfully as to cause damage to the plaintiff, for which he brought suit, and to a plea of the statute of limitations replied that the error was not discovered by him for some years after the survey had been completed; but it was held by the court that this fact did not impair the effect of the plea; that the cause of action accrued at the completion of the survey, and not at the time of the discovery of its character, and was barred by the lapse of six years. In Argall v. Bryant, 1 Sandf. 98, an action was brought against the publishers of the Evening Post for the erroneous publication therein of a legal notice, whereby the plaintiff sustained damage. The publication was made in 1835, but the error was not discovered until 1842, and the damage resulting therefrom in a judgment recovered against the plaintiff was not sustained until 1846, upon the payment of which suit was immediately brought for the negligence. It was held that the foundation of the action was the implied promise of the defendant to perform with care and diligence the publication which he undertook, and that this implied promise was broken in 1835, when the error was committed, and that, as an action could have been then maintained, the statute of limitations began to run, and was not affected by the fact that he did not discover the error until a later date, or that he subsequently sustained additional damages. In Wilcox v. Plummer's Ex'rs, 4 Pet. 172, an attorney who had been employed to collect a promissory note was guilty of such negligence in bringing the suit that the indorser was discharged. It was held that the ground of action against the attorney was the breach of his contract to act diligently and skillfully, and arose at the time he committed the blunder in issuing the writ, and not at the determination of the suit. See, also, Howell v. Young, 5 Barn. & C. 259; Short v. McCarthy, 3 Barn. & Ald. 626; Kerns v. Schoonmaker, 4 Ohio, 331; Northrop v. Hill, 57 N. Y. 356; Moore v. Juvenal, 92 Pa. St. 484; Crawford v. Gaulden, 33 Ga. 174; Lilly v. Boyd, 72 Ga. 83.

The written certificate of title given to the plaintiff by the defendants, although an instrument in writing, is not an instrument upon which their liability is founded. In Chipman v. Morrill, 20 Cal. 131, it was held that this provision of the section by its language "refers to contracts, obligations, or liabilities resting in or growing out of written instruments, not remotely or ultimately, but immediately; that is, to such contracts, obligations, or liabilities as arise from instruments of writing executed by the parties who are sought to be charged, in favor of those who seek to enforce the contracts, obligations, or liabilities." The contract which is the basis of the plaintiff's cause of action herein does not "rest in" or "grow out" of this certificate, nor does the certificate contain any obligation or contract that can be enforced, or which is susceptible of a violation on the part of the defendants, or under which any liability can accrue against them. The obligation assumed by them was that created at the time of their acceptance of the employment by the plaintiff, and antedated the making of the certificate. The certificate is not the evidence of this obligation, but is merely evidence of the act done by them in purported satisfaction of the obligation assumed by them in accepting their employment. Instead of establishing the contract made between them and the plaintiff, it is the evidence relied upon by him to establish the breach of that contract, and necessarily presumes that the contract was complete before it was given, as in the case of an erroneous deed drawn by an attorney, or a defective plat made by a surveyor, or a wrong prescription given by a physician, it is only evidence in support of the averment that the implied contract for the exercise of skill and care was violated, and is not the contract itself. That was created by the oral agreement of employment, and was broken by the giving of the faulty writing. The judgment is affirmed.

DIMMICK v. DIMMICK. (No. 14,635.)

COMMUNITY PROPERTY—CONVEYANCE BY HUSBAND TO WIFE.

1. Property acquired by purchase during marriage, whether the title be taken in the name of the husband or of the wife or of both, is presumed to be community property.

2. Where separate property has undergone mutations, and assumed other conditions, it must be clearly traced and located to retain its character of separate property.

3. The delivery of a deed by a husband to his wife is not defective because, at his request, she refrained from recording it till after his death; his intention being, if she died before him, to destroy or conceal it so as to reinvest title in himself.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior court, Los Angeles county; LUCIEN SHAW, Judge.

Action by Delos M. Dimmick, administrator, against Sarah Smith Dimmick. From a judgment for defendant, and order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Wells, Monroe & Lee, for appellant. Horace Bell and Frederick Stanford, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an equitable action to cancel and set aside a deed of certain realty, executed by Elmer D. Dimmick to the defendant, and asking that said property be decreed to be the property of the estate of Julia A. Dimmick, deceased. Said Julia was the first wife of Elmer D. Dimmick, and it is contended by plaintiff that at the time this property was conveyed to defendant it was the property of the estate of said deceased wife, Julia, by virtue of its being her separate property at the date of her death. It is further contended that the deed to the defendant was never delivered, and hence no title passed to her. Judgment went for the defendant, and this appeal is prosecuted from that judgment and the order denying a motion for a new trial. The deed sought to be set aside is a deed of gift made to the defendant, Sarah Smith Dimmick, the second wife of Elmer D. Dimmick, and dated February 2, 1889. The finding of the court, that the realty described in this deed was not the separate property of Julia A. Dimmick, deceased, is fully supported by the evidence. It appears that she and Elmer D. Dimmick were married in Pennsylvania, nearly 50 years ago; that subsequently he received a gift of a small tract of land from his father, and that later she received some money from the estate of her father. He also obtained a loan of the sum of $1,360 from his father-in-law, which he invested in land. This indebtedness was afterwards canceled upon the understanding that it should be deemed as an advancement to them from her father's estate. It is not necessary to an affirmance of the judgment in this case that we examine in detail the status of the real estate purchased by the husband with the above-mentioned funds, although it would seem that the wife's separate estate would consist of the indebtedness due to her father from the husband rather than the real estate previously purchased with the funds which created the indebtedness. As described by one of the witnesses, the husband was an "industrious, thrifty, economical, and intelligent farmer and blacksmith." He also traded in real estate, and whatever money his wife received, by inheritance or otherwise, passed into the common fund, and its identity forever lost in the purchase of numerous tracts of real estate, the titles to which were all taken in his name. It is unnecessary to follow in detail the migrations of these parties to Iowa, and from thence to California; it appears that the husband always had the complete and entire control and conduct of the property, selling and buying where and when he chose. While the evidence discloses that the proceeds of the realty owned in Pennsylvania were brought to Iowa, there is no evidence that any money was brought by them to California. It further appears that they made a deed of gift of quite a valuable tract of land to a son, and that the husband was the recipient of a gift of $1,500 from his brother. In addition to all these facts, there is no evidence whatever as to the source of the particular funds which paid for the land involved in this litigation.

The principle of law is established beyond question that real estate acquired by purchase during the existence of the married relation, no matter whether the deed be taken in the name of the husband or wife or both, creates the presumption that such property is common property. While this presumption is not conclusive, the burden of proof rests upon the party affirming the fact to be to the contrary, and such fact must be established by clear and convincing evidence. Ramsdell v. Fuller, 28 Cal. 42; Morgan v. Lones, 78 Cal. 62, 20 Pac. Rep. 248. In order that property may maintain its status as separate property, it is not necessary that it should be preserved in specie or in kind; yet, when it has undergone mutations and assumed other conditions, it is absolutely necessary, in order to maintain its character as separate property, that it be clearly traced and located. Chapman v. Allen, 15 Tex. 283; Rose v. Houston, 11 Tex. 326; Schmeltz v. Garey, 49 Tex. 60. The money expended in the purchase of the realty involved here should have been traced back to the separate estate of Julia A. Dimmick, not by way of surmises and probabilities, but by plain and connected channels. While the wife had some separate property very many years ago, at that time it passed into the hands and commingled with the funds of her husband, an active business man engaged in numerous speculations in land, so numerous and so varied that at the date of this recent transfer it is impossible to say that one dollar of the money which she received from her father's estate, or its proceeds, passed into this tract of land. The burden was upon the plaintiff to make the proof, and thus overcome the presumption which is indulged in by the law. He has failed to do so; hence the finding of the court cannot be disturbed.

The evidence fully supports the finding that the deed was delivered by the grantor to the defendant. It was clearly his intention to vest the title of the realty in her, and the fact that he requested her to refrain from recording the instrument until after his death was entirely immaterial. Conceding he believed that if she should die first he could conceal or destroy the deed, and thereby reinvest the title in himself, still such fact does not militate against the sufficiency of the delivery at the date of the conveyance, or destroy his clear intention to part with the title and vest the same in her. Let the judgment and order be affirmed.

POOLE v. WILBER. (No. 14,673.)

DIVORCE—ALIMONY.

In a suit to annul a marriage on the ground that defendant had a husband living at the time of marriage, defendant answered, alleging a subsequent valid marriage with plaintiff, and also filed a cross bill praying that such marriage be declared legal, stating that plaintiff had deserted her, and asking alimony. Held, that under Civil Code, § 137, providing that the wife may, in case of desertion, maintain an action for permanent support without applying for divorce, and in such action the court may, in its discretion, require the husband to pay alimony and expenses during the litigation, the court had power to order plaintiff to pay counsel fees and an allowance pendente lite to the wife.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; E. S. TORRANCE, Judge.

Action by C. H. Poole against Alice S. Wilber, otherwise known as Alice S. Poole, to annul the marriage of plaintiff and defendant. From an order granting defendant alimony pendente lite and counsel fees, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Hunsaker, Britt & Goodrich, for appellant. Works, Gibson & Titus, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. This appeal is from an order granting repondent alimony pendente lite and counsel fees, upon her motion for that purpose. The complaint alleges a marriage with the defendant in 1881, that at the time of the marriage defendant had a husband living from whom she had not been divorced, and on that ground plaintiff seeks to annul his said marriage. Defendant's answer admits her marriage to plaintiff and her former marriage; alleges that her marriage to plaintiff was in good faith, believing she had been divorced; that they lived together as husband and wife from that time until April, 1891, when plaintiff deserted her; and, further, that a divorce was obtained by her former husband March 31, 1882; and alleges "that in the month of February, 1888, they removed to the city of San Diego, state of California, from which time they mutually consented to and did marry." Defendant also filed a cross complaint, praying that the said marriage be declared legal, and for alimony. Demurrers to the answer and cross complaint were interposed by plaintiff, which were overruled, and upon defendant's motion alimony in the sum of $45 per month and $100 counsel fees were ordered to be paid her by plaintiff. A bill of exceptions was taken by plaintiff, setting out the pleadings and the affidavits of the parties for and against the motion. The affidavits are long, and except as to the former marriage of defendant, and its existence at the date of her marriage to appellant, are irreconcilably conflicting. Appellant contends that his marriage to defendant was void; that mere living together does not constitute a marriage; and that proof of living together is not proof of marriage. These questions are not before us. The superior court could not have determined them, and entered a judgment in the case upon the affidavits used upon the hearing of the motion. To decide these questions would be to exercise an original jurisdiction this court does not possess. By overruling plaintiff's demurrers the court below has decided that there is an issue between the parties, and the correctness of that ruling cannot be considered on this appeal. Appellant's further contention that, where the marriage is a nullity, alimony and court expenses cannot be allowed, is met by the issue raised as to a subsequent marriage after the disability was removed; and whether that issue is sustained by the affidavits used on the hearing of the motion we need not consider. Appellant further contends that alimony and counsel fees can only be allowed under section 137 of the Civil Code in actions for divorce. In Galland v. Galland, 38 Cal. 265, it was held that the provision for alimony, made in the statute concerning divorces, was not intended to be a prohibition of the granting of alimony in other cases; that such powers fall within the general jurisdiction of a court of equity, and exist independently of statutory authority. This case arose before the Code was enacted; but section 137, Civil Code, provides, among other things, that the wife may, in case of desertion, maintain an action for permanent support without applying for divorce; and in such action the court may, in its discretion, require the husband to pay alimony during the pendency of the suit and money necessary for the prosecution of the action. Respondent's cross complaint is made under this provision, and entitles her to the relief granted by the order, even if the court had no power to grant it had she rested on her answer to appellant's complaint. The affidavits show that the only property belonging to the parties, or to either of them, is a house and lot in the city of San Diego, to the procurement of which both parties contributed, the title to which is in respondent, and which has been occupied by her since the alleged desertion of her by appellant, but that it produces no income, that respondent has no means of support; and that appellant's income is about $145 per month. We think the court did not abuse its discretion in making the order. We therefore advise that the order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; FOOTE, C.

AMESTOY v. ELECTRIC RAPID TRANSIT CO.

(No. 14,695.)

PLEADING ORDINANCES—VALIDITY OF CONTRACT—PUBLIC POLICY.

1. Where certain private ordinances are referred to in a declaration as constituting ground for the action, though they are not set out in haec verba, or pleaded as provided by Code Civil Proc. § 459, allowing them to be referred to in the pleading by their title and the days of their passage, their existence will be conceded as against a general demurrer.

2. Where it does not appear that a person would sustain special damage by the illegal obstruction of a street by another, and could therefore prevent it only by instituting a public prosecution, his agreement to take no steps to prevent such obstruction is void as against public policy, and will not support a promise to pay money.

Action by D. Amestoy against the Electric Rapid Transit Company on an alleged agreement for the payment of money. From a judgment for defendant entered on demurrer, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. L. Murphy, for appellant. John Haynes, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This appeal is from a judgment entered upon demurrer. From the complaint it appears that plaintiff owns a lot in the city of Los Angeles, on the west side of Los Angeles street, fronting 83.07 feet on that street. In 1886 the city granted to certain named parties a franchise for a street railroad, extending through Los Angeles and other streets. The road was only partly constructed, and of course was operated only for a portion of the distance for which the franchise was granted. The franchise was granted upon consideration that the grantees would pave and keep in repair the street between the tracks and for two feet on each side; the same to be paved whenever ordered paved by the city council, or when the street was paved by owners of frontage. In 1888 the city council by resolution required that portion of Los Angeles street to be paved, and authorized the paving to be done by private contract. The work was done by owners of frontage and was accepted by the city. The owners of the franchise did not pave between the tracks or for two feet on each side, although they were required to do so by the ordinance of the city, but refused so to do. Thereupon the city council directed its street superintendent to remove its rails and track from that street, and the track, rails, and ties were so removed. The city council claimed that the franchise had been forfeited for various reasons, which are not set out in the complaint, and the former owners of the franchise, as plaintiff believes, acquiesced in the claim. Plaintiff and other owners of frontage, finding the street impassible, and believing that the franchise had been forfeited and abandoned, completed the pavement on the street, doing the work which the owners of the franchise had undertaken to do at a cost to plaintiff of $215. In the mean time the company which had owned the franchise had become insolvent, and all its property, including its claim to the franchise, were sold to the defendant. Afterwards, about April, 1890, defendant desired to lay its track upon the street in front of plaintiff's property and west of the center of the street, but plaintiff and other owners of frontage objected. It is averred that defendant's assignors had forfeited their franchise, and defendant had obtained none; that the franchise which had been granted had been used for a railway on which cars were propelled by electricity through an overhead system of wires resting on poles, and was therefore void; that the defendant proposed to lay its track on the street, and place wooden poles on each side thereof, and to place wires thereon for the purpose of propelling cars by electricity; that defendant knew that its franchise was void, and that it had no right to lay its track or erect its poles or propel cars by electricity without the consent of plaintiff and other owners of property. The city of Los Angeles, by a valid resolution of its council, prevented the defendant from laying its track upon the street, except upon the condition that the company should repay to property owners on the west side of the street all sums which they have paid for paving, which the former company had been required to do as a condition of its franchise. The owners of frontage intended to prevent the defendant from laying its track, whereupon the defendant promised in writing to repay to plaintiff and others, in compliance with the city ordinance; and in consideration that plaintiff would not take any step to prevent defendant from laying its track, and for other valuable considerations, did on or about October, 1890, in writing promise to pay the plaintiff $215 within a reasonable time, and to pay the other property owners the amounts expended by them for such paving. The plaintiff thereafter did not prevent defendant from laying its track, but the track was laid the whole length of the street. It is averred that defendant had no right to lay its track on the street, and plaintiff and other owners could and would have prevented it but for the promise to pay, set out. Further, that in building its railway defendant took up and carried away granite blocks belonging to plaintiff worth $15, which he says constitutes a further consideration. The demurrer is only on the general ground that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. Though other grounds were stated, they were waived.

The point of the demurrer is that the alleged promise is without consideration. Respondent states the rule to be that only those allegations of the complaint are admitted by the demurrer which are material, and which are well pleaded. As a general proposition that is undoubtedly correct, but it must be taken in connection with the other well-established rules of pleading. A complaint which would be obnoxious to a general demurrer would not support a judgment. When the latter question arises, courts have always discriminated between insufficient facts and an insufficient statement of facts, and where the necessary facts are shown by the complaint to exist, although inaccurately or ambiguously stated, or appearing by necessary implication, the judgment will be sustained. Reason requires that this same rule shall be applied in the case of a general demurrer. Therefore, although the various ordinances are not set out in hæc verba, or pleaded as authorized by section 459 of the Code of Civil Procedure,[1] still, as against a general demurrer, their existence must be conceded. The same reasoning would dispose of the objection that there is no specific allegation that the written promise had been delivered, although as to that I think the averment sufficient.

Does the complaint show a sufficient consideration to sustain the promise? Or, rather, does the complaint show affirmatively the want of a consideration? for, as the writing itself imports a sufficient consideration, such must be the conclusion, unless this presumption has been overcome by the facts stated. The recitals as to the former railroad company would seem to cut no figure, except to show that the defendant claims to be acting under a franchise which plaintiff avers and shows is void. The ordinance providing that defendant shall not lay its tracks, unless upon the condition that it pay for the paving, is also averred and shown to be void, so far as it may be claimed to recognize the existence of a franchise. At that time the city council had no authority to grant a franchise for a street railway on which cars were to be propelled by electricity. We are not called upon therefore to determine whether the council, which must exercise its powers solely in the interest of the public, could grant a franchise on condition that the grantee pay a sum of money to a private individual. Being void, it would constitute no consideration for the promise. As the track was to be laid and the poles erected in the street without authority, they would constitute an illegal obstruction; in other words, a public nuisance. No fact is averred to show special injury from the proposed nuisance to plaintiff. It is averred that defendant had no franchise, and plaintiff and others intended to prevent defendant from laying its track in the street. "Whereupon the defendant company promised in writing to repay plaintiff and the other property owners along said street, in compliance with the said order of said city council; and also for the further consideration that the plaintiff would not take any steps to prevent the said defendant from laying its track on the said street in front of the said property, and for other good and valuable considerations, the said company did on or about the 1st day of October, 1890, in writing, promise and agree with plaintiff and the said other property owners along said street that it would pay to plaintiff," etc. As it does not appear that plaintiff would sustain special damage by the obstruction, he could not prevent it except by instituting a public prosecution. The agreement not to do so would be against public policy and void. It would not, therefore, constitute a valid consideration for the promise sued on. The owners of frontage, singly or combined, could not confer upon defendant the right to the use of the street. It is difficult to see how, therefore, under the circumstances alleged there could have been any other good or valuable consideration for the promise. Had the original franchise been valid, and the defendant the assignee of it, the question would have been different; but, as its so-called franchise was void, no rights were derived from it by defendant. It does not appear that the granite blocks were sold to defendant by plaintiff, or that they were taken by his consent; much less that he consented in consideration of defendant's promise to pay for the paving. The blocks were apparently the property of the city. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

WALL v. HEALD. (No. 14,671.)

PRACTICE—FILING ANSWER—OVERRULING DEMURRER—WAIVER OF NOTICE—DEFAULT—JUDGMENT ENTERED BY CLERK.

1. Where the attorney of a party demurring to a pleading is present in court when a ruling on the demurrer is announced, and knows of the order, and acts on it, written notice of the decision, as required by Code Civil Proc. §§ 476, 1010, will be deemed waived.

2. Where defendant is in default for failure to answer within the time granted by the court, of which he has knowledge, the clerk has authority to enter judgment for amount prayed in complaint. Bailey v. Sloan, 4 Pac. Rep. 349, 65 Cal. 387, followed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; W. L. PIERCE, Judge.

Action by Peter Wall against F. H. Heald to recover amount due on a promissory note. From an order setting aside a default and judgment in favor of plaintiff the plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

W. T. McNealy, Trippett & Neale, and L. Gill, for appellant. E. W. Hendrick, D. M. & N. S. Hammack, and S. V. Landt, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. On the 13th day of January, 1891, this action was commenced in the superior court of San Diego county to recover the amount due on a promissory note. On the 30th day of the same month a general demurrer to the complaint was filed, signed "E. W. Hendrick, attorney for defendant." On the 27th of February the demurrer was overruled, the minute entry of the order being as follows: "Parties being present by their respective attorneys, the demurrer of defendant to plaintiff's complaint is at this time overruled for want of oral presentation, and ten days given defendant in which to answer." No written notice of this order was ever given to or served on the defendant or his attorney. On the 10th of March, no answer having been filed, the clerk of the court entered the default of the defendant, and a judgment against him, as prayed for in the complaint. On the 9th of June an execution was issued on the judgment and levied on the property of defendant. On the 24th of July the defendant moved the court to set aside the default and judgment, and to recall the execution, on the ground that the default and judgment were entered and the execution issued without authority, and in violation of law, because no notice of the order overruling his demurrer had been served on him or his attorney, or waived by him or his attorney, and because, when a demurrer has been overruled, and time given to answer, the clerk has no authority to enter a default or judgment without an order of court directing him to do so. In support of his motion the defendant offered and read in evidence the judgment roll in the case, and in opposition thereto the plaintiff offered and read from the minutes of the court the order overruling the demurrer, and an affidavit made by one Harry J. Neale. In this affidavit the affiant stated that he was one of the attorneys for the plaintiff in this case, and was present in court on the 27th day of February, 1891, which was the regular day for the call of the court's law and motion calendar, and that this case was upon the said calendar, pending upon the defendant's demurrer to the complaint: "That E. W. Hendrick, Esq., was, and still is, the attorney of record for the defendant herein, and was present in court upon said day at the call of said calendar. That when said demurrer was called affiant answered the same, 'Ready.' That when the said demurrer was called for argument the said E. W. Hendrick stated to the court that he did not desire to argue the same, whereupon the court announced that the said demurrer was overruled for want of oral presentation. That said Hendrick then stated that the defendant would take the usual time to answer, or words to that effect, to which the court assented." There was no attempt on the part of the defendant to deny any of the statements made in the affidavit, and, after argument, the matter was submitted to the court for decision. The court thereupon made and entered its order vacating and setting aside the default and judgment and recalling the execution, and from that order the plaintiff appeals.

[1] Code Civil Proc. § 459, provides that in pleading a private statute, or a right derived therefrom, it is sufficient to refer to such statute by its title and the day of its passage.

Section 476 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that "when a demurrer to any pleading is sustained or overruled, and time to amend or answer is given, the time so given runs from the service of notice of the decision or order;" and section 1010 of the same Code provides that "notices must be in writing." Respondent contends that under these sections the time allowed to answer does not begin to run until written notice of the order is given or waived, and that to constitute a waiver it must be evidenced by stipulation in writing, or entry in the minutes of the court. The answer to this contention is that this court has held otherwise. In Barron v. Deleval, 58 Cal. 95, a demurrer to the complaint was overruled, and five days allowed to answer. No notice in writing of the order was given. Eight days later, no answer having been filed, judgment by default was entered against the defendant. From that judgment the defendant appealed, and the only point made on the appeal was as to the necessity of written notice. It was shown by the bill of exceptions that "the defendant was present in court by his attorney of record upon argument and ruling on the demurrer, and, upon the same being overruled, requested of the court time to answer, and five days' time to answer was granted." It was held that written notice was waived, and that judgment by default was rightly entered after the expiration of the time allowed. The court said: "The objects of the notice, and the only purpose it can subserve, is to bring home to the attorney knowledge of a fact upon which he is called upon to act. But the right to a written notice, like any other civil right, may be waived, and we think it was waived in this case. Section 3513 of the Civil Code provides that 'any one may waive the advantage of a law intended for his benefit.' Section 3528 of the same Code provides that 'the law respects form less than substance,' and section 3532 declares that 'the law neither does nor requires idle acts.' * * * What purpose would a written notice of a fact of which the attorney had direct and positive knowledge have subserved? Would it not have been a vain and idle ceremony to have given him a written notice under the circumstances disclosed in this case? * * * To hold that the party and his attorney were not bound by this proceeding, had in open court, would be trifling with justice, and also subversive of sound principles of law and morals." And see Mullally v. Society, 69 Cal. 559, 11 Pac. Rep. 215; Gray v. Winder, 77 Cal. 525, 20 Pac. Rep. 47; and Dow v. Ross, 90 Cal. 562, 27 Pac. Rep. 409. It is shown by the order of the court, and by the uncontradicted affidavit of plaintiff's attorney, that the defendant was present in court by his attorney when his demurrer was overruled, and knew of and acted upon the order. He must therefore be held, under the decision above cited, to have waived written notice of the order. As to the point that the clerk had no authority to enter the default and judgment without an order of court, a sufficient answer is found in Bailey v. Sloan, 65 Cal. 387, 4 Pac. Rep. 349, where it is said: "No answer was filed, and, the time within which the defendant was granted leave to answer having expired, the clerk was authorized to enter his default, and a judgment for the amount specified in the summons." It follows, in our opinion, that the order appealed from should be reversed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, [illegible], HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order appealed from is reversed.

CHILDS v. LANTERMAN et al. (No. 14,714.)

REVIEW ON APPEAL—FINDINGS OF COURT—NEW TRIAL.

1. Where the evidence is conflicting, the findings of the trial court will not be disturbed.

2. A new trial, asked on the ground of newly-discovered evidence, is properly refused, where it is unlikely that such evidence would change the result.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WALTER VAN DYKE, Judge.

Action by Barbara Childs against F. D. Lanterman and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Stephen M. White, for appellants. Gould & Stafford, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. Action to quiet title, and the defendants appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial. The real question in issue between the parties is one of boundary, the appellants claiming that the land described in the complaint lies within the boundaries of the Rancho La Canada, while the respondent contends that it does not. The evidence upon the point was conflicting, and, this being so, we cannot, under the rule which is well settled in this court, disturb the finding of the trial court.

But it is urged by appellants that their motion for a new trial should have been granted on the ground of newly-discovered evidence. The nature of this new evidence is made to appear by the affidavit of one Coronel, who assisted in making the survey of the Rancho La Canada, and who was not a witness upon the trial. In his affidavit, as we understand it, he states, in substance, that stations 87 and 88 of that survey were in point of fact located further north than as found by the court, and so as to include within said rancho the whole or a portion of the premises in controversy, and that station 87 is marked by a rock mound now in place, on the east bank of an arroyo referred to in the field notes of said survey. The field notes of the survey, however, state that the station is on the west bank of the arroyo. A motion for a new trial, upon the ground of newly-discovered evidence, is one which is addressed to the sound discretion of the trial court; and we cannot say, upon the record before us, that the court did not properly exercise its discretion in denying the motion of appellants; as it cannot be said that, if a new trial were had, and the testimony of this witness produced, the result would be different. To accept his statement as to the location of station 87, the court would have to so far disregard the field notes of the survey upon which the patent for the Rancho La Canada is based as to place that station on the east instead of the west side of a deep arroyo, which is a permanent landmark referred to in such field notes. Considering the long time which has elapsed since the making of the survey, and the other evidence given upon the trial tending to show the true location of the lines of that survey, as well as the counter affidavits used on the hearing of the motion, it cannot be said that the court in passing on the motion for a new trial erred in accepting the field notes of such survey as the best evidence in determining whether the station was located on the east or west bank of the arroyo mentioned in such field notes; and if the court disregarded the affidavit of Coronel, as to the location of station 87, it might well have concluded not to accept his statement in regard to the location of station 88.

Judgment and order affirmed.

(No. 14, 625.)

CANCELLATION OF DEED—CONSIDERATION—AGREEMENT AS TO CARE AND ATTENTION.

A deed, made by an elderly woman voluntarily and without undue influence, conveying to her nephew and his wife all her realty with the exception of a life estate, in consideration of an agreement on their part to make their home with her, repair and improve her house, and care for her during life, will not be set aside, where it appears that the deed was understandingly made, and that the grantees had expended several hundred dollars in coming from their home in a distant state, and several hundred more in repairing the house, and were ready to perform further when interrupted by the grantor.

Action by Charlotte Creswell and John E. Creswell, her husband, against William H. Welchman and Mary Welchman, to have set aside a certain deed. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Blackstock & Shepard, for appellants. Orr & Hall, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. In August, 1888, the plaintiff Charlotte Creswell, then Charlotte Bath, was left a widow by the death of her husband, Joseph Bath. She was then nearly 70 years of age, and had no children and no relatives in this state. She owned 37 acres of farming land in the county of Ventura, on which she was living, and a lot in the town of Santa Paula, the whole being of the value of about $4,000. At her request the defendant William H. Welchman, who was her nephew, and was then residing in the state of New Jersey with his wife, the other defendant, came to this state to live with and take care of her. They arrived at her home about the 1st of February, 1889, and on the 12th of that month she, for the expressed consideration of one dollar and other good and lawful considerations, executed and delivered to them a bargain and sale deed of all her real property, but "reserving and excepting unto the grantor herein, for her own use and benefit, a life estate in the whole of said lands hereby granted for and during the natural life of said grantor, with the right to use, occupy, and control absolutely the said lands and tenements, and to receive, take, and have the rents, issues, and profits thereof so long as she, the said Charlotte Bath, grantor, may live." The defendants continued to live with plaintiff until January, 1890, when they left her house and went away, claiming that they were compelled by her to do so. On the day defendants left, John E. Creswell, a stranger to plaintiff, called at her house and wanted work. She took him in and kept him till March 12th, when she married him. On May 6, 1890, this action was commenced by Mrs. Creswell and her new husband to have the deed executed by her to defendants set aside and canceled on the grounds that it "was signed by plaintiff at the solicitations of defendants and under undue influence exercised by them upon plaintiff, and with the intent and purpose on their part of cheating and defrauding plaintiff;" that the consideration for the conveyance had failed; "that said conveyance was made by plaintiff when of the age of seventy years, and when in feeble state of health, and when in great mental distress, and at a time when she did not know fully what she was doing, nor realize the effect upon her of the act, to wit, the execution of said deed;" and that the deed was fraudulent and void, and operated only as a cloud on her title.

The court below found that when the deed was made the plaintiff was "competent and had sufficient capacity to convey her estate; that she signed, executed, and delivered the said deed voluntarily, of her own will, without solicitation and free from undue influence; that no fraud was committed or attempted upon her by defendants, or either of them, to obtain said deed; that the consideration for the deed was the relationship between the parties and the coming of defendants from their home in the state of New Jersey to the home of plaintiff in California, "and the agreement on the part of said defendants, entered into with good faith by them to make their home with said plaintiff, care for her, improve, repair, and make more comfortable and convenient her home, and attend to her business and affairs, and give her their companionship and society during the remainder of her lifetime;" that defendants came to California at an expense to themselves of $200, and, under plaintiff's direction, "took full charge of her business and affairs, repaired and improved the dwelling house, the home of plaintiff, on said tract of land, by building three new rooms thereto at an expense to themselves of $400, and made their home with said plaintiff, provided and cared for her, gave her their companionship and society, and did fully pay, yield, and render the consideration for said deed for the space of about eleven months, when they were compelled to leave said premises, and remove therefrom, and give up the possession thereof, and to cease living with said plaintiff, caring for, or in any manner providing for or protecting, her or attending to her affairs by the acts and directions of said plaintiff herself; that plaintiff at said time refused to allow them to do anything for her, or to receive any aid from them, and demanded and received sole possession of said premises described in the complaint in this action by virtue of the estate reserved unto herself in the said deed to the defendants;" that after defendants moved away, and before the commencement of this action, "they offered to return to the said home of plaintiff, or to send her money, if she so desired, all of which offers of defendants said plaintiff rejected and refused to accept; that defendants provided said plaintiff, during the whole of the time that she permitted them to reside with and care for her, with a good and comfortable home, and did in good faith in all things pay, yield, and render the consideration agreed upon for said deed, except as prevented by the acts of said plaintiff." And, as a conclusion of law, the court found that the deed was valid and operated as a conveyance to the grantees in fee of the remainder, after the life estate reserved to the grantor, of all the lands and premises described in the deed, and that they were the owners thereof. Judgment was accordingly entered that the plaintiffs take nothing by their action. From that judgment and an order denying a new trial the plaintiffs have appealed.

The only specifications found in the statement are that some of the findings were not justified by the evidence. But, after carefully reading all of the evidence found in the transcript, we are of the opinion that it was amply sufficient to justify each of the findings. It is true that when the deed was made the grantor was an old lady and alone in the world. She wanted company and care, and had solicited the defendants to come and live with her, offering to give them all that she had after her death. So far as appears, she was then of sound mind and able to transact her business understandingly. She went to a lawyer to have him draw the deed, and presumably it was drawn at her dictation and as she wanted it. The defendants came to this state at an expense of $200, and afterwards expended $400 in repairing and enlarging the house. No offer was made to return any of this money to them. They appear to have acted in good faith, and to have intended to live with and take care of the old lady as long as she should live. That they were unable to do this was not their fault. They left because she had changed her mind, and would not permit them to remain. She had reserved a life estate in the property, with a right to its possession, and they could only occupy it with her consent. The deed to them was absolute, and without any conditions, but they could exercise no control over the property during her lifetime. After they left they offered to send her money if she needed it, or to return and rent the farm, and she replied that she had rented the farm and herself with it,—she had got married,—and they need not trouble themselves about sending her any money. They seem, therefore, to have been fully justified in going and remaining away. And, speaking of this action, it was proved that she had said she didn't care which party won it. "All she wanted was the property during her lifetime, and she had that." Upon the facts shown, we think the court below was right in entering judgment as it did, and we advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

KLAUBER et al. v. SAN DIEGO ST. CAR CO.

(No. 14,665.)

SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE—DEFENSE—OPERATION OF LAW—WHAT IS.

In consideration of the performance of certain agreements on the part of plaintiff, defendant street car company agreed to construct and operate for 10 years a certain extension of its road, and in default thereof forfeit the extension to plaintiff. Plaintiff performed the agreements on his part, but before the 10 years expired the receiver appointed at the suit of defendant's mortgagee to take charge of all of defendant's property refused to operate the extension. Held, that the appointment of the receiver was not such a prevention "by operation of law," within the meaning of Civil Code, § 1511, as would excuse performance on the part of defendant, and plaintiff was entitled to specific performance.

Action by A. Klauber and others against the San Diego Street Car Company to enforce a contract specifically. Defendant had judgment, and plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Parrish, Mossholder & Lewis and Luce, & McDonald, for appellants. Works, Gibson & Titus, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This appeal is upon the judgment roll, and was taken by plaintiffs. The findings show that defendant owned and was operating a street railway in San Diego, and plaintiffs were the owners of certain lands to which they desired to have the street railway extended. On September 30, 1887, they therefore agreed with defendant, in consideration that it would build and operate the road in a specific way, that they would procure the right of way between certain named points, and the franchise from the city permitting the use of the streets and a grant of the right of way over the city lands, and pay defendant $6,000 per mile of such extension, and also pay for all material and labor necessary to construct all of the bridges, trestles, and culverts along the line of the road. That plaintiffs performed their part of the contract, procuring and turning over to defendant franchises and rights of way worth $10,000, and paid for building all the bridges, trestles, and culverts, $22,000, and the further sum of $41,695.88, being $6,000 per mile for each mile of such extension. That the railway and franchises were worth only $25,000, and plaintiffs have been benefited by its construction and operation in the sum of $5,000 only. That it was provided in the contracts that after the construction and equipment of the road, if the defendant refused or failed to operate it, as provided, and run over it three regular trains each and every day, for a period of ten years, that upon such failure defendant should forfeit to plaintiffs the entire extension, including the franchises, rights of way, ties, rails, roadbed, bridges, trestles, and culverts, and the same should revert to and become the property of plaintiffs, and that the said defendant should convey all of said roads, including the franchises, rights of way, ties, rails, roadbed, bridges, trestles, and culverts, to plaintiffs, and should execute and give a sufficient deed of conveyance to plaintiffs for all defendant's right, title, and interest therein. That defendant constructed and operated the road, according to the terms of the contract, until on or about February 19, 1889, at which time a suit was commenced by a certain bank to foreclose a mortgage upon the property, real and personal, of defendant, in the circuit court of the United States. That the mortgage was executed by defendant to the bank to secure the sum of $250,000. That such suit was pending when this action was commenced, and is still pending. That on the 19th day of February, 1889, the said circuit court, by its order duly made, appointed a receiver of all the goods, property, estate, and effects of defendant, who duly qualified, and on that day took possession of all the property last mentioned, and has ever since maintained such possession. That all the property in question here was included in the property so taken. That the defendant did not fail to perform its contracts with the plaintiffs in any particular until the receiver took possession, but that the receiver failed and ceased to operate the road on the 25th of February, 1889. That by the order of said circuit court, defendant, its agents and servants, and all persons whomsoever, were restrained and enjoined from in any way interfering with the possession or control of the property, or from selling, transfering, conveying, leasing, or otherwise disposing of or incumbering any of said property. That due demand, before suit, was made for the conveyance, etc., which was refused. On these facts, were plaintiffs entitled to judgment? The trial court held that they were not, apparently for two reasons, both of which are urged here in support of the judgment: First, want of performance is excused because it was prevented by operation of law, (section 1511, Civil Code;) and, second, the conveyance sought would interfere with the possession of the receiver and of the federal court. No case has been cited in which it has been held that interference by a writ, sued out by a private litigant, will excuse performance of a contract, although it may deprive the contractor of the means of performance. It is not prevention by operation of law. It is the act of an individual, and not of the government. In a certain sense, the property so taken may be in the custody of the law, and yet the seizure may be wrongful, and the suitor held responsible, as for a trespass, in damages. The law recognizes the fact that these private remedies may be wrongfully, that is, illegally, used, and the litigant is required to give security for any damage that may be caused if it should be finally decided that the writ was improperly issued. This cannot be called the "operation of law," within the meaning of the Civil Code. The obligor contracts that he can and will control the acts of third parties, so far as necessary to enable him to perform his contract. People v. Bartlett, 3 Hill, 570. Nor would it be a defense that the law has rendered it difficult or very expensive to perform. The rule is, if performance is in itself possible, there is a breach, although the obligor himself may have become wholly unable to perform. The suit to foreclose the mortgage against the property of defendant did not render performance impossible; defendant could have paid the claim or given security, and have had the receiver discharged. "To warrant the application of the principle, the impossibility must consist in the nature of the thing to be done, and not in the inability of the party to do it; or, as it is sometimes termed, be an impossibilitas rei, as distinguished from an impossibilitas facti. If the thing could be accomplished by any one with proper means and the requisite skill and knowledge, the promisor was not less answerable because it was impossible to him." Hare, Cont. 639. "The principle deducible from the authorities is that, if what is agreed to be done is possible or lawful, it must be done. Difficulty or improbability of accomplishing the undertaking will not avail the defendant. It must be shown that the thing cannot by any means be effected. Nothing short of this will excuse nonperformance." The Harriman, 9 Wall. 172. But it seems to me the very fact that the thing can be done, although it may be very expensive, to wit, it may require the defendant to liquidate and pay an unjust claim, shows that performance is not prevented by operation of law. It is not the law operating upon the facts which creates the difficulty, but the use of a judicial writ by a private litigant. Suppose the receiver had been appointed after decree in favor of the mortgagee; it would be obvious the defendant could continue to operate the road by paying its debt. So far as there is anything in the second point which is not included in the first, it is enough to say that a conveyance, such as is sought here, could not disturb the possession of the receiver, or embarrass him in the discharge of his duties. Bank v. Schermerhorn, 9 Paige, 372. Even should it necessitate bringing in new parties in the foreclosure suit, or place the assignees in a position to intervene, there could be no objection on that ground; much less would it constitute a contempt of the mandate of the circuit court. I think judgment should be reversed, and a specific performance decreed on the findings.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, and the superior court directed to enter a judgment upon the findings in favor of plaintiff in accordance with the prayer of the complaint.

HIGH v. BANK OF COMMERCE. (No. 14,642.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 23, 1892.)

CONSTITUTIONAL LAW — DUE PROCESS OF LAW — SUPPLEMENTAL PROCEEDINGS IN GARNISHMENT—COMPLAINT IN—SUFFICIENCY.

1. Code Civil Proc. § 720, which authorizes a judge by order to permit the judgment creditor to institute supplemental proceedings on a judgment against a debtor of the judgment debtor, is not unconstitutional as taking property without due process of law, though it does not provide for notice of such proceedings to the judgment debtor.

2. The complaint in such supplemental proceedings sufficiently shows that judgment was rendered in the principal case, where it alleges that plaintiff "recovered a judgment, * * * which judgment was duly entered," etc.

3. In such case, on a general demurrer, the allegation that the order allowing the proceedings was "duly made" is sufficient, even if the specific facts set out are defective.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; W. L. PIERCE, Judge.

Action by John E. High against the Bank of Commerce. Defendant had judgment on demurrer, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

D. L. Withington, for appellant. Luce & McDonald, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. The plaintiff became the assignee of a judgment obtained by one Keturah White against N. A. Comstock and Carl Trotsche and W. E. High. He brought this action against the defendant here, as garnishee of Comstock and Trotsche, in proceedings supplemental to execution, under the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure contained in sections 716 to 720, inclusive. A demurrer to the complaint was filed by the defendant, to the effect that the pleading in question did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer was sustained, and, plaintiff declining to amend the complaint, judgment was rendered for the defendant, from which the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

The first contention of the respondent, which we will notice, is that in which he asserts that section 720 of the Code of Civil Procedure is unconstitutional. He bases this view of the matter upon a decision of the appellate court in Bryant v. Bank, (Cal.) 8 Pac. Rep. 644, where it is said by Mr. Justice MYRICK: "Inasmuch as no notice to the judgment debtor of the proceeding authorized by section 720 of the Code of Civil Procedure is provided for, we are of opinion that that section which purports to authorize the judge, by order, to permit the judgment creditor to institute and maintain an action against the alleged debtor of the judgment debtor, is unconstitutional and void. This not only for the protection of the rights of the judgment debtor, but also for the protection of those of his alleged debtor who might otherwise be compelled to pay twice." It has been held in Hexter v. Clifford, 5 Colo. 168, in reference to a statute similar to that of California, that no such notice is required; and this seems to be the view entertained in New York to the qualification that notice may be given in the discretion of the judge. 4 Wait, Pr. 131. Jurisdiction having been once acquired over the judgment debtor in the original action, that action is still pending until the judgment is satisfied. Proceedings to compel the application of money or property in the hands of other parties to the satisfaction of the judgment are proceedings in that action. 4 Wait, Pr. (b) p. 128. So far as the judgment debtor is concerned, he cannot complain. He is a party to the judgment, and is fully aware of the legal effect of it, viz., that what his debtors owe him can be applied, by proper proceedings in the action which is still pending, to the satisfaction of his judgment debts; and due process of law has been had to make him aware of that fact. If, then, anything is due from his debtor, he is not injured if it is so applied. If nothing is due him from such debtor, then the matter is of no concern to him. The debtor of the judgment debtor is not to be permitted to say that he cannot protect himself against paying the debt twice, first to the creditor of the judgment debtor in this proceeding, and then to the judgment debtor, who has no notice of the proceeding; the reason for this being that the debtor of the judgment debtor is not without a remedy to prevent this result in the proceeding itself, in that all he is required to do to accomplish that result is that he suggest that his creditor, the judgment debtor, be made a party to the proceeding; and, since he can protect himself, it is idle to say he may be compelled to pay his debt twice. The statute in question must be held to contemplate this, and not that any such thing could be accomplished as that the debtor of a judgment debtor might, under its provisions, be made to pay a debt twice. We therefore see no force in the suggestion that the statute is unconstitutional, in that the judgment debtor has under it no notice of the supplementary proceeding after judgment affecting his rights of property. And the contention is equally without force that such has been the decision binding on the appellate court in Bryant v. Bank, supra. In Collins v. Angell, 72 Cal. 513, 14 Pac. Rep. 135, Mr. Justice McFARLAND, speaking for the court, virtually declares that no constitutional question was decided in the case first mentioned. And it appears from 7 Pac. Rep. 128, where the case on which the respondent relies was first determined in department, and in 8 Pac. Rep. 644, where the same case was heard in bank, that at the most only three of the judges took the view contended for by respondent.

But the respondent contends further that the complaint does not show that the judgment made the basis for this proceeding is valid, and that it is not shown by that pleading that a valid order was made authorizing the proceeding to be commenced. The allegation in question relative to the judgment is "that, upon the 2d day of March, 1891, Keturah White recovered a judgment in this superior court, * * * which judgment was duly entered," etc. The respondent says that this is not a sufficient statement to show that the judgment "was duly given." In McCutcheon v. Weston, 65 Cal. 39, 2 Pac. Rep. 727, it was held that an averment that a judgment was "recovered, entered, and docketed" was sufficient. As this docketing is only to fix a lien of the judgment already entered in the judgment book on the real property of the debtor, (Code Civil Proc. § 671,) we do not think it essential to aver such docketing to show that the judgment was "duly given," if it is already averred that it was "recovered" and "entered." As to the insufficiency of the averments with reference to the order authorizing suit, it seems that, as against a general demurrer, the allegation that it was "duly made" is sufficient, even if the specific facts set out are defective, which we do not decide. Dore v. Thornburgh, 90 Cal. 66, 27 Pac. Rep. 30; Bull v. Houghton, 65 Cal. 422, 4 Pac. Rep. 529. We therefore conclude that the demurrer was improperly sustained, and that the judgment appealed from should be reversed, and so advise.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment appealed from is reversed.

WATT et al. v. BRADLEY. (No. 14,660.)

AFFIDAVIT OF DEFENSE—FILING PAPERS—OMITTING TITLE OF ACTION.

1. An affidavit which is not entitled, but which refers "to the above-entitled action," and is annexed to and filed with papers which are duly entitled, must be understood to refer to the title stated in those papers, and is sufficient, under Code Civil Proc. § 1046, providing that "an affidavit, notice, or other paper, without the title of the action, * * * is as valid and effectual for any purpose as if duly entitled, if it intelligibly refer to such action."

2. Where an affidavit of defense states that defendant is advised by counsel that he has a good, substantial, and complete defense, a statement that he believes such advice is unnecessary.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; J. H. BUDD, Judge.

Action by Robert Watt and others, directors of the Stockton State Insane Asylum, against Charles Bradley, administrator of Paul Bradley, deceased, to recover for services rendered the wife of defendant's intestate. From an order changing the place of trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Carter & Smith, for appellants. B. F. Thomas, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. This action was commenced in the county of San Joaquin to recover $3,175.35 for medical attention, nursing, support, etc., alleged to have been furnished to the wife of defendant's intestate in said asylum, situate in said county, at the request of said intestate. On motion of defendant the court ordered a change of the place of trial from the county of San Joaquin to the county of Santa Barbara, on the alleged ground that defendant was a resident of the latter county. The plaintiffs appeal from this order and contend that the affidavit of defendant upon which the order was made is insufficient. The following is a copy of the affidavit: "In the superior court of the county of San Joaquin, state of California. Robert Watt, Arthur Thornton, H. T. Dorrance, Obed Harvey, and R. S. Johnson, as the board of directors of the Stockton State Insane Asylum, Plaintiffs. State of California, county of Santa Barbara—ss.: Charles Bradley, being first duly sworn, deposes and says that he is the defendant in the above-entitled action. That he now is, and at the time the above-entitled action was commenced, and for twenty years prior thereto, had been, a resident of the county of Santa Barbara, state of California, and was such resident when the summons in said action was served on him, which service was in said Santa Barbara county. That I have fully and fairly stated the case in this action, and fully and fairly stated all the facts relating to such action, to my counsel and attorney in said action, B. F. Thomas, an attorney at law residing in the city and county of Santa Barbara, state of California, and after such statement to my said attorney, I am advised by him that I have a good, substantial, and complete defense on the merits of said action. CHARLES BRADLEY."

1. It is contended that the affidavit does not intelligibly refer to this action, because the title of this action is not fully stated in the affidavit. The bill of exceptions shows that the notice of the motion "stated that said motion would be made upon the affidavit and demand of defendant to change the place of trial, annexed and served with said notice, and upon said notice and all of the papers and pleadings on file in said action." Both the notice and demand "were duly entitled in the action," and the affidavit was filed with the notice. Therefore the reference in the affidavit to the "above-entitled action" must have been understood to refer to the title of the action stated in the demand and in the notice to which the affidavit was annexed, and with which it was served. This was sufficient, under section 1046 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which provides that "an affidavit, notice, or other paper, without the title of the action, * * * or with a defective title, is as valid and effectual for any purpose as if duly entitled, if it intelligibly refer to such action."

2. The only other objection to the affidavit is that it fails to state that the affiant believes the advice of his counsel that he had "a good, substantial, and complete defense on the merits of said action." It is enough that he fairly and fully stated the facts of his case to his attorney at law, and that upon that statement his attorney advised him, as matter of law, that those facts constituted a meritorious defense to the action. He was entitled to act upon the advice of his attorney as to what was the law applicable to those facts, unless it appear that he had reason to believe the advice was not given in good faith; for the presumption is that the advice was asked and given in good faith, and that the defendant confided in it, if nothing appear to the contrary. What is the law applicable to a given state of facts is rather a matter of opinion than of belief, as to which the opinion of the nonprofessional client is of so little consequence that a court would not act upon it for any purpose. I find nothing in any of the cases cited by counsel opposed to these views, and therefore think the order should be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order appealed from is affirmed.

WIEBOLD et al. v. RAUER et al. (No. 14,926.)

APPEAL BOND—DEPOSIT IN LIEU—SUBSTITUTION OF UNDERTAKING.

Where one, in lieu of giving an undertaking on appeal, has made a deposit of money under the provision of Code Civil Proc. § 948, the supreme court will not, in the absence of statutory authority, allow the substitution of an undertaking for the money deposit.

In bank.

Action by one Wiebold and others against one Rauer and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Defendants apply for an order permitting them to substitute an undertaking for money deposited in lieu of appeal bond. Motion denied.

G. H. Perry, for appellants. W. C. Kennedy, for respondents.

PATERSON, J. This is an application for an order permitting appellants to substitute undertakings in place of the money deposited in the court below, in lieu of undertakings on appeal. Undertakings were filed in the court below in due time after notice of appeal, but exception was taken by respondents to the sufficiency of the sureties therein. On the day fixed for the justification of the sureties the latter failed to appear before the judge of the court below. Thereafter, and in due time, the appellants deposited the amount of the judgment appealed from, and $300 in addition thereto, which, under section 948, Code Civil Proc., was equivalent to the giving of sufficient undertakings. The petitioner has presented to this court undertakings in due form, and asks to have the same approved and filed, and to be allowed to withdraw the money deposited in the court below. The statute gives an appellant the right to perfect his appeal and secure a stay of proceedings on the judgment, either by giving certain undertakings, or by depositing in the court below the amount of the judgment appealed from, and $300 in addition thereto. The appellant chose the latter proceeding, and, by depositing in the court below the sum required by the statute, perfected his appeal. There is no statutory authority for the order which he now requests the court to make, but, assuming that the court has the discretion to allow him to withdraw his deposit and give a new undertaking, we have no disposition to exercise that discretion in his favor. The court is already heavily burdened with multifarious original proceedings, not usually imposed upon appellate courts, and we have no desire to increase them by establishing a precedent for another, and especially one a denial of which affects no substantial right of either party to the appeal. If the motion were granted, and a new undertaking were filed here, the respondent might be compelled to again examine into the question of the sufficiency of the sureties on the undertaking, give notice of exception, and to appear before the judge at the time and place of justification. This would be manifestly unjust to him. The appellant has made his choice of procedure, and, having had the benefit of it, should not now be allowed to retract and file undertakings. The only prejudice he can suffer by a denial of this motion is being deprived of the use of the money until the appeal is determined. Motion denied.

SIEGEL v. HIS CREDITORS. (No. 14,861.)

INSOLVENCY—DISCHARGE OF DEBTOR—FRAUD—FAILURE TO KEEP BOOKS.

1. The insolvent act of 1880, § 49, providing that no discharge shall be granted to an insolvent debtor if he has been guilty of fraud, refers to frauds which affect the mass of his creditors, and the fact that one debt was created by fraud is not ground for refusing a discharge as to other debts.

2. Under the insolvent act of 1880, § 49, providing that an insolvent shall not be discharged "if, being a merchant or tradesman, he has not kept proper books of account," a discharge should not be refused because the insolvent did not keep an account of small sums borrowed, which it does not appear were used in his regular business, which were in each case repaid in two days, and the items of cash used in the payment of which appear on the bank account in the books used in his business.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; LUCIEN SHAW, Judge.

Application by Myer Siegel for his discharge as an insolvent debtor. The application was granted, and certain creditors appeal. Affirmed.

Graff & Latham, for appellants. Roberts & Robinson, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. The respondent filed his petition in insolvency on the 21st day of May, 1890, and was thereupon adjudged to be an insolvent debtor. In due time he applied to the court for a discharge from his debts, and two of his creditors, Walter M. Patrick and Jacoby Bros., opposed the discharge. The specifications of the grounds of opposition, so far as they need be stated, were that the respondent had been guilty of fraud, contrary to the true intent of the insolvent act, in that, on the 5th of April, 1890, he, by false and fraudulent representations as to his financial standing, induced Patrick Bros., the assignors of said Walter M. Patrick, to sell him certain goods of the value of $95, on a four-months credit, which had not expired when he filed his petition in insolvency, and that he knew said representations to be false, and made them with the intent to deceive and defraud said Patrick Bros.; and also that respondent for 18 months prior to the filing of his petition in insolvency was a retail dealer in boots and shoes, and did not during that time keep proper books of account. After trial, the court found upon the issues raised by the pleadings, among other things, that the respondent obtained from Patrick Bros. goods of the value of $95, on a four-months credit, as alleged, but that it was not such a fraud as would prevent the granting him a discharge from his other debts; and also that respondent was a retail dealer in boots and shoes for the period of 18 months immediately preceding the filing of his petition in insolvency, and that during that period from time to time he borrowed from one Nathan Siegel sums of money, in the aggregate amounting to $1,205; that no one of the sums so borrowed amounted to more than $75, and that each of the said sums was borrowed for a short time, and was repaid within two days; that no account of the said loans was kept on his books in the name of Nathan Siegel, "nor any account thereof, except that the items of cash paid out to the said Nathan Siegel in payment of said loans were entered in the bank account kept by said Myer Siegel on his books of said business;" that otherwise respondent kept proper books of account, and that his failure to enter on his books, to the particular account of Nathan Siegel, the said temporary loans, was not such a failure to keep proper books of account as would authorize the withholding the discharge. A decree was accordingly entered discharging the respondent from all his debts which under the insolvent law of this state were provable against his estate, and which existed on the 21st day of May, 1890, except the said debt of $95, due to Patrick Bros. From this decree the opposing creditors appealed, and have brought the case here for review on the findings. Section 49 of the insolvent act provides that no discharge shall be granted to an insolvent debtor if he has done or failed to do certain specified things, and, among others, if he "has been guilty of fraud contrary to the true intent of this act;" and section 52 provides that "no debt created by fraud or embezzlement of the debtor * * * shall be discharged under this act, but the debt may be proved, and the dividend thereon shall be a payment on account of said debt." Upon the authority of these sections and the decisions of the courts in regard to similar provisions found in the federal bankrupt act, it was decided by this court in the case of In re McEachran, 82 Cal. 219, 23 Pac. Rep. 46, that the fact that a particular debt was created by fraud was not ground for refusing a discharge from other debts; and the same doctrine was again declared in the case of Dyer v. Bradley, 89 Cal. 557, 26 Pac. Rep. 1103. The fraud of which the respondent here was found guilty is not included in any of the grounds specified in section 49 for withholding a discharge, unless it is included in the clause quoted. Appellants, however, contend that that clause was intended to cover a case like this; that it was not in the bankrupt act; and that it must have been overlooked in making the decisions above referred to; and hence that those decisions should be reconsidered and overruled. We do not think this contention should be sustained. It is true that the clause quoted is not found in the bankrupt act, but, in our opinion, it was not intended by it to change the rule many times declared by the bankruptcy courts in cases like this. It seems rather to refer to frauds which affect the mass of the creditors, and not some individual creditor alone. Nor was this clause overlooked when the opinions in the cases criticised were written. Those decisions were mainly rested upon section 52, which seems plainly to imply that a discharge may be granted notwithstanding there may be some debt which should be excepted from its operation, because it was fraudulently contracted. Appellants also contend that the discharge should have been denied because respondent had failed to keep proper books of account; but the only fault found with his books is that he did not keep in them, in the name of Nathan Siegel, an account of certain small sums of money borrowed from him, from time to time, during a period of 18 months. It does not appear that there were ever any other business transactions between the parties, and the court finds that the small loans were paid back within two days, and the payments were entered in the bank account kept by respondent in his books. One of the grounds specified in section 49 for refusing a discharge is: "If, being a merchant or tradesman, he [the debtor] has not kept proper books of account." The evident purpose of this provision was to require every merchant or tradesman to so keep his books that any competent person, by an examination of them, could ascertain and determine the real condition of his affairs; and if they be so kept, though imperfect, inartistic, and inaccurate in unimportant particulars, they will be treated as "proper books of account." Undoubtedly a trader should be held to the utmost good faith and reasonable care in keeping accounts of his business as such, but he is not required to enter in his books accounts of outside matters. In re Good, 78 Cal. 399, 20 Pac. Rep. 860. The question, then, as to whether books are "proper" or not is one to be determined in each particular case by the facts and circumstances there shown. Here the testimony is not brought up in the record, and we have only the findings to look to. The presumption is that every decision of a trial court is correct, unless error clearly appears. Looking, then, at the findings, does it clearly appear that the court below erroneously reached the conclusion that respondent's books were not so improperly kept as to warrant the withholding his discharge? We think not. So far as we can see, the small sums of money borrowed from time to time may have been for purposes wholly outside the boot and shoe business; and, if not, the books, notwithstanding the failure to enter those items, may have sufficiently shown the real condition of respondent's business affairs as a trader. In the case of In re Good, supra, cited by appellants, it appeared that the insolvents borrowed $10,000 to enable them to commence and continue their business, and that the money so borrowed constituted their capital stock. No account of this borrowed capital was entered in the books. As kept, the books showed that the firm was in good condition, when in fact it was utterly insolvent. Under these circumstances, it was held that "proper" books were not kept, and that a discharge was properly denied by the trial court. That case is not in point here. In our opinion, the decree or order appealed from should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order appealed from is affirmed.

DE PENA v. TRUJILLO. (No. 14,440.)

APPEAL WITHOUT MERIT—DAMAGES AS COSTS.

Defendant in ejectment, after pleading the general issue and possession for the statutory period, filed a disclaimer of any interest, but from a judgment for plaintiff, after a trial by the court, findings of fact being waived, he appealed. The record, however, contained no bill of exceptions or other showing of error, and defendant filed no brief or points and authorities. Held that, the appeal being manifestly without merit, $100 damages would be directed for plaintiff as part of the costs on appeal.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; J. L. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Ejectment by Jertrudes de Pena against Juan Trujillo. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Ezra Crossman and Goodcell & Leonard, for appellant. Byron Waters, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The complaint herein is the ordinary form of a complaint in ejectment. The defendant pleaded a general denial, together with an averment that he had been in the quiet possession of the premises described in the complaint for more than five years immediately preceding the filing of the complaint. Prior to the trial the defendant filed a disclaimer of any interest in the land sued for. The cause was tried by the court without a jury, findings of fact were waived, and judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff. From this judgment the defendant appealed directly to this court. The record contains no bill of exceptions or other showing of any error in the court below, and the appellant has not filed any brief or points and authorities in support of his appeal. The appeal is manifestly without merit, and the judgment is affirmed, and the superior court is directed to allow to the respondent $100 damages as a part of the costs on appeal.

Ex parte GORDAN. (No. 20,916.)

DIVORCE—CUSTODY OF CHILDREN—SUPPORT OF MINOR BY FATHER—CONTEMPT.

1. Under Civil Code, § 138, providing that in an action of divorce the court may give such direction for the custody of the children as may seem necessary, such order may be given, though neither party prays for the custody of the child, nor alleges the unfitness of the other in that respect.

2. In an action for divorce, an order requiring the husband to pay a certain amount to a third person for the support of his child is not a judgment in favor of a stranger to the action, but is a valid order for the payment of money to an agent of the court charged with the duty of carrying its decree into effect.

3. Such an order is based on Civil Code, §§ 196, 197, making it primarily the husband's duty to support his minor children, and hence may be issued, though the husband is not in fault in the matters involved in the case.

4. Such an order, though it describes the child by a wrong name, is valid if it sufficiently identify it.

5. Disobedience of such an order is contempt of court, for which the court has power to imprison.

In chambers. Petition by Robert Gordan for a writ of habeas corpus. Writ discharged.

James G. Maguire and Sullivan & Gallagher, for petitioner. Henry I. Kowalsky and T. J. Crowley, for sheriff of Solano county.

BEATTY, C. J. In December, 1887, the prisoner obtained a decree of divorce from his wife, Elka Gordan, on the ground of desertion. In his complaint for a divorce he alleged that the issue of his marriage with Elka Gordan was one female child, born August, 1885. He did not state the name of the child, nor did he allege any facts showing his fitness or his wife's unfitness to have her custody. The answer of Elka Gordan admitted the marriage, but denied generally all other allegations of the complaint, including, of course, the existence of the child. Neither party prayed for her custody, though the complaint contained a prayer for general relief. The cour-t, by its judgment granting the divorce, further ordered and decreed "that the custody of the child of said marriage, to wit, Leah Gordan, aged two years, be, until the further order of this court, placed in the charge and custody of the grandmother, Sarah Patek, to be by her cared for and sustained at the expense of plaintiff, Robert Gordan, in the city and county of San Francisco, California, and shall not be removed therefrom until further order of this court, or by consent of both parties, plaintiff and defendant." It appears from the evidence that this provision of the decree was inserted in pursuance of an agreement of the parties, by which the plaintiff promised to pay for the support of the child the sum of $25 per month. This agreement he performed punctually up to the month of December, 1889, when he refused to make any further payments. In January, 1890, Sarah Patek obtained a rule from the superior court commanding the plaintiff to show cause why he should not be required to pay $40 per month for the support of the child, and on the 25th of January, 1890, upon the hearing of the rule, an order was made in the action of Gordan v. Gordan, requiring Robert Gordan to pay to Sarah Patek, at her residence in San Francisco, the sum of $30 per month for the support of said child, designated in these proceedings as Lina or Lena Gordan. This order was complied with up to January, 1891, since which time the plaintiff has refused to make any further payments. In consequence of such refusal, several proceedings have been instituted against him, one of which is reviewed in Ex parte Gordan, 92 Cal. 478, 28 Pac. Rep. 489. After the decision in that case, plaintiff was again, in February, 1892, cited to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt of court in refusing to obey the order of January 25, 1890. In response to this order he appeared by counsel, and the court, after a full hearing, adjudged him guilty of the contempt charged, and ordered him to be imprisoned in the county jail until he paid the amount due and unpaid under said order of January 25, 1890. Upon this order a warrant was issued, under which the plaintiff was imprisoned by the sheriff of Solano county, and thereupon this proceeding was instituted for the purpose of securing his discharge from custody.

Four objections are made to the validity of the complaint: First, that under the pleadings in Gordan v. Gordan, the court had no jurisdiction to award the custody of Leah Gordan to Sarah Patek; second, that the court had no jurisdiction to order the plaintiff to pay money to Sarah Patek, a stranger to the action; third, that the order of January 25, 1890, is to pay money for the support of Lina Gordan, a different person from Leah Gordon; fourth, that it is a violation of the constitution to enforce this order by imprisonment.

As to the first point, I think section 138[1] of the Civil Code gave the court jurisdiction to make a proper order for the custody of the child. Its jurisdiction did not depend upon specific allegations as to the fitness of the respective parties, or their ability or willingness, to care for their offspring, nor upon a specific prayer for the custody. The pleadings would seem to indicate that one of the parties was oblivious of the child's existence, and that both were indifferent as to what should become of her; but this did not prevent the court from taking care of her interests. On the contrary, it furnished a good ground for the order that was made. Nor is it any objection to the validity of the order that there were no proceedings under section 1747 et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure. Those sections prescribe the proceedings for the appointment of guardians generally, and afford one means of acquiring jurisdiction to dispose of the custody of minors, but they are not exclusive. In actions for divorce the court may always make such orders for the custody and maintenance of minor children of the marriage as may seem to be necessary. Civil Code, § 138.

[1] Civil Code, § 138, provides that "in an action for divorce the court may, before or after judgment, give such direction for the custody, care, and education of the children of the marriage as may seem necessary and proper, and may at any time vacate or modify the same."

2. The order of January 25, 1890, was not a judgment in favor of a stranger. It was an order for the payment of money to an agent or officer of the court, charged with the duty of carrying its decree into effect. The decision in Sharon v. Sharon, 75 Cal. 38, 39, 16 Pac. Rep. 345, has no application. The power to compel the father to support his minor child does not depend wholly upon section 139 of the Civil Code. Whether he is with or without fault in the matters involved in the divorce suit, it is primarily his duty to support his minor children. Civil Code, §§ 196, 197. The wife, by her fault, may forfeit her own claim to be supported by her husband, but she cannot forfeit the claims of their children.

3. The names Lena or Lina Gordan, and Leah Gordan are not the same, nor are they idem sonans; but it happens that the child so variously designated is sufficiently identified throughout these proceedings by other terms of description, e. g., the sole issue of the marriage of Robert and Elka Gordan.

4. The last objection is the most serious of all, and, if the question were a new one, I should hesitate to decide that payment in this case can be enforced by imprisonment; but I can see no distinction in principle between orders for the payment of alimony to the wife and orders to pay money for the support of minor children; and it is settled in this state that refusal to pay alimony is a contempt of court, punishable by imprisonment, or, what is the same thing in effect, that a party found to have the ability to pay may be imprisoned until he obeys. Ex parte Perkins, 18 Cal. 60; Ex parte Cottrell, 59 Cal. 417. I see nothing unlawful in the imprisonment. The writ is discharged, and the prisoner remanded.

CITY OF SANTA BARBARA v. ELDRED.

(No. 14,858.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—TAXES—JURISDICTION—CONSTRUCTION OF STATUTES—PLEADING AND PROOF—VARIANCE.

1. In an action to recover city taxes it appeared the police court wrongfully retained jurisdiction of the case after demand was made to transfer to the superior court, and appeal was taken from a judgment on the merits to the latter court. Parties appeared in the superior court, and trial was had on the issues. Held that, as the superior court had original jurisdiction of the subject-matter, such jurisdiction was not affected by the irregular manner by which it got jurisdiction of the parties.

2. Act March 10, 1874, § 10, under which plaintiff was incorporated, provides for the levy of an annual tax, not exceeding 1 per cent., for the payment of certain bonds and the interest thereon, and the current expenses of the city. Act March 15, 1876, § 3, amends section 10 "so as to read as follows: To provide for the payment of said bonds, and the interest thereon, an annual tax shall be assessed and collected not exceeding one fourth of one per cent. * * *" The general law, (Pol. Code, § 4371,) taking effect in 1873, provides: "The direct taxes imposed by a common council in any one year must not exceed two per centum of the valuation of property within the city;" and Pol. Code, § 4408, confers on common councils power to levy and collect taxes. Held, that Act March 10, 1874, merely suspended the operation of Pol. Code, § 4371, as to plaintiff, and that section 3, Act March 15, 1876, repealed the act of 1874, as to levy of taxes for current expenses, leaving Pol. Code, § 4371, as the only limitation on the city council of plaintiff to levy taxes, and a levy by such council of $1.50 on each $100 of taxable property was not in excess of power.

3. Where, in an action to recover city taxes, the complaint alleged the rate of the levy to be $1.50 on each $100, and it appeared from the amount of tax for which suit was brought that it was computed at such rate, and the ordinance of plaintiff in evidence showed that the levy for taxes was made on the basis of $1.40 on each $100, there was a fatal variance between the pleading and proof.

4. In such case the supreme court has no power on affidavits to correct the record by amending the copy of the ordinance so that it may conform to the allegations of the complaint.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Barbara county; R. M. DILLARD, Judge.

Action by the city of Santa Barbara against A. Eldred to recover city taxes assessed against defendant's property. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

B. F. Thomas, for appellant. Thos. McNulta, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. Action brought in the police court to recover city taxes assessed against the property of appellant. A demurrer to the complaint was overruled, whereupon appellant answered, setting forth, among other matters, that the common council had no power to levy the tax; that the same was illegal and void, and asking that the action be transferred to the superior court for trial, under the provisions of section 838 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The application for a transfer was denied, and the court proceeded to hear the cause upon its merits, whereupon judgment was rendered for plaintiff for the sum demanded and costs. Appellant took an appeal to the superior court from the judgment on questions of both law and fact, and judgment was again rendered in favor of respondent. A motion for a new trial, based upon a statement of the case, was denied, and this appeal is prosecuted from the judgment and order denying a new trial. If the answer of appellant, filed in the police court, did not raise an issue as to the legality of the tax sought to be recovered, it follows that the judgment of the superior court was final, and this appeal should be dismissed, but upon an examination of the pleadings it is apparent that such an issue is presented. In the case of Santa Cruz v. Railroad Co., 56 Cal. 143, it was incidentally said that there was no provision of law authorizing a transfer of a cause from a police court to a district court, but we cannot subscribe to such doctrine. Section 933 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "All proceedings in civil actions in police courts must, except as in this title otherwise provided, be conducted in the same manner as civil actions in justices' courts." In the case of City of Santa Barbara v. Stearns, 51 Cal. 499, the transfer of a cause from the police court to the district court was expressly approved as being authorized under the foregoing section of the Code, and there can be no doubt but that the section is sufficiently broad to furnish authority for such a course. The verified answer of appellant having disclosed facts which required a transfer of the cause to the superior court, from the time of the filing of such answer the police court was ousted of its jurisdiction to proceed further upon the merits presented by the pleadings. People v. Mier, 24 Cal. 61; City of Santa Barbara, supra. Such being the fact, the judgment of the police court was void, and, if it possessed sufficient value to entitle it to the dignity of an attack, could have been successfully assailed by defendant in various ways. But, entirely disregarding the action of the lower court upon the jurisdictional question, appellant carried the case to the superior court by appeal, upon questions of both law and fact, and proceeded to trial upon the merits. The proper procedure certainly would have been for the superior court to have set aside the judgment and ordered the police court to remand the cause in accordance with section 838, heretofore cited. Under such a course the superior court would have obtained jurisdiction of the cause in the regular and orderly way, and, upon the right to appeal to this court, there could be no question. The police court had no jurisdiction to try the cause upon the merits, and it necessarily follows that the superior court had no appellate jurisdiction to try the case at all. But the superior court had original jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and the fact that the case gained ingress to it by way other than the front door in no manner affects its jurisdiction to hear and determine the cause. Having jurisdiction over the subject-matter, the court obtained jurisdiction over the parties when, without objection, they proceeded to trial upon the main issue, and then its jurisdiction became complete. The course adopted was a serious irregularity in procedure, but not jurisdictional, and becomes entirely immaterial when we consider the case, as we shall consider it, from the standpoint of being an original action brought in the superior court. If the appellate jurisdiction from the police court, and the original jurisdiction upon matters involving the legality of a tax, etc., were not both vested in the superior court, then the course pursued in City of Santa Barbara v. Stearns would have to be followed, and the cause sent back, with instructions to remand to the proper court. But the situation here presented is entirely different, and the case is clearly before us upon its merits. In Randolph Co. v. Ralls, 18 Ill. 29, a case entirely similar in principle, the court said: "The circuit court, then, had original jurisdiction of the subject-matter, and the parties, by voluntarily appearing and consenting to a trial between them upon that subject-matter, waived all objection to jurisdiction of the parties. The suit stood, so far as the jurisdiction of the court is concerned, the same as if it had been originally commenced in the circuit court in the ordinary way, and the parties brought in by the service of process; or if they had voluntarily entered their appearance without any previous proceedings, and without objection gone to trial. In the case of Allen v. Belcher, 3 Gilman, 594, the suit was commenced before a probate justice of the peace, and appealed to the circuit court, where the parties appeared, and the cause was by consent tried; and, upon error, this court held that it was immaterial whether the probate justice had jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the suit, * * * and the parties having consented to its jurisdiction of their persons, the circuit court might adjudicate upon the subject-matter as an original cause. * * * It would be trifling with courts and the rights of parties to permit suitors, after voluntarily appearing and going to trial, to avail themselves of objection to the preliminary proceedings by which the cause of the parties were in court. These are dilatory matters, which they may waive, and they are deemed to have waived them by full appearance without objection."

It is contended that the levy of taxes at the rate of $1.50 upon each $100 of taxable property was in excess of the power of the common council. The city of Santa Barbara was incorporated under an act of the legislature approved March 10, 1874; the following sections of which act read as follows: "Section 1. The territory described in the second section of this act, and the inhabitants thereof, are hereby declared to be a municipal corporation under the Political Code of this State." "Sec. 10. To provide for the payment of the said bonds and the interest thereon, and the current expenses of the said city, an annual tax shall be assessed, and levied and collected, not exceeding one per cent.; and one third of the money resulting from the said tax shall be devoted to the payment of the annual interest of the said bonds, and constitute a sinking fund for their redemption." An amendatory act to the foregoing charter was approved March 15, 1876, of which act section 3 is as follows: "Sec. 3. Section 10 of said act is hereby amended so as to read as follows: Sec. 10. To provide for the payment of said bonds, and the interest thereon, an annual tax shall be assessed and collected not exceeding one fourth of one per cent., and the money resulting from the said tax shall be devoted to the payment of the interest of the said bonds, and constitute a sinking fund for their redemption."

Under the general law of the state pertaining to municipal corporations which took effect January 1, 1873, we find section 4371 of the Political Code, which reads:

"The direct taxes imposed by a common council in any one year must not exceed two per centum of the valuation of property within the city." Also section 4408, referring to the powers of the common council, subd. 19, "to levy and collect taxes." With this legislation before us it is apparent what the power of the common council as to the levy of taxes was at the time the levy here involved was ordered. The general power to levy and collect taxes is expressly granted to respondent by said section 4408, and, in the absence of section 10 of the act of 1874, the limitation of the power of the common council in fixing the rate of the levy would be found in section 4371 of the Political Code, already quoted. But section 10 of this act declares a different limitation, and must control and supersede the general law, as far as respondent's interests are involved. Section 3 of the act of 1876 makes a most material amendment to section 10, and as section 10 stands amended it results in the repeal of all those portions of the original section referring to the levy of a tax for current expenses of the city government, and leaves the limitation upon the power of the council with reference only to the tax to be levied and collected to pay interest upon and establish a sinking fund for the payment of certain bonds. If appellant's contention were true, that section 10 of the act of 1874 repealed section 4371 of the Political Code, then the repeal of the material portions of section 10 by the act of 1876 left the power of the council to levy a direct tax entirely without statutory control or limitation of any kind, and the validity of the levy here involved would necessarily withstand attack. But section 10 did not repeal the general law upon the subject. It is plain that a special act of the legislature, pertaining to one city, cannot repeal a general law pertaining to all cities. Neither can it properly be said to be in full effect as to other cities and repealed as to respondent. The effect of the enactment of section 10 was simply to suspend the operation of the general provision of law as to respondent, and when section 10 was repealed the suspension no longer existed, and respondent came under the operation of the general law. Again, it may be said the special provision excepted respondent from the effect of the general law, to the same extent as though it were a part of the general law, and when the provision creating the exception was repealed the operation of the general law was extended to that extent. See Smith v. Hoyt, 14 Wis. 252; Heinssen v. State, (Colo. Sup.) 23 Pac. Rep. 995. We conclude that section 4371 of the Political Code is in full force and effect as to respondent.

Appellant makes many objections to the rulings of the court upon the admissibility of evidence, but owing to the fact that the cause must be returned to the lower court for a new trial, and those matters may not again arise, we refrain from reviewing the assignments based upon such rulings. The complaint alleges that the rate of the levy made by the council was $1.50 upon each $100 of taxable property, and by calculation it is demonstrated that the amount of the tax for which suit is brought was computed at such rate. The ordinance of respondent, found in the record, shows that the levy for taxes was made upon the basis of $1.40 per each $100 of taxable property. A fatal variance is thus created between the pleading and the proof. Respondent, since the argument of the cause in this court, has presented affidavits asking us to correct the statement upon motion for a new trial, by amending the copy of the ordinance set out therein so that it shall conform to the allegations of the complaint. We have no power to adopt such a course, as has been fully decided in Hyde v. Boyle, 86 Cal. 352, 24 Pac. Rep. 1059, and In re Gates, 90 Cal. 257, 27 Pac. Rep. 195. Let the judgment and order be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: PATERSON, J.; HARRISON, J.

REBMAN v. SAN GABRIEL VAL. LAND & WATER CO. (No. 14,708.)

BUILDING CONTRACT—FAILURE TO RECORD—QUANTUM MERUIT—EVIDENCE.

1. Where a written contract for furnishing materials and erecting buildings is void for failure to record it, as required by Code Civil Proc. § 1183, the party furnishing such materials and erecting such buildings may maintain an action on an implied contract for the value thereof; Code Civil Proc. § 1197, providing that nothing in the foregoing statute shall be construed to impair or affect the right of any person to whom any debt may be due for work done or materials furnished, to maintain a personal action to recover such debt against the person liable therefor.

2. Such unrecorded contract is not conclusive evidence of the value of the labor and materials.

3. A finding by the court that a written contract was void is equivalent to finding that there was no written contract.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; J. W. MCKINLEY, Judge.

Action by John Rebman against the San Gabriel Valley Land & Water Company to recover for labor and materials furnished in the erection of buildings. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

A. H. Judson and M. C. Hester, for appellant. J. T. Houx and John Haynes, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. This is an appeal by defendant from a judgment of $8,263.24 against it for a balance found to be due the plaintiff for work and labor and materials furnished in building an hotel, a laundry, a gas house, and for repairing the hotel. The appeal is upon the judgment roll containing a bill of exceptions raising questions of law and fact. A distinct written contract was signed and delivered by the parties for the construction of each of the buildings above mentioned, and for the repairing of the hotel, before the work was commenced. The contract price for furnishing materials and building the hotel was $48,900. For the laundry it was $1,100. For the gas house it was $484. And for repairing the hotel it was $595. None of these contracts was ever filed or recorded in the office of the county recorder of the county in which the buildings are situated. They were made at different times, the contract for the hotel being first in order of time. The complaint consists of five counts: (1) to recover the reasonable value of the labor and material in building the hotel, alleged to be $53,602.76, less $47,000 paid thereon; (2) to recover the reasonable value of labor and materials in building the laundry, alleged to be $1,100, less $863.50 paid; (3) a special count upon the written contract for building the hotel, to recover a balance of $1,900, alleged to be unpaid; (4) a special count upon the gas house contract, to recover a balance of $104.06, alleged to be due and unpaid; and (5) a special count upon the written contract for repairing the hotel, to recover an alleged balance of $127.95. The prayer of the complaint is that plaintiff recover the sum of these several balances with interest. The complaint is not verified. The answer of defendant (1) denies each and every allegation in the complaint; (2) alleges payment in full; (3) alleges, in answer to the first count, that all the labor done and materials furnished for the hotel were done and furnished under and in pursuance of the written contract, and that defendant has fully performed its part of said contract; (4) alleges, in answer to the second count, that the labor and materials done and furnished for the laundry were done and furnished under a written contract, which defendant had fully performed on its part; (5) in further answer to the third count alleges that, by the contract therein mentioned, the plaintiff was required to complete the hotel by the 8th day of December, 1887, but failed to complete it until April, 1888, by reason whereof defendant sustained damages in the sum of $6,000, which is pleaded as a counterclaim; (6) in answer to the fourth and fifth counts, alleges full performance of the contracts therein mentioned on its part; and (7) alleges, in answer to the entire complaint, a settlement of all matters mentioned therein, and payment in full of the balance agreed upon in the settlement, which payment was accepted by plaintiff in full satisfaction of all claims against defendant on account of all matters mentioned in the complaint. The defendant also filed an unverified cross complaint, claiming damages for nonperformance of the written contract for the building of the hotel within the time limited by, or in accordance with the specifications of, that contract, which cross complaint was answered by a general denial thereof. The court found for the plaintiff upon all the issues, except those arising upon the third count of the complaint, as to which it found that the hotel contract, upon which that count was based, had not been filed in the recorder's office, and was therefore void.

1. Counsel for appellant contend that the first count of the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, because it does not show that the implied contract, upon which it rests, was filed in the recorder's office in accordance with section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure, although it appears that the amount agreed to be paid thereunder exceeds $1,000. But the first count does not show that any particular amount was agreed to be paid for the labor and materials expended in building the hotel, but only that such labor and materials "were reasonably worth $53,602.76." Nor does the Code provide for recording an implied contract, even conceding that it would be possible and practicable to record such a contract. But the real question intended to be presented under this head is expressed by counsel for appellant as follows: "Can parties, who have failed to put their contract in writing, avoid the force and penalty of the statute by suing a quantum meruit or quantum valebat?" Of course no party can evade the force or penalty of the statute. Counsel's question, however, assumes that the statute applies to implied contracts, and that the penalty is incurred by a failure to record an implied contract, and thus evades the only question in dispute, viz., what are the force and the penalty of the statute? The statute literally applies only to express contracts, stating the mutual obligations of the parties thereto, thereafter to be performed, and requires such contracts to be reduced to writing and filed in the recorder's office "before the work is commenced." Yet no implied contract for labor or materials is complete until after the labor is done or the materials furnished at the request of the owner of the contemplated structure. Neither the mere request of such owner for the performance of labor, or the furnishing of materials, nor the mere performance of labor or the furnishing of materials without such request, express or implied, constitutes a complete contract by implication. An implied contract arises only from the request of one party and performance by the other, though the request is often inferred from the circumstances attending the performance. It follows that the legislature could not have intended to require implied contracts for labor and materials to be written and recorded before the commencement of the work. Nor does the statute expressly, or by necessary implication, prohibit an action upon such implied contracts, to recover the value of the labor or materials, though such value may exceed $1,000. See Kiessig v. Allspaugh, 91 Cal. 234, 27 Pac. Rep. 662. On the contrary, section 1197 of the chapter on liens seems to except such contracts from the penalty of a failure to record: "Sec. 1197. Nothing contained in this chapter shall be construed to impair or affect the right of any person to whom any debt may be due for work done, or materials furnished, to maintain a personal action to recover such debt against the person liable therefor." In Holland v. Wilson, 76 Cal. 434, 18 Pac. Rep. 412, the complaint was similar to the first count of the complaint in this action; and the answer thereto alleged as a defense "that the work and materials were done and furnished in pursuance of a written agreement executed by the defendant and the plaintiff * * * before the work was commenced." The plaintiff demurred to this answer on the ground that the written contract was void because it did not appear to have been recorded as required by section 1183, Code Civil Proc. The lower court sustained the demurrer, and gave judgment for plaintiff on the implied contract, and this court affirmed the judgment on the ground that the written contract was void because not recorded; yet, on the theory of counsel for appellant in this action, the answer to which the demurrer was sustained was a perfect defense to that action, though the written contract pleaded had not been recorded. If the theory of the appellant here is correct, the demurrer to the answer in the case cited should have been overruled, and the plaintiff therein should not have been permitted, as he was, to "avoid the force and penalty of the statute, by suing upon a quantum valebat count." See dictum in Palmer v. White, 70 Cal. 220, 11 Pac. Rep. 647.

2. The second count is like the first, and is objected to upon the same grounds, and therefore needs no additional consideration.

3. It is claimed for appellant that the third count, which is a special count upon the written contract, does not state a cause of action, because that contract was not recorded. But the trial court sustained this point, and plaintiff recovered nothing upon that count, and claims nothing upon it here.

4. Counsel for appellant contend that, conceding the hotel contract to be void because not recorded, nevertheless it should have been received as conclusive evidence of the value of the labor done and materials furnished by plaintiff in the building of the hotel; and therefore that the evidence did not justify the court in finding, as it did, that the reasonable value of such labor and materials was greater than the price stated in that contract. This means that the written contract, though not recorded, is not entirely void, but obligatory upon the parties in at least one important respect. I think this point cannot be maintained. The question involved relates merely to the construction of section 1183 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and has been expressly and specifically decided by this court adversely to the contention of appellant. Kellogg v. Howes, 81 Cal. 170, 22 Pac. Rep. 509; Lumber Co. v. Neal, 90 Cal. 214, 27 Pac. Rep. 192; Willamette S. M. Co. v. Los Angeles College Co., (Cal.) 29 Pac. Rep. 629; Holland v. Wilson, 76 Cal. 434, 18 Pac. Rep. 412. In Willamette S. M. Co. v. Los Angeles College Co., supra, it is said that the effect of failing to record a building contract "was to render the contract 'wholly void' for all purposes. It cannot be the basis of a recovery by the contractor against the owner, nor can it be looked to for the purpose of determining the amount for which the owner is liable, or when any payment is to be made. * * * If the contract is 'wholly void' there is neither a 'contract' nor an 'original contractor.' * * * Inasmuch as, by a failure to file the contract in the recorder's office, it became wholly void, it was not available as a defense for any purpose, either to determine the amount of the contract price, or to limit the liability of the appellant, or as a foundation of a right to complete the building according to its terms." And all this seems to be fairly deducible from the other cases above cited. But even conceding that the void contract is merely competent evidence, tending to prove the value of the labor and materials, but not conclusive, its effect was only to create a conflict with other evidence tending to support the finding in question, and quite sufficient to justify it, by the rule here applicable.

5. The point that there is no finding upon the issue as to whether the labor was done, and the materials furnished, under and in pursuance of the alleged written contract, is not well taken. The finding that the alleged contract—the only contract relied upon by defendant—never had been recorded, and was therefore wholly void, is equivalent to a finding that there was no written contract; from which it necessarily follows that no labor or materials could have been done or furnished under such contract, and that no defense to this action can be based upon it. This conclusion is not affected by the facts that a writing, corresponding in form to the alleged contract, had been signed and delivered by the parties, and that the labor may have been done and materials furnished in accordance with the terms of that paper. But, in this connection, it is to be observed that, if defendant's cross complaint is true, the labor was not done according to that contract.

6. The evidence is sufficient to justify the seventh finding, to the effect that the parties had no settlement of any of the matters mentioned in the complaint, and that plaintiff did not receive any sum or sums of money paid him, in full satisfaction of any of his demands.

7. The issues arising upon defendant's counterclaim and cross complaint are completely disposed of by the finding that the alleged written contract, upon breaches of which they solely depend, was void, because not filed in the recorder's office. Holland v. Wilson, 76 Cal. 434, 18 Pac. Rep. 412. Besides, the court did find that the delay in completing the work, complained of in the cross complaint, was not attributable to any default of the plaintiff. Other points are made by appellant, but those of them to which an answer may not be found under the foregoing heads require no special consideration. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: Belcher, C.; Foote, C.

Per Curiam. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

FLEMING v. FLEMING. (No. 14,644.)

DIVORCE—CRUELTY—MENTAL SUFFERING.

Whether certain acts cause such "grievous mental suffering" as to be a ground of divorce, within Civil Code, § 94, is a question of fact for the trial court, and is not a question of law.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; J. W. McKinley, Judge.

Action by Minnie L. Fleming against Samuel J. Fleming for divorce on the ground of cruelty. Decree for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Thos. J. Carran and C. W. Pendleton, for appellant. John G. Rossiter, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This is an action for divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty. The material allegations of the complaint are as follows: "Plaintiff further alleges that on the evening of the 11th day of March, 1891, the plaintiff and defendant left their home in South Pasadena, in this county, for the purpose of attending a lecture in the city of Los Angeles; that they left their infant child at their said home in the care of their domestic, one Annie Peterson; that after said lecture the plaintiff and her sister went to the house of a friend in the said city of Los Angeles for the purpose of spending the night there; that the defendant returned to their said home and found the said Annie Peterson in bed and asleep; that defendant then and there entered the bed of said Annie Peterson, and attempted to have sexual intercourse with her; that he tried to persuade her that it would not be wrong for him and her to have sexual intercourse together; that he remained in bed with the said Annie Peterson for upwards of two hours before retiring to his own room; that this conduct on the part of defendant has received great publicity by reason of a complaint having been made by the said Annie Peterson before a magistrate in the city and county of Los Angeles, charging the defendant with having at said time and place assaulted her with intent to commit a rape upon her; that afterwards the said defendant came to plaintiff and threatened to turn her out upon the world penniless unless she would help him to keep the said Annie Peterson from prosecuting him on the said complaint; that this conduct on the part of the defendant, and the publicity which has been given to it, has caused plaintiff grievous mental suffering, thereby greatly impairing her health." The defendant demurred to the complaint on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, the demurrer was overruled, defendant offered no further defense to the action, the court upon the proofs taken found the facts alleged in the complaint to be true, and judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff, dissolving the bonds of matrimony. From this judgment the defendant has appealed, and now insists that the demurrer ought to have been sustained, because the facts alleged are insufficient to support a finding of extreme cruelty. Our statute provides that "extreme cruelty is the infliction of grievous bodily injury, or grievous mental suffering, upon the other by one party to the marriage."[1] Courts and elementary writers have found it impossible to define with precision what acts will constitute extreme cruelty, and it would be idle for us to review the decisions cited, because they are as variant as the language of the several statutes upon which they were founded. The habits and dispositions of different married persons vary so much that it is impossible to lay down any universal rule for the determination of what indignities should be regarded as grounds of divorce under the statute. Among savages, the conduct imputed to this defendant might not be regarded as reprehensible. The legislature has necessarily employed general words, and left each case to be determined according to its own peculiar circumstances by the good sense and judgment of courts and juries. "Whether in any given case there has been inflicted this 'grievous mental suffering,' is a pure question of fact, to be deduced from all the circumstances of each particular case, keeping always in view the intelligence, apparent refinement, and delicacy of sentiment of the complaining party." Barnes v. Barnes, 30 Pac. Rep. 298, (filed June 18, 1892.) We cannot, as matter of law, say that the conduct charged in the complaint did not inflict upon the plaintiff grievous mental suffering. The court below has found as a fact that it did, and it is the province of that court, and not our own, to determine the facts. The evidence is not in the record, and the finding is conclusive. We presume the court considered the character of the parties, and was guided by the statute and its sense of right and justice, and not by any chivalric sentiment, in awarding a decree to the plaintiff. The attorneys for appellant attempt to excuse his conduct on the ground that the acts imputed to him were not willfully or deliberately done to annoy or vex the plaintiff; that he did not suppose any publicity would be given to them, or that his wife would be told about them; but the law will not condone a violation of the marriage obligation on any such ground. His conduct being voluntary, and inconsistent with marital integrity, it is conclusively presumed that he intended the natural and ordinary effect thereof upon his wife. He, better than any one else, is supposed to know the effect a disclosure of his acts would have upon her. He took the chances of being found out, and must suffer the consequences. His threat to turn his wife out upon the world penniless, unless she assisted in saving him from a prosecution for his offense, did not indicate any contrition on his part, or that his consideration for the feelings of plaintiff would be any greater in the future than it had been in the past.

PEOPLE v. FRENCH. (No. 20,917.)

LARCENY—INSTRUCTIONS—ALIBI—CROSS-EXAMINATION.

1. The fact that a witness, on an indictment for the larceny of cattle, makes voluntary statements as to the acts of defendant with reference to certain other cattle, does not give defendant the right to cross-examine on such matters.

20th of a certain month, and other parties testify to having seen defendant in possession of the cattle a day or two later in an adjoining county, an instruction that the essence of the crime, which was charged as having been committed on or about the 20th, was the felonious stealing, and that, if this was done by defendant, although not perhaps on the day mentioned, but within a few days of that time, it was sufficient to justify conviction, is not objectionable in depriving defendant of evidence introduced for the purpose of an alibi, and tending to show that on the 20th, at least, he was in a town several miles from the scene of the larceny; but the evidence as to the alibi is still entitled to consideration.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Butte county; J. C. Gray, Judge.

McGee & Reardon, for appellant. W. H. H. Hart, Atty. Gen., for the People.

Garoutte, J. The appellant, French, was convicted of the crime of grand larceny, and appeals from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial. The court very properly sustained an objection to the question, "When was it you drove them there?" The interrogatory did not refer to the cattle which the defendant was charged with stealing, and was wholly irrelevant to the issue upon trial. The fact that the witness in his examination in chief made statements as to the acts of the defendant with reference to certain other cattle, which, as far as the record discloses, were statements volunteered by him, does not give appellant the right to enter into a cross-examination upon such matters. The subject-matter of examination was foreign to the issue, and appellant's remedy was an objection to the questions, if such were asked, and, if the statements were volunteered, then a motion to strike out would have subserved all purposes.

The court gave the jury the following instruction: "The essence of the crime charged in this information is 'feloniously stealing and driving away the cattle.' This is charged to have been done on or about the 20th of November, 1890. You will see that the precise day on which it took place is not given. 'On or about' are the words of the information; and I instruct you that if you believe from the evidence in this case, beyond a reasonable doubt, and to a moral certainty, that the defendant stole or aided in stealing the cattle named in the information, though you may not believe that it was done on the 20th day of November, but within a few days within that time, then your verdict should be 'guilty;' for the law looks to the crime committed, and not to the precise day when it was done, if done before the filing of the information, and within a reasonable time of the day named. This is the law in all cases except when time is of the essence of the crime charged, and, as I said before, time is not of the essence of the crime in this case. Appellant's defense was an alibi, and while, with argument, he attacks the principle embodied in the foregoing instruction, no authority is cited in his support. Two witnesses claiming to be particeps criminis with appellant in the commission of the larceny testified that in company with him they took possession of and drove away the cattle upon the 20th day of November. Other parties testified they saw appellant in possession of the cattle a day or two later, in an adjoining county. Appellant's evidence tended strongly to show that he was in the town of Gridley upon the 20th day of November,—a town situate several miles distant from the scene of the alleged larceny. Upon this state of facts the instruction expressed the law, and we are unable to see how the giving of it in any manner infringed upon the rights of appellant. As the court said, the exact date of the commission of the crime was immaterial. The material fact was, did the appellant commit the larceny? He was not deprived of the effect of his evidence upon the question of alibi by the instruction of the court. It was before the jury for all that it was worth, and no doubt was fully weighed by the jurors in arriving at a verdict. If it had sufficient force, it overthrew the statement of his cocriminals as to the date of the larceny, and overthrowing their testimony in this regard would naturally weaken it as to the main issue; but all those matters came before the jury, and were duly considered. We will suppose that appellant's evidence established beyond a doubt his presence in the town of Gridley during the entire day of November 20th. Such fact would not have authorized the court to advise the jury to acquit by reason of an alibi. Again, the evidence in this case may have indicated appellant's guilt to a moral certainty, and, conceding his alibi to have been proven as attempted, certainly his acquittal would not have followed from such conditions. A complete and perfect alibi establishes as a fact that a party did not commit the offense charged; but the alibi attempted to be shown in this case, if it had been successfully established, would have entirely failed to meet such requirement of the law. For the foregoing reasons the judgment and order are affirmed.

In re LAMB'S ESTATE. (No. 14,852.)

Homestead—Nature of Estate—Abandonment—To whom Descends—Bill of Exceptions—Amendment.

1. A person who, before his marriage, had entered certain land as a homestead, received the patent after his marriage. The wife then filed a declaration of homestead to the land. Differences having arisen, an agreement was entered into looking to the division of the land, whereby the husband was to convey a part to the wife, and the wife to release the balance to the husband. Held, that the land was the separate property of the husband, and that, since Code Civil Proc. § 1474, provides merely that the homestead shall vest absolutely in the survivor, when selected from the community property or from the separate property of the person selecting or joining therein, it must be regarded, under the same section, as having been selected without the consent of the wife, and "as vesting in her heirs, subject to the power of the court to assign it for a limited period to the family of the deceased." Harris v. Harris, 12 Pac. Rep. 274, 71 Cal. 314, followed.

2. An agreement between husband and wife for the division of a homestead, and deeds executed in pursuance of such agreement, none of which are recorded, do not operate as an abandonment of the homestead under Civil Code, § 1244.

3. The fact that a wife, who has selected a homestead from the separate property of the husband, afterwards acquires title to the property by deed from the husband, does not render the selection one from her separate property, within the meaning of Code Civil Proc. § 1474, so as to vest an absolute title in the husband on his survivorship.

4. Where a wife dies leaving no children, and it does not appear that the wife's father had made his home with her, or that his circumstances were such that she was under any obligation to support him, the husband may be regarded as the "family," within Code Civil Proc. § 1474, which allows the court, under certain circumstances, where the homestead has vested in the heirs, to assign it for a limited period to the family of the deceased.

5. Where no specifications are made in a bill of exceptions of the particulars in which errors are claimed, and an appeal is taken from a decision made before the settling of the said bill, it is proper to allow an amendment to the bill by inserting such specifications.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; W. L. PIERCE, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Philanda Lamb, deceased. From an order setting apart a homestead, the father of the deceased appeals. Reversed.

E. W. Hendrick and Chapman & Hendrick, for appellant. Lawrence Middlecoff and Eugene Daney, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. This is an appeal from an order setting apart to George W. Lamb, the surviving husband of deceased, upon his petition therefor, a homestead upon 160 acres of land described therein. The appeal is taken by the father of deceased. The facts, as disclosed by the record, are these: The petitioner and deceased were married September 15, 1884. Prior to this time the petitioner had filed in the proper United States land office his application to enter the land in controversy as a homestead, under the laws of the United States, and had resided thereon for four years; and one year after such marriage he made his final proof, entitling him to a patent therefor, which was issued to him on July 9, 1889. On November 17, 1887, the deceased filed in the office of the proper recorder a declaration of homestead upon the whole of said land under the laws of this state, and on February 23, 1888, the petitioner made to her a deed of this and other land. Thereafter differences arose between them, and in November, 1889, the deceased commenced an action against petitioner for a divorce and for a division of the property, and upon the 22d day of that month they made an agreement in writing, for the purpose, as stated therein, of "terminating all further controversies between them." The agreement, among other things, provided that they should live separate and apart from each other, and contained also this provision: "The said Geo. W. Lamb, in consideration of the adjustments herein referred to, and other releases of the said Philanda, his wife, does hereby convey and release all claim to the following described property, to wit,"—followed by a description of 50 acres of the land in controversy, and the said deceased agreed to release all the property to said Lamb "now owned by him." In pursuance of this agreement, the petitioner gave the deceased a deed of the 50 acres described in the agreement, and she gave to him a deed of the remaining 110 acres. The agreement referred to was not recorded in the lifetime of deceased, nor was either of the deeds which were given in pursuance thereof. In this connection the petitioner testified that after the execution of this agreement, and until her death, he and his wife continued to live together upon the land in controversy, and in a house situate upon the 50 acres which he deeded to her. The petitioner further testified, in reference to the agreement for a separation and division of the property, that it was subsequently understood betweeen them that it was to be of no effect; "we did not count that instrument worth anything; we never calculated to have it recorded." The superior court, in its decree, set apart to the petitioner as his property, and free from further administration, all of the land described in the declaration of homestead filed by the deceased.

1. The claim of respondent is that the decree of the court is justified by section 1474 of the Code of Civil Procedure. That section, so far as material to the question under consideration, is as follows: "If the homestead selected by the husband and wife, or either of them, during their coverture, and recorded while both were living, was selected from the community property, or from the separate property of the person selecting or joining in the selection of the same, it vests, on the death of the husband or wife, absolutely in the survivor. If the homestead was selected from the separate property of either the husband or the wife, without his or her consent, it vests, on the death of the person from whose property it was selected, in his or her heirs, subject to the power of the superior court to assign it for a limited period to the family of the decedent." It will be observed that in order to bring a homestead within the provisions of this section, so that upon the death of one of the spouses it "vests absolutely in the survivor," it must be made to appear that it was selected from the community property in the first instance, "or from the separate property of the person selecting or joining in the selection of the same;" and we are of opinion that upon the facts, as above stated, the homestead in this case did not vest absolutely in the petitioner upon the death of his wife. The land in controversy was not community property at the date when the deceased made and recorded her declaration claiming the same as a homestead, but it was the separate property of the petitioner. The petitioner had before his marriage made application to enter the land as a homestead under the laws of the United States, and, although he had not at the time of such marriage fully completed the term for which he was to reside upon and cultivate it, so as to entitle him to receive a patent therefor from the United States, still he had fully performed all of the conditions required of him by such laws up to that date, and by his prior acts of entry, residence, and cultivation he had acquired an equitable interest in the land, which, of course, was his separate property, and to which the legal title afterwards conveyed by the patent related; and that which was before separate property, to which he had but an equitable title, was, after the issuance of such patent, still his separate property, and held by him under the legal title conveyed by such patent.

This was, in effect, so held by this court in the case of Harris v. Harris, 71 Cal. 314, 12 Pac. Rep. 274. In that case it appears that the defendant, while a widow, and in the occupation of certain land, filed in the United States land office a declaratory statement of her intention to pre-empt the same. She afterwards married the plaintiff in that action, and thereafter they both jointly occupied and farmed the premises until she made final proof of her pre-emption claim in the new name she had acquired by the marriage, and was allowed to make a final entry of the same. The court held that the property was the separate property of the wife, no matter whether the same was paid for with community funds or with money borrowed upon her own credit, and on this point the court, in its opinion by McKINSTRY, J., said: "In this action for divorce the plaintiff claims a moiety of the land patented to the defendant on the ground that the money paid for the government title belonged to the community. Even if it appeared that the money was paid out of community funds, the land would be the separate property of the wife. With full knowledge and consent of plaintiff, the land was proved up and paid for in her name, and the proof of her occupation and 'declaration' or affidavit was as necessary a prerequisite to the acquisition of the government title as was the payment of the price. The patent is a record which proves the facts which preceded its issuance, on proof of which the proper officers of the United States were authorized to issue it. For certain purposes, the possession of either spouse is the possession of both. But here the pre-emption, declaration, and exclusive occupation of the defendant preceded her marriage with the plaintiff, and constituted parts of the acts which culminated in the certificate of purchase and patent. The plaintiff ought not to be permitted to ignore her declaration and possession, (without proof of which she could not have received the benefits of pre-emption,) and treat the acquisition of the government title simply as an ordinary purchase, made after marriage, without community funds." What was there said with reference to the effect of the prior settlement and declaration of the pre-emption claimant as the basis of his right to obtain the subsequent title applies with equal force to this case; and with much greater reason can it be said that the subsequent acquisition of the legal title was not one of purchase, made with community funds, as the title thus received was more in the nature of a gift from the government, because of the performance by petitioner of the conditions prescribed by the homestead laws in relation to residence upon and cultivation of the land. The fact that during a small portion of the time he was thus required to reside upon it the deceased was also living there with him as his wife would not deprive him of the equitable right which he had acquired to such land before marriage by reason of his previous entry and settlement, and convert it into community property. The cases of Lake v. Lake, 52 Cal. 428, and Barbet v. Langlois, 5 La. Ann. 212, also sustain this conclusion.

2. The homestead selected by the deceased under the laws of this state was not abandoned by the subsequent agreement between petitioner and deceased for its division between them. This agreement was not recorded by either of the parties, and, if it should be conceded that it was otherwise sufficient as a declaration of abandonment, the failure to record it rendered it insufficient for that purpose. Civil Code, § 1244. The deed of the premises executed by petitioner to deceased February 23, 1888, operated to vest the legal title thereto in the wife as her separate property, but did not constitute an abandonment of the homestead. Burkett v. Burkett, 78 Cal. 310, 20 Pac. Rep. 715. We do not understand that there is any claim here that this deed was not executed—that is, signed and delivered—by petitioner, and, this being so, its effect was to change the ownership of the land which it purported to convey from separate property of the petitioner to separate property of his wife, subject to the homestead thereon, which then became a homestead upon the separate property of the wife. The subsequent deed, made by the deceased to the petitioner in pursuance of the agreement for a separation and division of the property, reinvested him with the title to the 110 acres described therein, while his deed, made to her at the same time, was in effect a confirmation or further assurance of title to the 50 acres which it purported to convey; so that, as a result of the execution of all the deeds mentioned, 110 acres of the land in controversy remained the separate property of the petitioner, and the other 50 acres became the separate property of his wife, and all subject to the homestead which had been placed thereon, and never abandoned.

This being so, it only remains to consider the nature of this homestead, so far as it affects the 50 acres of which the deceased was the owner. Can it be said, in view of the facts, that this homestead was selected by her, as stated, from her separate property, within the meaning of section 1474 of the Code of Civil Procedure? It is clear to us that this question must be answered in the negative. It is true the declaration of homestead was made and recorded by her, but this was at a time when all of the land in controversy was the separate property of her husband, the petitioner; and the subsequent acquisition by her of the title to 50 acres thereof as her separate property did not have the effect to change the prior declaration into a selection by her of a homestead from her separate property. When the statute speaks of the selection of a homestead "from the separate property of the person selecting or joining in the selection of the same," it has reference to the status of the property as separate property at the time when the selection is made; for only in such case can there be properly imputed to the person making the selection an intention to dedicate his or her property for homestead purposes, and thus to vest in the other spouse an estate therein, which, upon the contingency of survivorship, will ripen into an absolute title to the land so dedicated. It would be subversive of the object and purpose of this law to hold that the wife's subsequent acquisition of title to property, from which she selected a homestead when it belonged to her husband, could be made to relate back and give to her former act in selecting such homestead an intention and purpose which did not in fact then accompany it. It follows from these views that the court erred in setting apart to petitioner absolutely, and as his property, the 50 acres which he conveyed to his wife in her lifetime. Such property is to be treated as if the homestead thereon had been selected without her consent, and as vesting in her heirs, "subject to the power of the superior court to assign it for a limited period to the family of the deceased." Section 1474, Code Civil Proc.

3. The deceased left no children, and it is not shown that the father made his home with her, and that his circumstances were such that she was at the time of her death under any moral or legal duty to support him. This being so, the petitioner may be regarded as constituting the family of deceased, within the meaning of section 1474 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It is true that the word "family" in its ordinary signification refers to two or more persons, and, as used in the section just referred to, will include those living under the same roof as kindred or dependents, and under one head, thus constituting a family, as that term is generally understood; but this word, as used in the statute concerning probate homesteads, is not to be so restricted in its meaning as to exclude the only survivor of the family of which the deceased was a member. The object of the statute is to preserve the family home for the use and benefit of the survivor or survivors of those occupying it as such, and the right of the surviving husband or wife to retain this home for such period as the court may direct does not depend upon the fact that there are children or others who may share in its use. Upon the evidence the petitioner was entitled to a decree setting apart to him as his own property the 110 acres referred to, and it was within the discretion of the court to assign to him for such limited period as it might decree proper the 50 acres of which deceased was the owner. The right to the order assigning to him for a limited period this 50 acres is not absolute, but rests in the sound discretion of the court, to be exercised in view of all the facts appearing before it.

4. In the bill of exceptions, as originally settled, there was no specification of the particulars in which it was claimed that the findings and decree of the court are not sustained by the evidence. After the appeal herein was taken, the judge of the superior court allowed the bill of exceptions to be amended by inserting such specifications. This action of the judge was proper in this case, as the appeal here is from a decision which was made before the bill of exceptions was settled, and the effect of the amendment is simply to enable this court to review the decision of the lower court, in view of all the facts which that court had before it when it made such decision. Hayne, New Trials & App. § 160; Valentine v. Stewart, 15 Cal. 396; Lencks v. Edmonson, 18 Cal. 204.

The order appealed from is reversed.

LACOSTE v. SPLIVALO et al.[1]

ADMINISTRATORS—DEVASTAVIT—BOND FOR ADDITIONAL SECURITY—LIABILITY OF SURETIES.

1. The effect of Code Civil Proc. §§ 1397 1402, providing that, in case of the insufficiency of an administrator's bond, he may be required to give further and additional security, is to render the sureties in the new bond liable for a devastavit by the administrator, occurring before their obligation.

2. The facts that an administrator loaned the trust moneys, took a note therefor individually, and, on the maker's bankruptcy, presented a claim against the bankrupt estate, as his own claim, and, after the loan, rendered an account charging himself with the amount as cash, establish a devastavit.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Jean F. Lacoste against Aug. D. Splivalo and others, and H. Barroilhet and Catherine B. Felton, executors of John B. Felton, deceased, upon an administrator's bond. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Garber, Thornton & Bishop, for appellants. Estee & Boalt, for respondent.

ROSS, J. Action by the heir of Jean Lacoste, deceased, upon the bond of one of the administrators of his estate. The defendant Splivalo was appointed one of the administrators on the 10th day of February, 1870; gave the bond then required of him by the probate court; received his letters; and thereupon entered upon the discharge of the duties of his trust. In the course of his administration of the estate, Splivalo received large sums of money belonging thereto, and also paid out large sums on account thereof. On the 9th day of July, 1872, he was ordered by the probate judge to give, within five days from that date, "further and additional security in the sum of $50,000 gold coin of the United States, and that such additional bond be in form required by law, with sureties," to be approved by the judge. In response to this order the bond in suit was given. After the execution of the bond, and on the 12th of September, 1872, Splivalo was ordered by the probate court to file an account of all matters in relation to his administration of the estate occurring subsequent to the filing of his first account, which was in March, 1871. Pursuant to this order for an accounting, Splivalo, on the 20th of September, 1872, filed his account, which was settled by the court on the 13th of November, 1872, after a contest. In settling this account the probate court found that the estate was in a condition to be closed, and ordered the account to stand as the final account of the administrator, Splivalo. By the account as thus settled it appeared, and was so adjudged, that there then remained in the hands of Splivalo, as administrator, the sum of $36,095.53, subject, however, to the payment of the commissions of the administrators, fixed by the court at $6,421; and subject, also, to the necessary costs of distribution. Subsequently, to wit, on the 22d of November, 1872, the probate court made and entered a decree of partial distribution, whereby Splivalo was directed to pay to the plaintiff, as heir of the deceased, the sum of $20,000. This money was afterwards paid, but the administration of the estate remained pending. At length, and on July 7, 1874, Splivalo rendered an account supplemental to the account which had been settled by the court as his final account. On the credit side of this supplemental account was included the item: "By cash deposited with N. Larco, Esq., and lost by reason of said N. Larco having gone into bankruptcy,—No. 88,—$11,828.80." In the settlement of the supplemental account this item was disallowed, and in disallowing it the probate court said: "In May, 1870, Mr. Splivalo, the administrator, had a large amount of money of said estate in the hands of Belloc Freres, bankers, at San Francisco, and he claims to have loaned $10,000 thereof to N. Larco in the August following. He also claims to have loaned to N. Larco $1,828.80 more, making $11,828.80, for which last-named sum he took Larco's note, payable to himself individually, and not as administrator, without interest, to be due sixty days from date. None of this money has ever been repaid. In August, 1872, N. Larco became bankrupt, and was so adjudged. Mr. Splivalo had claims presented against Larco's estate in bankruptcy, wherein he treated the debt and transaction as his own. The money was not placed with Larco, as with a banker in the ordinary course of business for security on deposit, but was a loan. Further, the loss accrued before the rendition of the former account of the administrator, A. D. Splivalo, which was made his final account in and by the decree settling the same, dated November 13, 1872, and in that account and the settlement thereof this money, viz., said sum of $11,828.80, was treated by said administrator, A. D. Splivalo, as cash then in his hands, and was so found and settled. For the above-mentioned and other reasons, appearing sufficient to the court, the said item last above mentioned is disallowed."

[1] This case, filed July 27, 1883, is now published by request, with others, in order that the Pacific Reporter may cover all cases in volume 64, California Reports.

The probate court proceeded to settle the supplemental account of Splivalo, and found that, after deducting all credits to which he was entitled, there remained in his hands as administrator the sum of $9,474.08 in money, and entered an order to that effect. On the 28th of August following, that court made and entered a final decree of distribution by which Splivalo was directed to pay over to the plaintiff, as heir of the deceased, Lacoste, the aforesaid sum of $9,474.08. This he failed and refused to do, after demand, and hence the present suit on his bond; the bond executed pursuant to the order requiring him to give further and additional security. The appellants are the executors of one of the sureties on this bond, since deceased, and they contend—First, that the sureties are unaffected by the decree of the probate court settling the accounts of the administrator, and by the decree of distribution directing him to pay over to the party entitled thereto the money found to be in his hands; and, secondly, that, not being bound by these decrees, the sureties are entitled to show in the present action, and that in fact the decree of the probate court settling the supplemental account itself shows, that the devastavit for which they are sought to be charged occurred prior to the date of the execution of the bond on which they became sureties and on which this action is based, and that this bond bound the sureties only as to the future, and did not in any manner relate to any property of the estate that had previously come into and passed out of the hands of the administrator. Involved in this last proposition is, of course, the further one, that the facts stated in respect to the loan by Splivalo to Larco themselves establish a devastavit on the part of the administrator.

Entertaining the views we do, it makes no difference which of appellants' propositions is first considered, but, logically, it would seem proper first to inquire what was the undertaking of the sureties. To correctly determine this question, the law under which the bond was given, and the purpose for which it was required, must be taken into consideration. As has been observed, it was given pursuant to an order of the probate court requiring the administrator to give "further and additional" security. He had long before been appointed, had given the bond first required of him, had entered upon the discharge of the duties of his trust, had received large sums of money belonging to the estate, and then he was required by the court in which the administration of the estate was pending to give "further and additional" security. By the statute in force when the bond in suit was executed the probate court was, and indeed yet is by the Code of Civil Procedure, authorized to require the administrator to give further security in two cases: (1) Upon the petition of any one interested in the estate representing to the court, or the judge thereof, that the sureties have become, or are becoming, insolvent, or that they have removed, or are about to remove, from the state, or that from any other cause the bond is insufficient; and (2) when it comes to the knowledge of the probate judge that the bond of any executor or administrator is from any cause insufficient, he must, without any application, cause such executor or administrator to be cited to appear, and show cause why he should not give further security. Hitt Code, arts. 5776–5781; Code Civil Proc. §§ 1397–1402.

We think these provisions of the statute admit of but one interpretation, and that is that the "further security" authorized by them to be required is, and was intended to be, cumulative. The very purpose of requiring it is to strengthen, to increase, the security previously existing; and it is obvious that the purpose would fail unless both bonds relate to the same subject-matter. It is perfectly true, as argued by the learned counsel for the appellants, that sureties are entitled to stand upon the precise terms of their contract; but what was their contract? They knew that the party for whom they were becoming sureties was charged with the execution of a trust; that in its administration he was subject to the lawful orders of the probate court; that he had already given one bond as security for the faithful discharge of his duties, among which was the accounting to that court for all property of the estate coming to his hands as administrator; that the court was authorized, when satisfied that the security already given for that purpose was insufficient, to require the administrator to give further security for the same purpose, and that the court, in the exercise of the power conferred upon it by the law, had required of the administrator in question such further security; and knowing all this they were willing to become, and did become, further sureties that the administrator would faithfully execute the duties of his trust according to law. In the bond that they executed, the fact of Splivalo's appointment as administrator, the fact of the issuance of letters of administration to him, the fact that he had already given one bond for the faithful execution of the duties of his trust, and the fact that he was ordered to file an "additional bond," are expressly recited. To say that when they executed an "additional" bond they did not intend to add to, to increase, to augment, the security previously existing, is to do violence to the language the parties themselves employed, as well as to contravene the clear purpose of the law under which the order was made requiring the bond to be given. Counsel are mistaken in referring to section 1402 of the Code of Civil Procedure (which is similar to article 5782, Hitt. Code) as another instance in which "further security" may be required of the executor or administrator. That and the succeeding section provide for the obtaining by a surety of his release from responsibility on account of future acts of his principal. Upon such an application the court or judge is required to cause the executor or administrator to appear at a time and place to be specified, and to give other security; and, if new sureties be given to the satisfaction of the judge, he may thereupon make an order that the sureties who applied for relief shall not be liable on their bond for any subsequent act, default, or misconduct of the executor or administrator. So far as these sections bear upon the subject, they strengthen, rather than weaken, the view we take of the other sections referred to, and of bonds given thereunder. When the previous security appears insufficient, and something must be added, the statute requires further security to be given; when independent security is required, it speaks of other security.

There is no doubt that the general rule relating to sureties on official bonds is that they are not liable for any official delinquency or default of their principal occurring prior to the execution of the bond. Such is the purport of numerous cases cited by counsel for appellants. But the case in hand is an exception to that rule, and it is an exception because the law under which, and the purpose for which, the representative classes of bonds are given, differs. This distinction was recognized and enforced by the court of appeals of New York in the case of Scofield v. Churchill, 72 N. Y. 567, 568, which was an action upon an executor's bond, in which the sureties sought to defend, as the sureties here do, by showing that the funds for which they were sought to be charged had been lost to the estate before the bond in suit was executed. But the court there overruled the defense, and held the sureties liable. That case is a strong authority in support of the view we take of the contract of the sureties here. Holding, as we do, that the sureties on the bond in dispute became responsible for the faithful execution by the administrator of the duties of his trust, without regard to the time of the execution of the bond, it becomes unnecessary to determine any other point made for the appellants. Judgment and order affirmed.

Stetson & Houghton, for petitioners. E. C. Marshall, Atty. Gen., and F. E. Johnston, for respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J. In 1877 the petitioners filed in the office of the surveyor general of the state applications to purchase certain school lands in Mendocino county. Within 60 days thereafter other applications to purchase the same lands were filed, and the contests were certified to the district court of the twenty-second district, in which decrees were entered in favor of petitioners on the 27th of December, 1879. On the 14th of November, 1882, Pfankuch and Knox caused certified copies of said decrees to be filed in the office, and afterwards made applications to purchase said lands, which applications were filed in the office of the surveyor general on the 6th day of January, 1883. On the 2d of March, 1883, the petitioners filed in the surveyor general's office copies of said decrees, and demanded an approval of their said applications, which the respondent refused. For the purpose of procuring such approval, a writ of mandate is prayed. It does not appear that the petitioners took any steps in the premises after the entry of decrees in their favor December 27, 1879, until the 2d of March, 1883, when their petitions to purchase the lands were filed. Between these dates a period of more than three years elapsed, during which the petitioners were quiescent. In the mean time certified copies of the final judgments were filed by other parties, the petitioners' applications approved, and more than a year after such approval the parties who had caused copies of said judgments to be filed, filed applications to purchase said land. The conclusion at which we have arrived renders it unnecessary to pass upon any of the questions discussed by counsel except one, and that is whether the petitioners did not forfeit the rights which they acquired under the judgments entered in their favor by not paying 20 per cent. of the purchase money within 50 days after the issuance of certificates of location to them. Such certificates were made out and notices thereof deposited in the postoffice addressed to them at Point Arena, Mendocino county, although it was known to the surveyor general that their postoffice address was Marysville, Yuba county. The Code does not provide for the giving of notices in such cases. If it did, a compliance with its provisions might be indispensable. As it is, we attach no importance to the fact that a notice addressed to the petitioners was mailed. We do not think there was any occasion for the service of any notice upon the petitioners. They had succeeded in the contest before the district court, and were entitled, "upon filing with the surveyor general or register, as the case may be, a copy of the final judgment of the court," to have the surveys or location approved, or to have certificates of purchase or other evidences of title issued in accordance with such judgment. Pol. Code, § 3416. But they suffered more than three years to elapse before they attempted to file a certified copy of said judgments in said surveyor general's office. And it was not until two years after the entry of said judgments that any copy of them was filed in said office. The Code does not specify any time within which such a judgment must be filed, nor does it specify by whom it may be filed. And we cannot see that it would make any difference by whom it was presented for filing. As soon as it was filed in his office it became the duty of the surveyor general to approve the survey or location, or of the register to issue a certificate of purchase or other evidence of title. This was done more than a year before the applications of other parties to purchase were filed and approved. If no contest had arisen, the petitioners would have had 50 days, and no more, after the date of the certificates of their locations, within which to pay 20 per cent. of the purchase money. Pol. Code, § 3494. Not within 50 days after receiving notice of the issuance of such certificates, but within 50 days after the dates thereof. This provision applies to all applications for the purchase of such lands, and there is no reason for holding that, in case no contest arises, applicants must pay 20 per cent. within a definite period; but, in case one does arise, the successful party shall have an indefinite time to make payment in, unless he files a copy of the judgment in the office of the surveyor general, or is notified that some one else has filed such copy. Application denied.

SLOSS v. ALLMAN.[1]

CONTRADICTORY FINDINGS—REVERSAL ON APPEAL.

Where the findings upon which a judgment was rendered are so contradictory and uncertain as to leave the appellate court in doubt as to their meaning, the judgment will be reversed.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Lassen county.

Action by F. A. Sloss against John Allman upon a contract of service. Judgment for plaintiff, and order refusing new trial. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

J. M. Seawell and C. G. Kelly, for appellant. E. V. Spencer, for respondent.

ROSS, J. Because of the contradictory and uncertain nature of the findings of the court below, we must reverse the judgment and remand the cause for a new trial. The suit is to recover a balance of $1,350, alleged to be due the plaintiff on a contract alleged to have been made in writing between plaintiff and defendant, on or about April 24, 1874, by the terms of which plaintiff agreed to carry the United States mail, as subcontractor under Allman, between two certain designated points, for a period of four years, for the sum of $5,400, which the complaint alleges defendant, Allman, agreed to pay plaintiff within 30 days from the time he (defendant) received his compensation from the government. The complaint also alleges performance of the service by the plaintiff, the receipt by the defendant of his compensation from the government, payment by him to the plaintiff of $4,050, and a balance due of $1,350, which defendant fails and refuses to pay. The findings are to the effect that, at the time stated in the complaint, plaintiff and defendant made a contract, a memorandum of which was reduced to writing, but not signed by either party; that its terms were as charged in the complaint, except that, for the service agreed to be rendered by the plaintiff, the defendant agreed to pay him $2,200 per year; that "in said memorandum it was further agreed that the contract aforesaid should be reduced to writing at length, and signed by plaintiff and two bondsmen, and also by defendant; that in pursuance of said agreement the contract in full was reduced to writing by defendant, Allman, with this addition: that he united the name of J. J. Hinds with his own as principal in the making and letting of said contract; that said contract was signed by plaintiff and his bondsmen; that, after plaintiff and his bondsmen had signed it, defendant, Allman, signed the name of J. J. Hinds thereto by himself as attorney in fact, but did not sign his own name thereto in any other manner," and thereupon delivered the same to the plaintiff, who entered upon the performance of his part of the agreement, and fully performed it; that Allman received his compensation from the government for the service more than 30 days before the commencement of the action, and at different times during the performance of the service paid to the plaintiff all of the contract price except $1,350, which last mentioned sum he did not pay and has not paid, but acknowledged to the plaintiff that it was due him, and promised him to pay it.

[1] This case, filed July 27, 1883, is now published by request, with others, in order that the Pacific Reporter may cover all cases in volume 64, California Reports.

It may be remarked here that as the court found that the contract price was $2,200 per year for four years,—that is to say, that it was $8,800,—and also found that all of the contract price was paid except $1,350, it in effect found that plaintiff was paid $7,450, which is considerably in excess of the whole contract price, according to the averments of the complaint. Yet the findings also declare that $1,350 remained due and unpaid to plaintiff for the service, and that the defendant subsequently so acknowledged and promised to pay the amount. But another difficulty in the way of affirming the judgment arises from the fact that the court below also found "that it was understood by both parties that the contract last drawn up between the parties, and signed by all of them except Allman, should supersede the memorandum of contract made by them prior to that time." We hardly know what is meant by this finding. "The contract last drawn up between the parties, and signed by all of them except Allman," would seem from the findings to have been an altogether one-sided arrangement; for Hinds seems to have been injected as principal on the one part, without the knowledge or authority of either himself or of the plaintiff; and it was the contract thus made in Hinds' name with the plaintiff that the court below found was, according to agreement between plaintiff and defendant, to supersede the memorandum of contract previously made between them. Further, as wholly inconsistent with this last statement, is the finding to the effect that the plaintiff in rendering the service, and the defendant in accepting it, treated the service as rendered under contract between plaintiff and defendant. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial, with leave to the plaintiff to amend his complaint if he shall so elect.

Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by John Daniel and wife against Holland Smith, administrator of Abraham Fielding, deceased. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Nathaniel Holland and Joseph Leggett, for appellant. F. J. French and John M. Burnett, for respondents.

THORNTON, J. This action was brought to recover of the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society a sum of money specified in the complaint. A claim to this money was set up by Holland Smith, as the administrator of the estate of Abraham Fielding, deceased, and he was made a defendant that the validity of his claim as against the plaintiffs might be determined. Judgment was rendered for the plaintiffs, and Smith moved for a new trial, which was denied. Thereupon Smith appealed from the judgment and order denying a new trial.

The sole question to be determined is whether the money sued for was given to Emma Daniel, wife of her coplaintiff, by

Abraham Fielding, in view of death. This must be determined upon the evidence adduced on the trial of this cause. The plaintiffs proved that Fielding died on the 12th day of May, 1880, in the city of San Francisco; that a short time before the 7th day of May, 1880, he became suddenly ill, and that at the time he became ill, and on the day last named, he had a general account with the defendant, the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society, evidenced by a pass book, showing a balance due him of $522.99. The pass book was put in evidence. The plaintiffs then called David Cornfoot, who testified that on Friday morning Fielding requested him to take charge of his effects, consisting of bank books, money, and assignment of mortgages and deeds and other papers, and requested him to hold them in trust for him until he got well, and if he (Fielding) should die he requested him to transfer them to his daughter Emma for her use; that this was the condition he received them under on the 7th day of May; that he (witness) was to keep them in trust for him, and, if he lived and got well, he was to return all his property to him; that if he (Fielding) died he was to give it to his daughter; that he (Cornfoot) kept the bank book until his death, and the evening Fielding died he delivered it to his daughter, Emma Daniel. Fielding stated that he did not know whether he was going to live or die, and he wanted some one to look after him, to see that he would not want for anything, and to pay his bills, and to take general charge of him and his affairs while he lived. "That was his object in transferring his effects to me. The instructions to me [said Cornfoot] in regard to the bank book were to keep possession of it while he lived, and, in case he should require any of that money for his sickness, to draw it on his order, and pay it out as far as his sickness required it; and if he should die before any of the money should be used out of the bank book, I was to give it, as above stated, to his daughter, with instructions for her to draw the money, and to appropriate it to her own use." None of the money was used from the bank, there being sufficient without it. It was admitted that the bank book offered in evidence was the same book delivered to Cornfoot by Fielding on the 7th of May, 1880. It was also admitted that the defendant savings and loan society was at the time set forth in the complaint, and is, a corporation, and that defendant Smith was the duly-appointed administrator of the deceased, Abraham Fielding. The plaintiffs proved that before the commencement of this action they were married, and that Emma Daniel had demanded of the society aforesaid the sum sued for, with the accruing dividends, and that no part thereof had been paid. The plaintiffs rested, and the defendant Smith moved for a nonsuit on the following grounds: "First. There is no evidence to prove that the plaintiffs, or either of them, were the owners of or entitled to receive $522.99 in gold coin of the United States, deposited with the defendant the Hibernia Savings & Loan Society in the name of A. Fielding. Second. There is no evidence of any delivery of the gold coin or money or bank book, symbolic or otherwise, by the said A. Fielding to said Emma Daniel; on the contrary, the evidence shows that he retained possession, control, and ownership for his own use; that the said Emma Daniel did not have, or claim to have, any interest, control, or possession of the bank book or money in bank until after the death of said Fielding, nor did any one hold possession thereof for her." The court denied the motion, and Smith excepted. The cause was then submitted, and the judgment rendered for plaintiffs. The defendant Smith moved for a new trial, and in his statement specified wherein the evidence was insufficient to sustain the decision of the court, which specifications presented substantially the same points as are set forth in the grounds for a nonsuit.

It is contended that the foregoing, in view of death, established a gift of the money in the savings and loan society mentioned above by Fielding to Emma Daniel. Such is the question presented herein for decision. To constitute a donatio causa mortis, the gift must be made in contemplation of the near approach of death by the donor, to take effect absolutely only upon the death of the donor. There must be a delivery of the property, either to the donee or to some person for his use or benefit, and the donor must part with all dominion over the property, and the title must vest in the donee, subject to the right of the donor at any time during his life to revoke the gift. Dole v. Lincoln, 31 Me. 428, 429; Curry v. Powers, 70 N. Y. 217; Hatch v. Atkinson, 56 Me. 327; Taylor v. Henry, 48 Md. 550. All the authorities agree that there must be a delivery of the property intended to be the subject of the gift. Hamor v. Moore's Adm'r, 8 Ohio St. 242; Fiero v. Fiero, 5 Thomp. & C. 151; Case v. Dennison, 9 R. I. 88; McGrath v. Reynolds, 116 Mass. 566. Is there any evidence of such delivery here, and with intent by Fielding to part with all dominion over the money? The only evidence is that of Cornfoot. He does not state any manual tradition of the pass book to him. It does not appear that this pass book was at the place where the above-stated conversation occurred between Fielding and Cornfoot. Nor is it stated that the book was locked in a trunk or drawer, and the keys delivered to Cornfoot that he might possess himself of the book. The statement of Cornfoot given above is that Fielding "requested me to take charge of his effects, consisting of bank books, money, and assignment of mortgages and deeds and other papers, and requested me to hold them in trust for him until he got well; and if he should die he requested me to transfer them to his daughter, Emma, for her use. That was the condition I received them under on the 7th of May. I was to keep them in trust for him, and if he lived and got well I was to return all his property to him, and if he died I was to give it to his daughter, Emma." We see nothing of delivery here. It may be remarked that it is afterwards stated that it was admitted that the bank book offered in evidence "was the same book delivered to said Cornfoot by said Fielding on the 7th of May, 1880," but in our judgment this language was only intended to indicate that the book offered in evidence was the same as the book which was afterwards taken possession of by Cornfoot, and by him handed over to Emma Daniel; that the word "delivered" used in stating the admission, was not used as indicating an actual tradition of the book on the 7th of May, when the conversation took place, but to identify the book as the one which came into possession of Cornfoot under the authority given him to take charge of it and hold it in trust for Fielding, and which was afterwards handed over by Cornfoot to Emma Daniel. To show how strict is the requirement of delivery to constitute a gift causa mortis we refer to the case of Case v. Dennison, 9 R. I. 88. In this case, a gift causa mortis was claimed of a sum of money deposited in a savings bank in Providence. The bank book was not in the possession of the alleged donor, a married woman, but was in the possession of another person in Providence. The donor aforesaid died at Mystic, Conn. Shortly before her death she told her son that she had not long to live, spoke of the bank book being in possession of her son-in-law, and that she wanted him (her son) to get it, settle the bills, and, if anything was left, to divide it among her three children. After her death her son (one of the defendants in the case cited) obtained possession of the book, but the bank refused to pay him the money deposited, without a bond. This was held not to be a donation causa mortis, for want of delivery. The court, by DURKEE, J., observed as follows as to the matter: "We think the defendant is not entitled to either the bank book or the money which it represents as a gift mortis causa. There was no delivery." The court said further: "It is urged that the book was in possession of Mrs. Lawton, who it is claimed was a donee, and that it was not where the intestate could get it to deliver, and that upon these grounds the gift should be sustained. But we think a delivery should not be dispensed with on such grounds." See, also, on this point the cases above cited of Fiero v. Fiero and McGrath v. Reynolds, supra. It has been held that there must be delivery, even where the subject of the gift is in possession of the donee when the gift is made. Cutting v. Gilman, 41 N. H. 147; Huntington v. Gilmore, 14 Barb. 243; Shower v. Pilck, 4 Exch. 478. In view of the strict requirements of the law as to delivery, as shown by the foregoing, we cannot hold that a delivery was established in this case. Nor does it appear that the dominion or control over the bank book or the money in the loan society ever passed from Fielding, or that any interest ever vested in the alleged donee. There was no language of gift used. On the contrary, the testimony indicates, in our judgment, the creation by Fielding of a bailment in trust or agency, which was to terminate with the death of Fielding. In our judgment, the evidence was insufficient to establish a gift causa mortis, and the court erred in refusing to grant the motion for a nonsuit, and in its decision in favor of the plaintiff. The judgment and order must therefore be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial, and it is so ordered.

WATER RIGHTS.

Where one is adjudged the owner of all of certain water and water rights, except an amount "equal to a constant flow of 2 1-3 inches of water, * * * measured under a 4-inch pressure," adjudged to belong to defendants, the latter cannot use more than such 2 1-3 inches at any time, though they afterwards seek to compensate for such excessive use by refraining from using any water whatever.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. H. CLARK, Judge.

Action by the Alhambra Addition Water Company against Solomon Richardson and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

John S. Chapman and Smith, Howard & Smith, for appellant. Wells, Monroe & Lee, for respondents.

FOOTE, C. This action was brought to prevent the defendants from maintaining a certain water gate in a pipe conveying water for irrigation and other purposes, belonging to plaintiff; and to prevent the defendants from taking from that pipe a greater quantity of water than the plaintiff claimed the defendants had a legal right to use. The court below refused to grant the relief, by injunction asked for by the plaintiff, and rendered judgment in favor of the defendants. The plaintiff moved for a new trial, which was refused, and the appeal is from the order denying its motion. It appears by a decision of the supreme court, in a case where these same parties were litigants, (72 Cal. 598, 14 Pac. Rep. 379,) that the water right of the defendants, as against the plaintiff, was determined and defined; and it is claimed by the appellant that the court below took an erroneous view of the scope of the judgment rendered therein, and by its decision in this case allowed to the defendants certain rights in taking water from the plaintiff's water pipe which were entirely inadmissible under the view of the matter taken by the appellate court in affirming the judgment on the former appeal. The former judgment, above alluded to, defined the respective rights of the plaintiff and defendants, thus: "It is ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the Alhambra Addition Water Company, plaintiff, is the owner of all the water and water rights being, arising, or flowing in or from that certain canon in the county of Los Angeles, state of California known as the 'Kewen Mill of Lake Vineyard Canon,' and of the dams, ditches, reservoirs, and pipes used by plaintiff for the purpose of diverting said waters from said canon; and also the large iron pipe connecting with the waters of said canon, and extending down through lands of defendants, as described and alleged in the complaint filed herein; except an amount equal to a constant flow of two and one third (2⅓) inches of water flowing from said canon, measured under a four (4) inch pressure, on the premises of defendants hereinafter described, which said quantity of water, so excepted from plaintiff's ownership, is hereby adjudged to belong to defendants for irrigation, household, and domestic purposes, as appurtenant to and for use upon the following described lands, to wit: [Here follows description of lands.] Excepting also that the defendants own and are entitled to the use of the pipes, ditches, aqueducts, and reservoirs belonging to plaintiff, as hereinbefore adjudged, for the purpose of conducting, storing, and preserving the waters hereinbefore adjudged to belong to defendants, to and upon their premises as aforesaid; and it is adjudged that said defendants have the right to take said water from the pipe as now constructed, at any point upon their said land, for the purpose and in the quantity aforesaid. And it is further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the defendants aforesaid are the owners of that certain portion and quantity of the waters described in the complaint equal to a constant flow of two and one third (2⅓) inches, measured under a four (4) inch pressure, on their said premises, and are entitled to the use of the pipes, ditches, aqueducts, and reservoirs belonging to plaintiff, and described in the complaint, for the purpose of storing, preserving, and conducting the same upon their lands hereinbefore described, for the purposes aforesaid; and that said defendants have the right to take the quantity of water aforesaid from the pipe as now constructed at any point upon said lands above particularly described."

The court below evidently took the view, which we cannot uphold, that the defendants were entitled under this decree to put into the pipe an appliance by means of which they could at one time accumulate such a head of water as to take from the pipe and irrigate their lands, and use for the other purposes mentioned in the decree, any amount of the water, even to the whole of it, which might be running or flowing in the pipe, provided that they did not thereafter use any more of the water until sufficient time had elapsed that as much water should have flowed through the pipe and past the defendants' lands as would have sufficed to equal the quantity used by them. In other words, the court below seems to have held that the defendants could use 80 inches constant flow of water—all that ran in the pipe—for one day, if they should not use any more water thereafter, and all the water in the pipe should be permitted by them to run by their lands so as to be used if required by other parties in interest for as many days and parts of days as would result from dividing 80 by 2⅓. In our view of the matter, the defendants are entitled to use any appliance to obtain from this pipe a constant flow of 2⅓ inches of water, measured under a 4-inch pressure, for the purposes mentioned in the decree above quoted, but they are not entitled to use that appliance to take from the pipe any more water than that. There must always be permitted to flow by their lands unused by them, all except the amount of water just mentioned. They are not authorized to use any appliance in such a way as to obstruct the flow of the water in the pipe to any greater extent than that, and they are not to be permitted to take from the pipe any more water than a constant flow of 2⅓ inches under a 4-inch pressure.

It is alleged by the defendants that, during the pendency of the action in which the foregoing judgment was rendered, a stipulation was entered into between the parties having reference to an enlargement of the pipes below the lands of the defendants; and the court finds that, in consequence of such enlargement, the pressure of the water was so reduced that it was drawn away from the house of the defendants and the higher portion of their premises so that they were unable to receive any water for domestic use and irrigation purposes. The court finds that these acts of the plaintiff in enlarging its pipes, whereby the pressure of the water was reduced, were "in violation of a stipulation entered into between the parties hereto;" but does not find whether the stipulation was made before or after the commencement of the former action, or what were its terms. If by the terms of such stipulation, entered into after the commencement of the former action, the defendants acquired any rights in the waters of the canon flowing through their lands in the pipes of the plaintiff other than or different from those specified in the judgment, they are entitled to be protected therein in the present action. Upon a new trial the court will find the terms of the stipulation, and render such judgment as will give to the respective parties the rights acquired thereby.

For the reason that the evidence shows that they took more water at one time than they were entitled to, and that the court below based its finding as to their right upon an erroneous construction of the former judgment, we are of opinion that it committed, in this respect, error. For these reasons we advise that the order appealed from be reversed.

We concur: Vanclief, C.; Belcher, C.

Per Curiam. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order appealed from is reversed.

Wm. L. Gill, for appellants. F. B. Laine and Jackson Hatch, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. The defendants appealed from the judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial. The plaintiff moves to dismiss the appeal from the order, upon the ground that the undertaking on appeal makes no reference to the appeal therefrom, and consequently that, so far as the order is concerned, the appeal is ineffectual for any purpose. Code Civil Proc. § 940. It is conceded by the appellant that his undertaking as filed was in fact defective in the particular specified, and it is settled by numerous decisions of this court that in such case the appeal must be dismissed, if the respondent has not waived the defect, or done some act by which he is estopped to raise the objection. People v. Center, 61 Cal. 191; Corcoran v. Desmond, 71 Cal. 100, 11 Pac. Rep. 815; Associates v. Wilkins, 71 Cal. 626, 12 Pac. Rep. 799; Berniaud v. Beecher, 74 Cal. 617, 16 Pac. Rep. 510; Wood v. Pendola, 77 Cal. 82, 19 Pac. Rep. 183; Schurtz v. Romer, 81 Cal. 245, 22 Pac. Rep. 657; Crew v. Diller, 86 Cal. 555, 25 Pac. Rep. 66; Paving Co. v. Bolton, 89 Cal. 155, 26 Pac. Rep. 650. But it is contended that the respondent in this case has waived the defect in the undertaking, and is thereby estopped to make the objection upon which his motion is based. The order overruling the motion for a new trial was made and entered December 21, 1891, and some time prior to January 30, 1892, the respondent stipulated in writing, among other things, "that the appellant has in due time given and filed a good and sufficient undertaking on appeal in said cause." This stipulation is contained in the original transcript filed in this court on January 30, 1892, and must therefore have been signed on or prior to that date, and before the time for appealing from the order had expired." This fact distinguishes the present case from Perkins v. Cooper, 87 Cal. 241, 25 Pac. Rep. 411. There a similar stipulation was given, but not until the time for appealing from the order had expired, and if the stipulation had been refused the appellant could not have given a new notice of appeal. But here, if the stipulation had not been given, the defendants had ample time to file and serve a new notice, and it may well be that their reliance on the stipulation prevented them from doing so. Under such circumstances, we think the respondent should not be allowed, after the time for appealing has elapsed, to contradict his former admission. Motion denied.

MEYERS v. TRUJILLO. (No. 14,439.)

APPEAL WITHOUT MERIT—DAMAGES.

To a complaint in the ordinary form of ejectment a general denial and the statute of limitations were pleaded. Findings of fact were waived, and judgment was rendered for plaintiff. Defendant, on appeal, furnished no bill of exception or other record of error, and filed neither brief nor points and authorities. Held that, the appeal being manifestly without merit, payment of $100 damages, as part of costs on appeal, would be directed for respondent.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; J. L. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Ejectment by Maria L. Meyers against Lorenzo Trujillo. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Ezra Crossman and Goodcell & Leonard, for appellant. Byron Waters, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The complaint herein is in the ordinary form of a complaint in ejectment. The defendant pleaded a general denial and the statute of limitations. The cause was tried by the court without a jury. Findings of fact were waived, and judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff. From this judgment an appeal was taken directly to this court. There is no bill of exceptions or other record of any error in the court below, and the appellant has not filed any brief or points and authorities in support of his appeal. The appeal is manifestly without merit, and the judgment is affirmed, and the superior court is directed to allow to respondent $100 damages, as a part of the costs on appeal.

MORTGAGES—FORECLOSURE — DEFICIENCY JUDGMENT—ASSOCIATIONS.

In a suit to foreclose a mortgage of land, given to secure notes of an association for the purchase money of such land, the complaint in the caption named the association and the individual members as defendants, and process was served respectively on the association and on each of its members, and a general appearance was entered by each. The complaint did not clearly indicate whether proceedings were intended merely against the association or against its members personally, and it concluded with the prayer "that plaintiff have judgment against the persons personally liable for said debt for any deficiency that may remain after such sale." The answers of defendants admitted the genuineness and due execution of the articles of association, and did not deny the existence of the partnership relationship among them. Held, that plaintiff was entitled to a deficiency judgment against those persons who were members of such association at the date of the execution of the notes in suit. Goodlett v. Investment Co., (Cal.) 29 Pac. Rep. 505, followed.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; C. W. C. ROWELL, Judge.

Suit by one Flagg against the St. Elmo Investment Company and others for foreclosure of mortgage. From a decree allowing a deficiency judgment against the company alone, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Harris & Gregg and C. J. Perkins, for appellant. Willis & Cole, Barclay, Wilson & Carpenter, and Redick & Rose, for respondents.

SHARPSTEIN, J. This case is not distinguishable in any material respect from Goodlett v. Investment Co., reported in 29 Pac. Rep. 505. The questions involved in this case were fully considered in that, and on the authority of that case the judgment in this case, so far as it directs the docketing of a deficiency judgment against the St. Elmo Investment Company, is reversed; in other respects it is affirmed. The cause is remanded, with directions to the superior court to find upon the evidence before it, and such further evidence as the parties may submit, who were the members of the St. Elmo Investment Company at the date of the execution of the notes in suit, and to order the docketing of a deficiency judgment accordingly.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—EXCLUDING TERRITORY—MANDAMUS.

1. Act March 19, 1889, (St. 1889, p. 356,) entitled "An act to provide for changing the boundaries of cities and municipal corporations, and to exclude territory therefrom," was not intended as a means by which a city might be practically disincorporated, and a petition for a special election thereunder should not be granted when the contemplated change of boundaries will exclude nearly the whole of the city's territory, nine tenths of its population, and four fifths of its trustees, and the population left will be less than one half that necessary to form a municipal corporation of the lowest class.

2. The writ of mandamus is not wholly a writ of right, but lies to a considerable extent within the sound discretion of the court, and it should not be issued to compel a technical compliance with the letter of the law when this involves a violation of its spirit.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. H. CLARK, Judge.

Petition by F. Wiedwald for a writ of mandate to one Dodson and others, trustees of the city of San Pedro. From a judgment granting the writ the trustees appeal. Reversed.

Chapman & Hendricks and S. M. White, for appellants. Wells, Monroe & Lee, for respondent.

MCFARLAND, J. The respondent filed a petition in the superior court praying for a writ of mandate to compel the appellants, as trustees of the city of San Pedro, to call a special election and submit to the electors of said city the question of excluding therefrom certain territory described in the petition. After a trial the court rendered judgment granting the writ, and the trustees appeal from the judgment.

The respondent bases the right to maintain this proceeding upon the fact that he is an elector and taxpayer and real-estate owner within the city. The petition for a special election, involved in the case at bar, was filed March 10, 1891; and it appears from the findings that a prior similar petition had been filed on December 11, 1890, (involving exactly the same territory;) that said prior petition had been granted by the trustees, and an election under it had been held on January 12, 1891; that one Anderson had filed a petition in said superior court for a writ of mandate to compel the trustees to declare the result of such election, and to certify to the secretary of state that such result was in favor of the exclusion of such territory; and that said petition for such writ of mandate is still pending and undetermined. It further appears from the findings that the territory described in the petition to the trustees (in the case at bar) "is nearly the whole of the said city of San Pedro, and that if the said territory should be excluded it would carry with it nearly or quite nine tenths of the population of said city, and four members of the board of trustees, and that the whole number of voters left in the city of San Pedro, if the said territory should be excluded, would not exceed thirty." It appears that at the last municipal election, held in April, 1890, there were 258 votes cast, and that there are 5 trustees of said city. Passing other points made by appellants, it is clear that the judgment must be reversed upon the finding as to the extent and the proportion of the population which would be excluded from the city if the judgment were affirmed. The proceeding before the board of trustees was under the statute approved March 19, 1889, entitled "An act to provide for changing the boundaries of cities and municipal corporations, and to exclude territory therefrom." St. 1889, p. 356. (This act was re-enacted, inadvertently perhaps, on March 20, 1889,—Id. p. 433.) The act was evidently intended to provide for an ordinary, reasonable change of the boundaries of a city; but it was clearly not intended as a means by which a city might be practically disincorporated. It is based upon the theory that the city whose boundaries are to be changed shall continue its existence, and provides for many things to be done by the city after the change; as, for instance, to levy taxes upon the excluded territory. But by the election which the trustees are compelled by the judgment in the case at bar to order, if the vote should be in the affirmative, there would be excluded from the city "nearly the whole" of its territory, nine tenths of the population, and four fifths of its trustees; and the whole number of voters left would "not exceed thirty." Adding to these 30 voters as many resident nonvoters as could be reasonably estimated, there would not be nearly one half the population necessary to form a municipal corporation of the lowest class. This would be, not to change the boundaries, but to practically disincorporate the city. To interpret the statute as contemplating such result would be to violate the maxim, que hæret in litera hæret in cortice. Counsel for respondent say that it would be difficult to establish a line so as to distinguish the extent of territory and amount of population that may be excluded. That is, no doubt, true; but, if we imagine such line drawn with the utmost liberality, we shall still find the case at bar on the wrong side of it. In applying the principle, each case must be determined upon its own facts. The learned judge of the court below would perhaps have adopted these views if he had not felt constrained by the opinion, expressed in his conclusions of law, that "the court has no discretion to refuse to issue the writ " In this view we think that he was mistaken. We think that the correct doctrine is expressed in High on Extraordinary Legal Remedies, § 9, where, speaking of mandamus, it is said that "the exercise of the jurisdiction rests, to a considerable extent, in the sound discretion of the court;" and that "cases may therefore arise where the applicant for relief has an undoubted legal right, for which mandamus is the appropriate remedy, but where the court may, in the exercise of a wise discretion, still refuse the relief." See, also, Water Works v. San Francisco, 52 Cal. 117, and Same v. Bryant, Id. 140. And in the second edition of the work, in said section 9, and notes, it is said that the writ should not issue to compel a compliance with the letter against the spirit of the law. In State v. Commissioners, 26 Kan. 419, while the facts were somewhat different from those in the case at bar, the supreme court of Kansas stated the rule as follows: "The writ of mandamus is not wholly a writ of right, but lies to a considerable extent within the sound judicial discretion of the court where the application is made, (citing authorities;) and no court should allow a writ of mandamus to compel a technical compliance with the letter of the law, where such compliance will violate the spirit of the law." The case at bar comes within the principle just quoted; it is an attempt to compel a compliance with the letter of the law against its plain intent and spirit. The writ of mandate should not be used to wrongfully wrest a statute from its true purpose.

The judgment is reversed.

People v. Vincent. (No. 20,852.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 25, 1892.)

Challenge to Panel — Change of Venue — Intoxication in Murder Case — Ex Post Facto Laws.

1. The fact that, after a challenge to a panel had been sustained on the ground of bias and prejudice of the deputy sheriff summoning the jurors, a few of the persons composing it were summoned on a second venire, is no ground for challenge to the second panel, but the objections should be made to the individual jurors.

2. Under Pen. Code, § 1035, providing that if the court be satisfied of the truth of the representations of defendant in a criminal case, that he cannot have a fair and impartial trial in the county where the action is pending, the motion for change of venue must be granted, refusal of a motion, based on public prejudice supported only by the affidavits on information and belief of defendant and his counsel, though opposed by no counter affidavits, cannot be said to be an abuse of discretion, the court having already witnessed the examination of a large number of jurors in the case.

3. Under Pen. Code, § 22, providing that whenever the actual existence of any particular purpose, motive, or intent is a necessary element to constitute any species or degree of crime, the fact of intoxication may be considered, there is no error in charging, in a homicide case, that intoxication can only be considered for the purpose of determining the degree of crime, the degrees of murder being based on intent.

4. Act March 31, 1891, amending Pen. Code, §§ 1217, 1229, relative to time and place of executing death penalty, does not apply to convictions for offenses committed prior to its enactment. People v. McNulty, 26 Pac. Rep. 597, 29 Pac. Rep. 61, and 93 Cal. 427, followed.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; S. A. Holmes, Judge.

F. O. Vincent was convicted of murder, and appeals. Affirmed.

S. R. Hart and Henry Hogan, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, W. D. Tupper, and F. H. Short, for the People.

McFarland, J. Appellant was convicted of the crime of murder in the first degree, and appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

1. We see no errors in the rulings of the court below in the matter of impaneling the jury. It appears that, the regular venire of jurors having been exhausted before the jury was completed, the court ordered a special venire to be summoned by the sheriff; that upon the return of the sheriff the appellant interposed a challenge to the entire panel of jurors summoned upon said special venire, upon the ground of the bias and prejudice of the deputy sheriff who summoned them; and that said challenge was by the court sustained. Appellant then interposed a challenge to the regular venire of jurors, upon the ground that they had not been drawn in the manner as prescribed in section 205, Code Civil Proc., and the court also sustained that challenge. The court then ordered a second special venire to be issued for 100 jurors, and upon the return of the sheriff it appeared that, of the 100 jurors summoned, several were jurors who had also been upon the first special venire, to which a challenge had been sustained for bias of the officer who summoned them. Appellant then interposed a challenge to the panel (of the second special venire) upon the ground that a part of the panel was composed of persons who were upon the first special venire, and for which the challenge for bias of the officer had been sustained as aforesaid; and upon the further ground (as we understand it) that, because the drawing of regular jurors for the year was invalid, therefore there could be no valid order for the summoning of special jurors by the sheriff. As to the first point, it is clear that the fact that a few persons summoned on the second venire had also been summoned on the first furnished no basis for a challenge to the panel. It is not made a ground for such challenge by the statute. Pen. Code, §1064. Whatever legal objections appellant may have had to those persons should have been presented as challenges to individual jurors. As to the second point, it was held in Levy v. Wilson, 69 Cal. 111, 10 Pac. Rep. 272, and other cases, that the court, under section 226 of the Code of Civil Procedure, may at any time direct the sheriff to summon jurors from the body of the county, although there be names of properly selected regular jurors in the jury-box; and when, from any cause, there are no regular jurors to be drawn from, the very case arises where the court may, without any doubt whatever, exercise the power granted by said section 226.

2. We see no abuse of discretion in the overruling of appellant's motion for a change of venue. It is true that the prosecution filed no counter affidavits, except as to the employment of assistant counsel; but the only affidavits filed by the appellant on the motion were made by himself and his counsel, which fact distinguishes the case widely from People v. Yoakum, 53 Cal. 566, upon which he relies. Moreover, as to the main point of public feeling against appellant in the county in which he was tried, the affidavits are largely upon information and belief; and upon that point, as the motion was not made until several days after the trial had commenced, the court had witnessed the examination of a large number of jurors. The Code[1] provides that, "if the court be satisfied that the representations of the appellant are true," the motion should be granted; and we certainly cannot say that in this case the court ought to have been so satisfied. It is true that the discretion of a trial court to grant or refuse a change of venue is not an arbitrary discretion,—a mere naked, irresponsible power; but when there has been fair room for the play of such discretion, and its exercise has not gone beyond legitimate and reasonable limits, it cannot be rightfully interfered with by the appellate court. People v. Elliott, 80 Cal. 296, 22 Pac. Rep. 207, and cases there cited. And we see no reason to hold that in the case at bar such discretion was improperly exercised.

3. It is contended by appellant that the court erred in instructing the jury that "evidence of drunkenness can only be considered by the jury for the purpose of determining the degree of crime, and for this purpose it must be received with great caution." This instruction and others stating the same principle have been frequently approved by this court in murder cases. People v. Lewis, 36 Cal. 531; People v. Williams, 43 Cal. 344; People v. Belencia, 21 Cal. 544; People v. King, 27 Cal. 507; People v. Ferris, 55 Cal. 588; People v. Jones, 63 Cal. 168. Appellant relies on the recent case of People v. Phelan, (Cal.) 28 Pac. Rep. 855, in which the said instruction above quoted was held to be erroneous. But that was a case of burglary, in which the degrees of the crime are not based at all upon the principle which distinguishes the degrees of murder. Section 22 of the Penal Code provides that, "whenever the actual existence of any particular purpose, motive, or intent is a necessary element to constitute any species or degree of crime, the jury may take into consideration the fact that the accused was intoxicated at the time, in determining the purpose, motive, or intent with which he committed the act." Now, the degrees of murder are based upon the "intent"—the deliberation or premeditation—with which the act is done; and therefore it is not improper in trials for unlawful homicide to instruct the jury that they can consider intoxication only for the purpose of determining the degree of the crime, because that is telling them, in substance, that they may consider it in determining "the purpose, motive, and intent" with which the act was committed. But in burglary the degrees of the crime are fixed solely by the point of time at which the act was done,—if in the nighttime, of the first degree; if in the daytime, of the second degree. Therefore to tell a jury in a burglary case that they could consider intoxication only in determining the degree of the crime would be not only absurd, but to take away from them the right to consider it in determining the "purpose, motive, or intent" with which the accused did the act complained of. Burglary consists in entering a house (or one of certain other buildings mentioned in the Code) "with intent to commit grand or petit larceny, or any felony;" and it is apparent to the dullest apprehension that a drunken man might ulawfully enter a house without any intent whatever to commit larceny or felony. And it is equally apparent that a jury, in determining with what intent he entered, might well consider the fact that he was intoxicated; but the "degree" of the crime would have nothing to do with it. The court, in delivering the decision in People v. Phelan, did not consider it necessary to state that they were not dealing with a murder trial.

4. The crime of which appellant was convicted was committed prior to the act of March 31, 1891, amending sections 1217 and 1229 of the Penal Code, relating to the time and place for the execution of the death penalty; but it must be deemed to have been settled by the decision of this court in bank in the case of People v. McNulty, 93 Cal. 427, 26 Pac. Rep. 597, and 29 Pac. Rep. 61, that such amendments do not apply to convictions for offenses committed prior to their enactment. The transcript does not contain the evidence, and the foregoing are the only grounds relied on for a reversal. The record presents no error. Judgment and order appealed from affirmed.

MORE v. CALKINS et al. (No. 14,787.)

MORTGAGE WITH POWER OF SALE—ENFORCEMENT AGAINST ESTATE—CONSIDERATION.

1. Whether a conveyance is to be treated as a mortgage or a deed of trust depends on its essential character as shown by its terms, and not on whether the grantee is a creditor whose debt is to be paid out of the proceeds arising from the execution of a trust therein declared.

2. Since the death of the grantor does not revoke a power of sale contained in a deed of trust, nor limit the effect of the deed, Code Civil Proc. §§ 1493, 1502, prescribing the time within which claims against a decedent's estate must be presented, do not apply to claims secured by such a deed.

3. As the powers and trusts contained in a deed of trust continue in full force after the grantor's death, and no judicial foreclosure is required, Code Civil Proc. § 1500, allowing an action for foreclosure of a mortgage against a decedent's estate without presentation of the claim secured to the executor or administrator, only "when all recourse against any other property of the estate is expressly waived in the complaint," does not apply.

4. Where a deed of trust to secure money advanced by the grantee provides for the payment of expenses and repayment of the money advanced, "with interest thereon at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, together with the additional sum of $10,000, which the party of the first part hereby agrees to pay the party of the second part without interest," and the promise to pay this additional sum of $10,000 is founded on no additional advances to be made or services to be rendered by the grantee, but is a mere bonus for the loan of the money, such promise is without consideration, and cannot be enforced.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Ventura county; B. T. WILLIAMS, Judge.

Action by Thomas R. More, administrator, against J. W. Calkins and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Barclay, Wilson & Carpenter, L. C. McKeeby, and W. H. Wilde, for appellant. Wright & Day, for respondents.

DE HAVEN, J. The plaintiff is the administrator of the estate of Alexander S. More, deceased, and the prayer of the complaint filed in the action is that a certain trust deed, executed by the deceased in his lifetime, be declared void, and that defendant Calkins be enjoined from selling the land, water ditch, and water rights, conveyed by said deed, under the power which is given thereby. The case was here before. The opinion upon the former appeal is reported in 85 Cal. 177, 24 Pac. Rep. 729, and the deed referred to is there set out in full. After the decision upon the former appeal the plaintiff filed a supplemental complaint, in which it is alleged that the defendant did not, within the time limited by section 1493 of the Code of Civil Procedure, present the claims secured by said deed to the plaintiff as administrator of Alexander S. More, deceased, and it is averred that the same are barred by sections 1493, 1500, 1502, Code Civil Proc. It was further alleged in the supplemental complaint that after the commencement of the action the defendant Calkins made a conveyance to one Merton B. Hull of all the property described in the deed executed by deceased, and that said Hull had notice of the pending action, and the plaintiff asked that Hull be made a party defendant, and for a judgment to the effect that the deed from defendant Calkins to said Hull be canceled, and Hull compelled to convey all of said property to the plaintiff, as administrator of the estate of the deceased, Alexander S. More, and that all of the claims mentioned in the deed of trust, executed by deceased to defendant Calkins, be declared barred, and that plaintiff be put in possession of all of the property conveyed by said deed. Hull appeared in the action, and joined with the other defendant in an answer to the supplemental complaint. The judgment of the superior court was that the deed executed by Calkins to his codefendant Hull be canceled, and it further directed that the property conveyed to defendant Calkins by the deed of trust executed by deceased be sold, and said judgment also determined the amount which the defendant Calkins, as trustee, is entitled to retain out of the proceeds of such sale, in which amount is included the sum of $10,000, which is provided for in the deed referred to. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment.

1. The instrument which the plaintiff seeks to have set aside is a trust deed. It conveyed to defendant Calkins the legal title to the property described, upon the trusts which it declares, and conferred upon him the power in execution thereof to sell the property thus conveyed, and transmit the legal title to his grantee. Koch v. Briggs, 14 Cal. 257; Bateman v. Burr, 57 Cal. 480; Thompson v. McKay, 41 Cal. 221. It is not material that in this case the conveyance was made directly to Calkins, who was a creditor, and not to a third party. Whether the conveyance is to be treated as a mortgage or as a deed of trust must depend upon its essential character, as shown by its terms, and not whether the grantee is a creditor whose debt is to be paid out of the proceeds to arise from the execution of the trust which is declared. In Thompson v. McKay, 41 Cal. 221, the deed was upon a trust to sell or lease the premises conveyed, and, after making certain deductions, to apply the proceeds to the payment of a promissory note executed by the grantor in favor of the grantee, and the court said, in declaring the legal effect of this deed: "That the deed from Gowen to Hill conveyed the fee, and that Hill had the power, in execution of the trust, to transmit the legal title to a purchaser is too plain for debate." The death of the grantor did not operate as a revocation of the power of sale contained in the deed under consideration, or in any manner limit the effect of the deed, and, this being so, the failure to present to the administrator of deceased the claims secured by it furnishes no ground for a court of equity to cancel the deed. Whitmore v. Savings Union, 50 Cal. 146. As the deed made by plaintiff's intestate requires no judicial foreclosure, and the powers and trusts therein declared are in full force, it follows that sections 1493 and 1502 of the Code of Civil Procedure, prescribing the time within which claims must be presented against the estate of a deceased person, and section 1500 of the same Code, allowing an action for foreclosure of a mortgage, without presentation of such claim, only "when all recourse against any other property of the estate is expressly waived in the complaint," have no application to the case before us, and the right of the defendant to execute the powers conferred by the deed, and apply the proceeds arising therefrom to the payment of the debts and charges named in the deed, is not dependent upon a compliance with these sections.

2. The deed provides that out of the proceeds of the sale of the property thereby conveyed the defendant Calkins shall pay: "(1) The reasonable expenses of the management of said lands and property, and of the execution of these trusts; (2) to the said J. W. Calkins the sum of fifteen thousand dollars, with interest thereon at the rate of ten per cent. per annum, together with the additional sum of ten thousand dollars, which the party of the first part hereby agrees to pay the party of the second part without interest," etc. The court below, in its decree, allowed to the defendant this last-named sum of $10,000, without interest, and its action in this respect is assigned as error. The provision of the deed just quoted was under consideration by this court upon the former appeal, and was construed as follows: "The fact that it appears upon the face of the instrument that payment for all loans and advances, and compensation for all services, with extraordinary interest, is provided for, exclusive of the promise to pay ten thousand dollars without interest, tends to corroborate the averment that there was no consideration for the promise to pay the ten thousand dollars. But for the presumption that there is a consideration for every promise in writing, there would appear to be no consideration for the promise to pay the ten thousand dollars without interest." The construction thus placed upon the deed has become the law of the case, and the question of its correctness is not open to consideration upon this appeal. Table Mountain Tunnel Co. v. Stranahan, 21 Cal. 548. And, in view of what was thus said by the court on the former appeal, we think the court was not, upon its findings, justified in allowing to the defendant Calkins this sum of $10,000. The court found in relation to the consideration for this promise to pay this sum, as follows: "That the said trust deed, and every part thereof, was and is supported by a good and valid consideration received by said Alexander S. More, in the execution of said trusts, and that the item of ten thousand dollars mentioned in said deed of trust was a part of the entire transaction, and was a bonus or consideration in addition to interest on the money provided to be advanced, for the use and benefit of said Alexander S. More, and as part of the consideration for furnishing of the money in said deed of trust provided, and for the services to be rendered and the obligations assumed as set forth in said deed of trust." In this the court does not find that the defendant Calkins was to furnish any other money, or assume any other obligations, or render any other services, than appears from the deed itself. But if it be true, as the court held on the former appeal, "that payment of all loans and advances, and compensation for all services, with extraordinary interest, is provided for exclusive of the promise to pay the ten thousand dollars," it necessarily follows that, unless the promise to pay this $10,000 is founded upon some other consideration than the express agreement of defendant Calkins to furnish the money and assume the other obligations and duties provided for in the deed of trust, the promise to pay this sum must be held to be without consideration, if the law as declared in the former opinion is to be followed. For it was in view of the fact that the court construed the deed as providing in other parts for the payment of everything which the court below finds that defendant was to furnish in the way of money, and for the rendition of all his services as trustee, that upon the former appeal this court said that, "but for the presumption that there is a consideration for every promise in writing, there would appear to be no consideration for the promise to pay the ten thousand dollars, without interest." As already stated, we are not upon this appeal at liberty to review the former opinion, and place upon the deed under consideration any other construction than was given to it there. The defendant upon the close of his trust is entitled to a reasonable compensation for his services, in performing his duties as trustee under the deed, and is entitled to be reimbursed for all expenses incurred by him. The compensation will have to be fixed by the court, unless the parties can agree in relation thereto. The finding of the court, as to the amount which defendant Calkins is entitled to retain out of the proceeds of the sale of the property conveyed by the trust deed, is not questioned, except as to the item of the $10,000, already discussed; that is, his right to retain all the money found due him, except this $10,000, is not denied, unless he lost his right to retain the same by a failure to present his claim therefor to the executor of the deceased. Nor is there any other objection made to the judgment itself.

Under these circumstances it is not necessary that there should be any new trial of the action. Judgment reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to the superior court to modify its judgment in accordance with this opinion by striking therefrom the allowance to defendant Calkins of the said sum of ten thousand dollars, and providing in place thereof that he be allowed a reasonable compensation upon the settlement of the trust, to be fixed by the court.

NORTON v. ATCHISON, T. & S. F. R. Co.

(No. 14,614.)[1]

JUDGMENT—SETTING ASIDE ON MOTION—SUFFICIENCY OF EVIDENCE—APPEAL.

1. The fact that a judgment shows defendant to have been regularly served with process does not preclude evidence aliunde on motion to set aside the judgment made within a few days of its rendition. People v. Goodhue, 22 Pac. Rep. 66, 80 Cal. 199, and People v. Harrison, 24 Pac. Rep. 311, 84 Cal. 607, distinguished.

2. On a motion to set aside a judgment rendered against the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railroad Company, a foreign corporation, on the ground that service was not had upon its managing or business agent as required by Code Civil Proc. § 411, defendant introduced affidavits to show that the person upon whom service was had was not its agent, but the agent of a connecting line, which was operated as a distinct corporation, and that the term "Santa Fe Route" was not used to designate either corporation, but the line of travel formed thereby. Plaintiff sought to overcome this evidence by showing numerous advertisements of the "Santa Fe Route," to some of which the name of the person mentioned was attached as agent, and by showing also that defendant was the owner of a majority of the stock of the connecting company. Held, that a finding declaring the said person not to be defendant's agent, and setting aside the judgment, would not be disturbed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; GEORGE PUTERBAUGH, Judge.

Action by C. V. Norton against the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railroad Company. After judgment for plaintiff by default, defendant appeared, and moved to set aside the judgment on the ground that the service of summons was not such as was authorized by law. From an order granting the said motion, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

William N. Fuller, for appellant. A. Brunson and Hunsaker, Britt & Goodrich, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an action to recover the value of two horses which were delivered by plaintiff to defendant, at the town of Hiawatha, in the state of Kansas, to be transported to the town of Escondido, in the state of California, and which were killed while in transit over the defendant's railroad to their place of destination. The complaint is in the usual form, and alleges negligence in the management of the engine and train of cars as the cause of the killing. The complaint was filed in the superior court of San Diego county, and a summons was thereupon issued and placed in the hands of the sheriff of that county. By his return on the summons, the sheriff certified that he "personally served the same on the 19th day of November, 1890, on K. H. Wade, general manager of the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe R. R. Co., defendant therein named, by delivering to said defendant personally, in the county of San Diego, a copy of said summons, attached to a certified copy of the complaint in the action therein named." No demurrer or answer having been filed, the default of the defendant was entered by the clerk of the court on December 1, 1890. Three days later the case was called for trial, and, after witnesses had been called and examined by the plaintiff, judgment was entered in his favor, according to the prayer of the complaint. The judgment recites that the cause came on regularly for trial, the plaintiff appearing by counsel, and the defendant, a corporation, "having been personally, legally, and regularly served with summons or process, and having failed to appear and answer plaintiff's complaint filed herein, and the legal time for answering having expired, and no answer or demurrer having been filed, the default of said defendant * * * having been duly and legally entered against said defendant according to law: Now, therefore," etc. On the 12th of December, 1890, after due notice, the defendant appeared by attorneys, and moved the court to quash the service of summons and to vacate and set aside the said default and judgment, upon the ground that the said service was not such as was authorized by law, and that the court had no jurisdiction of defendant to enter said default or judgment, and that the same was void. In support of the motion, the defendant offered to read in evidence the affidavits of K. H. Wade and A. Brunson, copies of which had been served. The plaintiff objected to the affidavits being received in evidence, "for the reason that the judgment imports absolute verity, and cannot be attacked by proof aliunde." The objection was overruled, and an exception reserved. The hearing was then continued, and subsequently the plaintiff, not waiving his objections to the defendant's affidavits, introduced and read in evidence certain counter affidavits, and the defendants introduced and read certain additional affidavits. All of the affidavits offered were received and considered by the court; and, as the result of such consideration, the court on January 23, 1891, made an order granting the defendant's motion, and thereby quashed the service of summons, and vacated and set aside the default and judgment entered against defendant. The plaintiff excepted to the order, and has appealed therefrom to this court.

1. Appellant contends that the judgment of a court of general jurisdiction imports absolute verity, and that, on a motion like this to set aside a domestic judgment, the parties to it are estopped to deny the jurisdiction of the court, unless its want of jurisdiction appears on the face of the record; that here the recitals in the judgment that the defendant had been personally, legally, and regularly served with process, conclusively show that the court had acquired jurisdiction of the person of defendant, and that no evidence outside the judgment roll was admissible to contradict these recitals; and hence that it was error to admit in evidence the affidavits offered by defendant and objected to by plaintiff. This position cannot, in our opinion, be sustained. The Code provides that "any judicial record may be impeached by evidence of a want of jurisdiction in the court or judicial officer," (section 1916, Code Civil Proc.;) and the only question is as to the method of procedure to effect the impeachment. The rule invoked is well sustained by the authorities, where a collateral attack is made upon a judgment, but it has no application to a direct attack. Here the motion to set aside the judgment was a direct, and not a collateral, attack, as has been held in numerous cases decided by this court. People v. Mullan, 65 Cal. 396, 4 Pac. Rep. 348; People v. Greene, 74 Cal. 400, 16 Pac. Rep. 197; People v. Pearson, 76 Cal. 400, 18 Pac. Rep. 424; Reinhart v. Lugo, 86 Cal. 395, 24 Pac. Rep. 1089. In Lyons v. Roach, 84 Cal. 30, 23 Pac. Rep. 1026, it is said that "the main difference between collateral and direct attacks is that in the former the record alone can be inspected, and is conclusively presumed to be correct, while on direct attack the true facts may be shown." But it is urged that a judgment can only be set aside on motion when it appears on its face to be void, and that when it does not so appear the proper and only remedy is an action regularly brought to test its validity. In support of this position, counsel cite People v. Goodhue, 80 Cal. 199, 22 Pac. Rep. 66, and People v. Harrison, 84 Cal. 607, 24 Pac. Rep. 311. In the first of these cases a decree of foreclosure was rendered therein on October 30, 1865, and a motion to set aside the decree was made on December 31, 1888, by the successor in interest of the defendant. The summons was served on Goodhue, the defendant, but not on his successor in interest. The court said: "We know of no provision of law which can be held to authorize the vacation of a judgment on a mere motion after so long a time;" and again: "A judgment cannot be attacked in this informal way years after its rendition." In the second case the motion to vacate was made 16 years after the judgment was rendered, and it was held that a motion will not lie to vacate a judgment after the lapse of time limited by statute, if the judgment is not void on its face, and that in all cases after the lapse of such time, when the attempt is made to vacate the judgment, by a proceeding in court for that purpose, an action regularly brought is preferable, and should be required. Here the motion was made within 10 days after the judgment was rendered, and the cases cited are therefore not in point. In a case like this, the proceeding by motion is, in our opinion, authorized, and is the proper way to bring up and test the validity of the judgment. Ede v. Hazen, 61 Cal. 360.

2. Appellant further contends that the decision of the court was not justified by the evidence, and that the order should be reversed for that reason. Section 411 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that "the summons must be served by delivering a copy thereof, as follows: * * * "(2) If the suit is against a foreign corporation * * * doing business and having a managing or business agent, cashier, or secretary within this state, to such agent, cashier, or secretary." It was shown by the affidavits introduced in support of the motion, that the defendant, the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railroad Company, was a corporation organized under the laws of the state of Kansas, and having its principal place of business at the city of Topeka, in that state; that it owned, controlled, and operated a line of railroad from Kansas City, in the state of Missouri, to Albuquerque, in the territory of New Mexico, and no further; and that K. H. Wade, on whom the summons was served, was not at the time of such service, and never had been, the managing or business agent, cashier, or secretary of defendant, within this state or anywhere else. It was also shown that the Atlantic & Pacific Railroad Company was a corporation organized under an act of congress, and that it owned and operated a railroad from Albuquerque, New Mexico, to the town of Barstow, in the state of California; that the Southern California Railway Company was a corporation organized under the laws of this state, and that it owned and operated a railroad from Barstow to National City and other points in California; and that K. H. Wade was the general manager of the last-named company. It was further shown that the three railroads above mentioned constituted a continuous line, and were advertised as such under the name of the "Santa Fe Route," but that the officers of the companies were different, no two of them having the same president, general manager, or other business agents; "that each of said three railroad companies is owned, controlled, and operated independently of the other, under different organizations, with different stockholders and different interests; that the accounts between them are kept as distinctly and separately as are the accounts of any other of the railroads in the United States; that the three companies receive freight and passengers independent of the others, and only deliver to the others as connecting lines, forming a through line of railroad known as the 'Santa Fe Route;'" and that "the appellation 'Santa Fe Route' does not and never did designate either of the corporations operating such line of railroad, but is simply a term used to designate a particular line of travel composed of connecting railroads, operated by distinct railroad companies." Appellant sought to contradict and overcome the evidence introduced by respondent, by showing numerous advertisements of the "Santa Fe Route," to some of which the name, "K. H. Wade, General Manager," was appended, and also by showing that the defendant was the owner of a majority of the stock of the Southern California Railway Company. It is urged that Wade is estopped by these advertisements from denying that he was one of the general managers of the defendant corporation, and "that the evidence clearly establishes the fact that the 'Santa Fe Route' is a synonym of the 'Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railroad Company,' and is used by it to designate its great system, which stretches from Chicago to San Diego, over which through sleeping cars run from Chicago and St. Louis to San Diego, without change, every day in the year." There can be no question of estoppel here. Wade is not a party to the action, and whether he might be estopped or not by his acts, in connection with the advertisements, to deny his agency, is a matter which need not be considered.

The only question then is, was Wade the managing or business agent, cashier, or secretary of the defendant when the summons was served on him? If he was not, then the attempted service did not give the court jurisdiction of the person of the defendant, and its judgment was void. Whether he was such agent or not was a matter to be determined by the court below, in view of all the evidence introduced at the hearing of the motion. The court, as we have seen, decided the question against the theory of appellant; and we do not think its decision can be disturbed. The evidence was conflicting, but a clear preponderance of it seems to sustain the decision.

It is further objected that no sufficient affidavit of merits was filed. We do not think it necessary to pass upon this question, for the reason that, when a judgment is attacked upon the ground that it is not wholly void, no affidavit of merits is required. We therefore advise that the order be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order appealed from is affirmed.

APPEAL—REVIEW—FINDINGS BY COURT.

Where the evidence is sufficient to justify the findings of the lower court, the judgment will not be disturbed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WILLIAM P. WADE, Judge.

Suit by David B. Alexander against William Chick and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Smith, Winder & Smith, for appellants. John D. Bicknell and Benson Wood, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. The controversy in this case is as to the location of a dividing line. It is admitted that the plaintiff owns all of the north half of lot 5, block 13, of Ord's survey, in the city of Los Angeles, except a strip six feet wide at the west end thereof, and that over this strip he has a perpetual right of way or easement to give him access to the rear of his lot, and also that, subject to the plaintiff's right of way, the defendants own the said strip and the lot adjoining it on the west. Lot 5 is bounded on the east by Spring street, and on the north by Fifth street, and, according to the title deeds, its width is 120 feet, and its length from east to west 165 feet. The question is as to the location of the west line of the lot, and this depends upon the location of its east line. The defendants claim that the east line is the line of an old fence built in 1866 by one Ulyard, the common source of their and plaintiff's title, while plaintiff claims that the east line of his lot is the present building line of the block on the west side of Spring street. The fence referred to was about two feet east of the west line of the street as now recognized and established; and the real controversy is therefore in regard to the ownership of a strip about two feet wide, and sixty feet long, at the west end of the lot. The court below found, among other things, that the westerly line of Spring street, as now established, is the easterly line of block 13, according to Ord's survey, and accordingly rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff. The defendants moved for a new trial, which was denied, and then appealed from the judgment and order.

In support of the appeal it is urged that the findings were not justified by the evidence, and that the motion for a new trial should therefore have been granted. It would subserve no useful purpose to state the substance of the evidence, or the theories of counsel in regard to it. After reading all that is found in the record, we are of the opinion that it was fully sufficient to justify the decision of the court, and that the judgment cannot be disturbed on this ground. The point is also made that numerous errors were committed by the court in the admission of evidence which, it is claimed, was immaterial. The point does not seem to be much relied on by counsel, and it is enough to say, in regard to it, that we fail to see any material error in any of the rulings referred to. We advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; FOOTE, C.

BROWNLEE v. RIFFENBURG et al. (No. 14,637.)

ACTION ON ATTACHMENT BOND—WHEN LIES—RETURN OF EXECUTION.

1. An action on an undertaking for the release of attached property cannot be maintained until return of execution unsatisfied in the attachment suit; Code Civil Proc. § 552, providing that, if such execution be returned unsatisfied, plaintiff may prosecute the undertaking, or may proceed as in other cases upon the return of an execution.

2. Where property is released from attachment on an undertaking that "defendant will, on demand, redeliver such attached property, so released, to the proper officer," and plaintiff recovers judgment in the attachment suit, and makes demand for the return of the attached property, action will lie on such undertaking, without demand being made by the sheriff.

Action by John D. Brownlee against W. G. Riffenburg and R. A. Schulenburg upon an undertaking for the release of attached property. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Wellborn, Stevens & Wellborn, for appellants. Shaw & Holland, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This action is upon an undertaking, executed by the defendants, for the release of property taken under a writ of attachment in an action wherein the respondent here was plaintiff and one W. D. Lewis was defendant. The court below gave judgment for the plaintiff, and the defendants have appealed from the judgment and an order denying their motion for a new trial.

The court found that the plaintiff, Brownlee, commenced an action against Lewis for the recovery of money, in the superior court of San Diego county, and took out and caused to be levied on the property of Lewis a writ of attachment; that, after the levy, the defendants here executed and filed in court for the benefit of plaintiff, and pursuant to sections 554 and 555 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the written undertaking sued upon; that upon the filing of the undertaking the court ordered all the property attached to be released and returned to Lewis, and the sheriff thereupon released the same; that such proceedings were afterwards had in the action that the plaintiff recovered judgment therein for the sum of $524.30, no part of which had been paid; that after the recovery of the judgment, and before the commencement of this action, plaintiff demanded of Lewis that he redeliver the property so levied upon to the sheriff of the county to be applied to the payment of his judgment, and also demanded of the defendants, in the possession and custody of one of whom the attached property had been left by Lewis, that they redeliver the same to the sheriff, to be applied to the payment of said judgment; that neither Lewis nor the defendants delivered the property to the sheriff, and that upon their failure to do so plaintiff demanded of defendants that they pay him the full amount of his judgment, which they failed and refused to do; and that no execution was ever issued on the said judgment. Appellants contend that no action can be maintained upon an undertaking given pursuant to section 555 of the Code of Civil Procedure, until an execution has been issued and returned unsatisfied, in whole or in part; and in support of their contention they cite section 552 of the same Code, which reads as follows: "If the execution be returned unsatisfied in whole or in part, the plaintiff may prosecute any undertaking given pursuant to section five hundred and forty, or section five hundred and fifty-five, or he may proceed as in other cases upon the return of an execution." The argument is that this section makes the issuance and return of an execution a condition precedent to the right to commence an action. That the undertaking here sued upon was given pursuant to sections 554 and 555 of the Code of Civil Procedure is alleged in the complaint, recited in the instrument, and found by the court, and it must therefore be regarded as a statutory undertaking. This being so, we think the contention of the appellants must be sustained. Section 552, by providing that if the execution be returned unsatisfied, in whole or in part, the plaintiff may prosecute, etc., in effect declares that, unless or until an execution is issued and returned, no such prosecution shall be had. If this be not the meaning and purpose of the section, then, so far as we can see, it has no meaning or purpose, and might be stricken from the Code without affecting any right or impairing any remedy whatever. In Smith v. Fargo, 57 Cal. 157, the same point was made, and the court said: "In support of the first point, appellant relies upon section 552 of the Code of Civil Procedure; but that section has no application to the case, for the reason that the undertaking was not given pursuant to section 540 or section 555 of the Code. It was not a statutory undertaking, and cannot be held valid and binding as such." From this language the necessary inference would seem to be that, if the undertaking had been a statutory one, given pursuant to the sections referred to, then section 552 would have been applicable and controlling. Appellants also contend that the demands for the redelivery of the attached property should have been made by the sheriff, to whom it was to be delivered, and not by the respondent, and that as made the demands were insufficient. The undertaking was that the "defendant will, on demand, redeliver such attached property, so released, to the proper officer," etc. This is also the language of the Code, § 555, supra; and in it we see nothing to indicate an intention to limit the right to make demand to the officer. On the contrary, it would seem that the plaintiff, in whose behalf the demand is to be made, might himself make it, and it would only be necessary that the officer be clothed with authority to receive the property and sell it. It follows that the judgment and order should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

O'SHEA v. WILKINSON. (No. 14,843.)

APPEAL—RECORD—JUDGMENT ROLL—ACTION AGAINST WARD—DISMISSAL.

1. Where a transcript containing what purports to be the documents that the statute provides constitute the judgment roll has a certificate of the clerk attached, which states that they are correct, but does not say that they constitute the judgment roll, such certificate is sufficient.

2. Where an action was brought against a ward, and she appeared and answered by general guardian, but no cause of action was stated against him individually, a dismissal as to such ward was a dismissal of the entire action.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Kern county; A. R. CONKLIN, Judge.

C. C. Cogwill, for appellant. Ahern & Fay, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. The transcript contains what purports to be copies of the pleadings, order overruling the demurrer, minutes of the court, findings, and judgment, with a certificate of the clerk attached, which states that they are correct, but does not say that they constitute the judgment roll. Respondent claims that we cannot consider matters contained in these papers without a certificate of the clerk that they are copies of the records which constitute the judgment roll. This contention cannot be sustained. The Code specifies what documents shall constitute the judgment roll. Except in cases of default, it is made up by attaching together "the pleadings, a copy of the verdict of the jury or finding of the court or referee, all bills of exceptions taken and filed, and a copy of any order made on demurrer, or relating to change of parties, and a copy of the judgment." Section 670, Code Civil Proc. It is no part of the duties of the clerk to certify that the papers contained in the transcript constitute the record on appeal, (Hayne, New Trial & App. § 268,) although it is the general practice and is proper for the clerk in his certificate to state that the transcript contains a copy of the judgment roll. In the absence of a showing to the contrary, we must presume that the pleadings, order, findings, and judgment mentioned in the certificate are those which constitute the judgment roll. If they do not, it is an easy matter for the respondent, upon suggestion of diminution of the record, to have the transcript corrected here. The complaint stated a cause of action against Agnes Stine, an incompetent person, and the summons was served upon her personally. She appeared and answered by her general guardian, Wilkinson, on June 27, 1889. On December 13, 1889, the plaintiff filed an amended complaint. On December 16th, by consent of all parties, the action was dismissed as against the defendant Agnes Stine, and on the same day a demurrer was filed by Wilkinson on the ground that the amended complaint did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. This demurrer was overruled, and thereafter Wilkinson filed an answer denying specifically the allegations of the complaint.

The demurrer of Wilkinson to the amended complaint ought to have been sustained. It stated no cause of action against Wilkinson. The complaint showed on its face that he was not the real party in interest. An executor, administrator, or trustee of an express trust, or a person expressly authorized by statute, may sue or be sued without joining with him the persons for whose benefit the action is prosecuted, but a guardian does not belong to any of these classes. The guardian appears in the action simply to manage and take care of the interests of the infant when he is a party to the action, and "is no more a party to the action than the attorney, who appears in an action for one who has attained his majority, is a party to the suit in which he enters his appearance." Emeric v. Alvarado, 64 Cal. 593, 2 Pac. Rep. 418; Justice v. Ott, 87 Cal. 530, 25 Pac. Rep. 691.

It is claimed by respondent that, at most, there was but a defect of parties, an objection which was waived by a failure to demur or answer on that ground. It is not a case of a mere defect of parties. A dismissal as to the ward was in effect a dismissal of the action itself, because no attempt was made to charge the defendant in his individual capacity, and he could not represent his ward in the action unless she was a party thereto. There is nothing upon which an amendment can be predicated, and the action must therefore be dismissed. Fox v. Minor, 32 Cal. 111. Judgment reversed, with directions to the court below to dismiss the action.

RISING v. GIBBS. (No. 14,715.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 1, 1892.)

CANCELING DEED—PLEADING.

A complaint to cancel a deed alleged that defendant, without plaintiff's consent, abstracted the deed from a safe where it had been deposited by plaintiff in escrow pending the completion of a proposed sale to defendant of land therein described; that defendant after thus obtaining the deed caused it to be recorded; that no money was ever paid for the land; and defendant refused to pay the consideration or reconvey to plaintiff. Held, that the complaint showed a good cause of action.

Action by Charles E. Rising against E. A. Gibbs to set aside and cancel a deed to land. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. W. Glowner, (Frederick Hall, of counsel,) for appellant. Knight & Knight, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This action is to set aside and cancel a deed, which it is alleged the defendant without plaintiff's consent fraudulently abstracted from a safe, where it had been deposited in escrow by the plaintiff pending the completion of a proposed sale of the land described therein to the defendant. It is further alleged in the complaint that, after getting possession of the deed in this fraudulent manner, the defendant kept it and caused it to be recorded; that no money was ever paid for the purchase of the property; that the defendant refused and still refuses to pay the consideration of the deed so fraudulently obtained and recorded, or restore the property by reconveyance to plaintiff. It is prayed that the deed be ordered delivered to plaintiff and canceled. As will be readily seen, the action is in its nature to quiet the title of the plaintiff to his property, by ordering a deed to be canceled which has surreptitiously and fraudulently come to the possession of the defendant, and had been recorded by him to the injury of the plaintiff. We think the facts set out in the complaint show a good cause of action, and that the demurrer was properly overruled.

The point is made that the findings are not supported by the evidence. The evidence for the plaintiff fully makes out his case; that of the defendant is flatly contradictory thereto, but seems not to have had any weight given to it by the trial court. The evidence as to value of the land and the consideration for the proposed sale was proper to meet the contention of defendant that the consideration paid for the land described in the deed was the sum of $332.95, a small and inadequate price for it, and which the evidence showed on the trial was a store account owed by plaintiff to defendant. We perceive no error whatever in this record, and are of opinion that the appeal is totally devoid of merit, and advise that the judgment and order refusing a new trial be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order refusing a new trial are affirmed.

1. Where the "statement" used on a motion for a new trial does not "specify the particular errors upon which the party will rely," as required by Code Civil Proc. § 659, subd. 3, errors discussed on appeal will not be considered.

2. A single act of sexual intercourse between husband and wife, after commencement of suit for divorce on the ground of adultery, is not alone sufficient to show "restoration of the offending party to all marital rights," as required by Civil Code, § 116, to constitute condonation.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Siskiyou county; EDWIN SHEARER, Judge.

Action for divorce for adultery. From a decree in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. B. Warren and Gillis & Tapecott, for appellant. J. Chadbourne, Clay W. Taylor, and J. V. Brown, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This is an action for divorce and the custody of a minor child. The court found the charge of adultery to be true as alleged in the complaint, and rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff, dissolving the bonds of matrimony, and awarding to him the custody of the child.

In their brief, counsel for appellant discuss a large number of errors alleged to have been committed by the court during the trial; but, as there is no specification of error in the statement, they cannot be considered. Ferrer v. Insurance Co., 47 Cal. 427; Fleming v. Albeck, 67 Cal. 227, 7 Pac. Rep. 659; Pico v. Cohn, 67 Cal. 258, 7 Pac. Rep. 680. The statute provides that "when the notice designates as the ground of the motion errors in law occurring at the trial, and excepted to by the moving party, the statement shall specify the particular errors upon which the party will rely." Section 659, subd. 3, Code Civil Proc. The object of this provision is apparent: it is to enable the adverse party to prepare his amendments without the necessity of going through the statement proposed by the moving party to ascertain what objections, rulings, and exceptions are incorporated therein. Unless the alleged errors are specifically pointed out, they are deemed to have been waived by the moving party. He is bound to state upon what particular errors he will rely for a new trial.

The defendant, after denying the allegations of adultery, alleged that, subsequent to the filing of the amended complaint, the plaintiff, being fully informed as to the matters alleged therein, freely condoned all offenses committed by the defendant, freely forgave the defendant, and cohabited with her. The court found that the plaintiff did not condone or forgive, nor did he cohabit or have sexual intercourse with her, as alleged in the answer, and that there was not any reconciliation between the parties, or restoration of the defendant to any marital rights. This is the only finding of the court which is attacked as not supported by the evidence. The defendant testified that after the commencement of the action she went to the hotel kept by the plaintiff; that he requested her to go down to the cottage; that she went to the cottage with him, where they undressed and went to bed together; that they stayed there most of the afternoon, and had sexual intercourse. The plaintiff testified that he did not have sexual intercourse with the defendant, as stated by her, nor at any time after the commencement of the action, but did not say whether he had undressed and occupied the bed with her in the cottage. Appellant insists that upon this state of the evidence the court ought to have found in favor of the defendant on the defense of condonation. It has been held that one act of sexual intercourse is conclusive evidence of condonation in cases of adultery, (Anon., 6 Mass. 147,) although it is not where the offense alleged is extreme cruelty or desertion, (Gardner v. Gardner, 2 Gray, 434; Kennedy v. Kennedy, 87 Ill. 250.) But, however this may be, it is sufficient to say here that the court has found against the defendant on the plea of condonation, and its finding is conclusive. The question of the plaintiff's credibility, and the probability of his statement, in view of his failure to deny that he undressed and went to bed with the defendant, as stated by her, are matters for determination in the court below, and not here. Furthermore, under our statute, one of the requirements necessary to condonation is "restoration of the offending party to all marital rights," (section 116, Civil Code,) and this requirement is not proved by evidence of sexual intercourse alone. The testimony of the defendant, taken as true, does not necessarily show forgiveness or intention on his part to take her back to his home, and restore her to marital rights. Kennedy v. Kennedy, 87 Ill. 254.

Judgment and order affirmed.

SMITH v. CITY OF SAN LUIS OBISPO. (No. 14,628.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 3, 1892.)

HIGHWAYS—COMMON-LAW DEDICATION—WHAT IS.

In ejectment for a strip of land which defendant city claimed as a public street, it appeared that the strip was used by the public before H., plaintiff's grantor, became the owner of the tract in which it was included, but was never formally dedicated to the public or platted as a street; that in 1875 H. sold a lot abutting thereon, representing to the purchaser that the land in suit was a street; that in 1883 H. built a fence on each side of the strip, leaving it open at each end, and it was thus used by the public for eight years, and until plaintiff, becoming the owner of the abutting land, fenced it up, claiming it as his land; that in 1884, before selling the land, H. stated that he had intended the strip for a street, but, as the town had not worked it, he considered that he had a right to sell it. Held, that the acts of H. constituted a common-law dedication of the land to the public as a street, and plaintiff could not recover.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. E. GREGG, Judge.

Ejectment by Levi Smith against the city of San Luis Obispo. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Wm. Shipsey, for appellant. Wilcoxon & Bouldin, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. Ejectment to recover a parcel of land in the city of San Luis Obispo, alleging an ouster on November 13, 1890. The answer denied all the allegations of the complaint, except that defendant was a municipal corporation, and alleged that the demanded premises "is, and for many years last past has been, a public street of said city, to the possession of which the defendant is entitled for street purposes." The plaintiff had judgment, and defendant appeals upon the judgment roll. The demanded premises is a strip of land about 45 feet wide and 175 feet long, and which would be wholly occupied or covered by Beach street, in the city of San Luis Obispo, if that street were extended from a point claimed by plaintiff to be its present northwesterly terminus to Marsh street. A diagram made part of the findings, but which it is not necessary to reproduce in this opinion, shows the course of Marsh street to be northeasterly and southwesterly. Pacific street is easterly from and parallel to Marsh street. Nipomo street crosses both Marsh street and Pacific street nearly at right angles, and Beach street is about 500 feet southerly from and parallel to Nipomo street. The land in controversy extends from Marsh street easterly about half way to Pacific street, to the point claimed by the plaintiff to be the westerly terminus of Beach street, from which point Beach street extends easterly across and beyond Pacific street. The court found that in October, 1871, the United States conveyed by patent to the trustees of the town of San Luis Obispo a tract of land which included the demanded premises, and in November of the same year said trustees conveyed to one Higuera a portion of said patented tract, including the part in controversy. In January, 1884, Higuera conveyed to one St. Clair. In March, 1884, St. Clair conveyed to Forbes, and in March, 1888, Forbes conveyed to the plaintiff. The court further found that Beach street, extending from the land in controversy easterly, has been a public street since the year 1870, but that from 1870 until some time in 1888 there was an obstruction on that part of Beach street adjoining the land in controversy, consisting of a corral maintained by one Martinez; that for eight years last past the land in controversy has been fenced on both sides on the lines of Beach street, if produced to Marsh street, but was not fenced on the line of Marsh street, but has always been open until after Forbes conveyed to plaintiff in 1888, when plaintiff built a fence on the line of Marsh street across Beach street, if produced, which fence was maintained by plaintiff until removed by defendant on November 13, 1890; during all the times above mentioned the land remained in the condition above described, having no other structure or improvement thereon; that, for 15 years prior to the building of said fence by the plaintiff on the line of Marsh street, the land in controversy was traveled over by a large number of persons when the bars in said corral were down, and when not down were passed by persons on foot who desired to pass; that in June, 1875, Higuera, who had purchased a part of said patented tract on each side of and including the premises in controversy, sold and conveyed to one Pellerie a lot fronting on Marsh street which adjoined the land in controversy, and at the time of the sale Higuera informed the purchaser that the lot he was selling to him was a corner lot, and that the street on the easterly side of the lot was Beach street. Nine years after selling that lot to Pellerie, viz., in 1884, and before he conveyed to St. Clair, Higuera said to one Pinho that he had intended the land in controversy for a street, but as the town authorities had not worked it, or done anything about it, he considered he had a right to sell it, and intended to sell it. The court further found that these premises had never been platted as a street, nor marked as such, upon any map, public or private; that from 1871 to the present time, except two years when it was not assessed, it was assessed to Higuera and his successors in interest, and the taxes thereon were paid by them. Upon the foregoing facts the trial court concluded that there had never been a dedication by the plaintiff or his predecessors in interest of this property to public use as a street, and that the defendant had not in any manner accepted any dedication thereof as a street; and the questions now to be determined are whether these findings are sustained by the record.

Dedication of land to a public use is simply setting it apart or devoting it to that use. To constitute a dedication at common law, no particular formality of either word or act is required. "It may be made either with or without writing, by any act of the owner, such as throwing open his land to public travel, or platting it and selling lots bounded by streets designated in the plat, thereby indicating a clear intention to dedicate; or an acquiescence in the use of his land for a highway, or his declared assent to such use, will be sufficient; the dedication being proved in most, if not all, of the cases by matter in pais, and not by deed. The vital principle of the dedication is the intention to dedicate; and, whenever this is unequivocally manifested, the dedication, so far as the owner of the soil is concerned, has been made." Harding v. Jasper, 14 Cal. 648. This case has not only been cited and approved by this court down to the present time, but accords with the best-considered cases in many other states. We think the probative facts found by the court clearly show an act of dedication of the land in controversy by Higuera to public use for street purposes, both preceded and followed by expressed statements showing his intention so to dedicate it. The act to which we especially refer was that of building a fence on each side of this strip of land on the side lines of Beach street produced to Marsh street, while leaving it open at each end, thus giving free access to it from either direction. These fences were built eight years before the trial of the case, viz., in 1883. For fifteen years prior to that time this parcel of land was traveled over by a large number of persons when the bars of the corral were down. This use of the land by the public does not appear to have been objected to at any time. If it had been without his consent, we may reasonably suppose that, instead of marking out specifically the lines of the street, he would have built an obstruction across it; but thus building the fences while it was being used as a street seems to be as clear and explicit a dedication to the public for street purposes as could well have been made. Much the larger number of cases of this character in cities and towns base the evidence of dedication upon plats showing streets, and the reference thereto in sales and conveyances of lots; but the visible marking out upon the ground of the extension of Beach street from a point about midway between Pacific and Marsh streets by fences, especially when the ground between these fences was then and for many years had been used and traveled by a large number of persons, would seem to be more conclusive evidence of intention to dedicate the same to public use than the mere platting of unused ground. Indeed, in the latter case, until an acceptance by the town authorities or by the public, or until by the sale of lots in accordance with the plat by which the owner has vested an interest in the street in others, it is a mere offer to dedicate the land for street purposes, which he may withdraw at his pleasure. The obstruction maintained by Martinez, consisting of a corral, the bars of which were sometimes up and sometimes down, could not effect the dedication of the land in controversy to street purposes. It was not upon Higuera's land, nor maintained by him, but was upon a public street of the city, as expressly found by the court. Even if the obstructions were permanent, and such as the public could not remove otherwise than by condemnation, it is expressly held that a cul-de-sac may be dedicated to public use. Stone v. Brooks, 35 Cal. 497, 498, and cases there cited.

As to the fact that this strip of land had been assessed to Higuera and his successors in interest, and the taxes paid by them continuously, except two years, when it was not assessed, we are of opinion it does not affect the dedication. The findings do not show that this was assessed as a separate lot by a designation which would identify it, nor that the larger tract owned by Higuera, as shown by the second finding, had ever been subdivided into lots and blocks; and if the entire tract was assessed as a whole, as we may fairly infer from the findings, the failure to except this part covered by a traveled way was entirely proper,—as much so as not to except a highway in the assessment of a farm. Besides, we think the general public are not estopped by the act or omission of the city assessor in this regard, nor that the payment of the tax by Higuera, under the circumstances disclosed by the findings, could be held to rebut his intention, as shown by specific acts, to dedicate the land for street purposes. In 1875, eight years before Higuera built these fences, he represented to one Pellerie, to whom he sold a lot fronting on Marsh street, that "it was a corner lot; that that was Beach street on the east side of the lot referred to," thus recognizing it as an existing street at that time. In 1884 he said to one Pinho that he had intended the land in controversy for a street, but, as the town authorities had not worked it or done anything about it, he considered he had a right to sell it, and intended to sell it. This statement confirms our conclusion as to the intention with which all his previous acts had been performed, and only shows his legal conclusion that he had a right to sell the land because the town authorities had not improved the street. In this conclusion we think he was wrong.

If it were necessary that the municipal authorities should accept the dedication by some formal act, or by improving the street, in order to consummate or perfect the dedication, or to render it irrevocable, then Higuera's conclusion that he had a right to sell the land was correct, and the judgment should be affirmed. Upon the question whether the acceptance must be by the municipal authorities, or whether the use of the street by the general public under and in accordance with the dedication is sufficient, the authorities are by no means uniform. In some states legislative enactments require a formal acceptance. In others, in the absence of any statutory requirements, the improvement of the road or street by the authorities specially charged with their care is required by the courts to establish the fact of acceptance, in the absence of more formal action. The ground upon which these statutes and decisions rests is that the municipality ought not to be charged with the burden of improving streets which the authorities may deem unnecessary. But that does not seem to have been the policy of this state, legislative or judicial. Prior to 1883, section 2619 of the Political Code provided that "all roads used as such for a period of more than five years are highways." The chapter containing the above provision was repealed, and sections 2618–2756, Pol. Code, were enacted February 28, 1883, and section 2618, as it now exists, recognizes as highways, not only those laid out by the public, but those also which have been dedicated or abandoned to the public, or made such in actions for the partition of real property. It will be noticed, too, that this section expressly includes streets, alleys, lanes, courts, places, etc., in the term "highways." "A 'highway' is nothing but an easement, comprehending merely the right of all the individuals in the community to pass and repass, with the incidental right in the public to do all the acts necessary to keep it in repair." Peck v. Smith, 1 Conn. 103, 132. It might with some force be contended that the use of the ground in controversy for the period of more than five years prior to the repeal of section 2619, Pol. Code, in the manner stated in the findings, made it a statutory highway. See Bolger v. Foss, 65 Cal. 250, 3 Pac. Rep. 871.

Independently of the statute, however, we think the use of the street by the public for a reasonable length of time, where the intention of the owner to dedicate is clearly shown, is sufficient, without any specific action by the municipal authorities, either by resolution or by repairs or improvements. A common-law dedication operates against the dedicator by estoppel, and this estoppel may be invoked by or on behalf of the public at large as well as by the municipal authorities of the city, for a street is a highway for the use and benefit of the public at large, though under the immediate care of the municipality. In New Orleans v. U. S., 10 Pet. 662, it was held that, in order to dedicate property for public use in cities and towns and other places, it is not essential that the right to use the same shall be vested in a corporate body. It may exist in the public, and have no other limitation than the wants of the community at large. This case was cited and approved by this court upon this point in School Dist. v. Heath, 56 Cal. 480, where Bryant v. McCandless, 7 Ohio, 426, was also cited to the point "that dedications of land for public or charitable uses are good without a donee to take title." These cases were not those involving the acceptance of streets or highways, but the principle involved is the same. Indeed, it is difficult to conceive how the general public could, without legislative intervention, accept a dedication to their use otherwise than by user for the purpose for which the dedication was made. In Harding v. Jasper, 14 Cal. 647, it was said: "If the soil be accepted and used by the public in the manner intended by the owner, the dedication is complete;" and this quotation is cited in San Francisco v. Calderwood, 31 Cal. 589, in such connection as to show that the acceptance by the public was that shown by mere user. In San Francisco v. Canavan, 42 Cal. 553, this court said: "To constitute a valid and complete dedication, two things must occur, to wit, an intention by the owner, clearly indicated by his words or acts, to dedicate the land to public use, and an acceptance by the public of the dedication. This acceptance is generally established by the use by the public of the land for the purpose to which it had been dedicated." In Stone v. Brooks, 35 Cal. at 497, it was said: "There does not seem to be any necessity for a formal acceptance by some particular board of officers. Such a requirement would destroy the common-law doctrine of dedication." In several cases where the distinction between a formal acceptance and an acceptance by user was not important to be observed, general language is used which might seem to imply that a formal acceptance was necessary; but we do not recall any case where the doctrine that user alone by the public is sufficient acceptance is denied. We therefore advise that the judgment of the superior court be reversed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

DEHAIL et al. v. MORFORD et al. (No. 14,698.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 2, 1892.)

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS—STREET IMPROVEMENTS—ASSESSMENT OF BENEFITS—WAIVER OF OBJECTIONS.

1. St. 1889, p. 70, § 2, relating to the improvement of streets, provides that before ordering any work to be done the city council shall pass a resolution declaring its intention and describing the land to be taken, and specifying the exterior boundaries of the district to be affected and assessed. The city of Los Angeles adopted an ordinance for the widening of a certain street, which provided that "the exterior boundaries of the district of land to be benefited by said improvement, and to be assessed to pay the damages, costs, and expenses thereof, are as follows: All lots and parcels of land fronting on each side of First street, from the west side of Los Angeles street to the west line of Alameda street; also all of the property of the railroads situated upon said First street between said points shall also be assessed," etc. Held, that the ordinance failed to specify the "exterior boundaries" of the district to be assessed, and that the city acquired no jurisdiction.

2. Plaintiffs, by appearing before the city council and filing objections to the improvements, and afterwards protesting against the report of the commissioners, did not waive the right to object to the want of jurisdiction.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; WALTER VAN DYKE, Judge.

Suit by Dehail and others against Morford and others to retrain the sale of certain lands to satisfy a street assessment. Judgment for plaintiffs. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

C. McFarland, for appellants. J. L. Murphey and M. S. Stiles, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. The city of Los Angeles adopted an ordinance July 8, 1889, for the widening of First street from the west side of Los Angeles street to the west line of Alameda street, for which certain lands were to be taken, and the costs, damages, and expenses thereof to be paid by an assessment upon other lands to be benefited thereby. Further proceedings were had under the ordinance, culminating in an assessment upon certain lands bordering upon the improvement, which was placed in the hands of the defendant Morford, a street superintendent of the city, for collection; and the defendant having advertised for sale, and being about to sell, for the purpose of satisfying said assessment, certain lots of land belonging to the plaintiffs, this action was brought to restrain him from making the sale. The defendants answered the complaint, setting out the proceedings leading up to the assessment, and the proceedings thereunder; and upon the motion of the plaintiffs the court rendered judgment in their favor upon the pleadings, perpetually enjoining the defendants from making said sale. From this judgment the defendants have appealed.

Section 2 of the act of March 6, 1889, (St. 1889, p. 70,) under which the proceedings for widening the street were had, declares: "Sec. 2. Before ordering any work to be done, or improvement made, which is authorized by section 1 of this act, the city council shall pass a resolution declaring its intention to do so, describing the work or improvement, and the land deemed necessary to be taken therefor, and specifying the exterior boundaries of the district of lands to be affected or benefited by said work or improvement, and to be assessed to pay the damages, costs, and expenses thereof." The ordinance adopted by the city of Los Angeles for widening said street provides for an assessment to pay the cost of the improvement, in the following language: "Sec. 2. That the exterior boundaries of the district of land to be benefited by said improvement, and to be assessed to pay the damages, costs, and expenses thereof, are as follows: All lots and parcels of land fronting on each side of First street, from the west side of Los Angeles street to the west line of Alameda street; also all of the property of the railroads situated upon said First street between said points,—shall also be assessed to pay said costs, damages, and expenses." This is not a compliance with the provisions of the above section of the statute, for a resolution "specifying the exterior boundaries" of the district to be assessed to pay the cost of the improvement. The only boundaries of the district which are "specified" are the lines of First street between Los Angeles and Alameda streets, and these, instead of being the "exterior boundaries" of the district to be assessed, are only the boundaries of a tract within the district which is exempted from assessment. There is nothing in the description of the district from which its extent in either direction from First street can be ascertained, or by which any one can determine the quantity of land which is to be assessed. A very obvious reason for this requirement of the statute is that each owner of property within the district may be informed of the extent of territory which is to bear the burden of the improvement, and thus, by calculating the relative burden upon himself, determine whether the burden to be borne by himself will be so disproportionate to the benefit of the improvement that he can make suitable representations to the city council when it comes to act upon the ordinance in pursuance of its resolution of intention. While each owner of property may know the depth and area of his own lot within the district, he is not presumed to know that of the other lot owners, and consequently cannot know the relative proportion of the expense which he will be called upon to bear, and cannot intelligently make any objections before the council "to the extent of the district of lands to be affected or benefited by said work or improvement," which by section 4 of the statute he is authorized to make and have considered by the council. Irrespective of such reason, however, it is a sufficient reason that the legislature has prescribed this as a requirement to be observed by the city council, and one of the steps to be taken by it, before it can have any jurisdiction in the matter; and it is a fundamental principle in proceedings of this character that every requirement of the statute which has a semblance of benefit to the owner must be observed in order to give to the municipality jurisdiction in the premises. After the jurisdiction has once been acquired, subsequent proceedings can be attacked for only such irregularities as affect substantial rights, but, for the purpose of acquiring jurisdiction, every requirement must be regarded as of equal necessity.

The plaintiffs did not waive their right to object to this want of jurisdiction by the fact that they appeared before the city council and filed objections to the improvement, and afterwards protested against the report of the commissioners. If the city council failed to acquire jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the improvement, it could not acquire jurisdiction by the consent of the plaintiffs, much less by the fact that they objected to the improvement. It was said in Hewes v. Reis, 40 Cal. 263: "The right to appear before the board and object cannot certainly excuse the performance of those acts which are conditions precedent to the exercise of the power, nor does this right of remonstrance possess the least semblance of a remedy for a wrong that may be committed notwithstanding the protest;" and the actual appearance and protesting cannot have any greater effect for the purpose of conferring jurisdiction than the unexercised right of so appearing and protesting.

CARTER v. BALDWIN. (No. 14,598.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 3, 1892.)

ATTORNEY'S CONTRACT—COMPENSATION—WAIVER OF PERFORMANCE.

Where a firm of attorneys is employed for a stipulated amount, payable on the termination of a suit, to assist other senior counsel to prosecute a specified suit, and such suit is not brought, and no further demand is made of such firm for said services, after waiting a reasonable time for such demand performance will be deemed waived, and recovery may be had on the contract of employment.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. H. CLARK, Judge.

Action by Carter against Baldwin to recover on a contract. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wells, Monroe & Lee, for appellant. Anderson & Anderson, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. This action is brought by plaintiff as assignee of a contract made by defendant with the law firm of Silent, Wade & Fitzgerald. The complaint was filed on April 14, 1890, and alleges, in substance, that defendant on February 10, 1886, employed said firm of Silent, Wade & Fitzgerald to prosecute certain libel suits then pending, and to be brought, against one Bell, and a civil suit against the Los Angeles Times for libelous articles theretofore published, the defendant agreeing to pay for such services $2,000, of which sum $500 was to be paid in cash, $500 in 60 days from date of the agreement, "and the balance of $1,000 on the termination of said suits." The complaint further alleges that the assignors of plaintiff fully performed said contract, and that all of the suits referred to in the agreement have been terminated, and that defendant has not paid the balance of $1,000 agreed to be paid on the termination thereof, and this action is brought to recover such balance. The answer of defendant denied that plaintiff's assignors had performed the services required of them under the contract stated in the complaint, and in this connection alleged that the suit against the Los Angeles Times was never commenced, and that no services had been rendered therein, as contemplated by said contract. The action was tried by the court without a jury, and findings were filed, and a judgment rendered in accordance therewith in favor of the plaintiff for the full amount claimed by him. The defendant appeals.

It is conceded that the contemplated suit against the Los Angeles Times was never commenced, and the claim of appellant is that, this being so, the plaintiff is not entitled to recover. We think, however, that the evidence tended to show a waiver of performance of this particular service, and the findings of the court fairly construed are to this effect. The evidence upon the part of the plaintiff tended to show that the firm of Silent, Wade & Fitzgerald were employed to assist other attorneys of defendant in the prosecution of the suits referred to in the complaint. The attorneys thus to be assisted were the regular attorneys for defendant, and had commenced the civil suits which were then pending, and, according to the testimony for plaintiff, were to continue as senior counsel, not only in these, but were to act as such in the one to be brought against the Los Angeles Times. The defendant never went near the firm of Silent, Wade & Fitzgerald after employing them, nor in any manner thereafter requested them to bring the action against the Los Angeles Times, nor did the other attorneys, whom they were employed to assist in the matter, ever call upon them for any service in relation to such suit. When this action was commenced the period of limitation fixed by the laws of this state within which to commence the action against the Los Angeles Times for the alleged libel had expired. It is true the defendant in such an action might waive this defense, but still such long delay upon the part of the defendant in the matter of directing the commencement of such suit is strong evidence that he had abandoned all intention of bringing it. It is undoubtedly true that in many cases the contract employing an attorney to prosecute an action would be construed as containing an implied, if not express, direction to the attorney to bring such action without further request upon the part of the client, but, under the contract which the evidence of plaintiff tended to establish in this case, it was not incumbent upon the assignors of plaintiff to commence the action against the Los Angeles Times without further directions from defendant, or from the other attorneys who were to act as senior or leading counsel for defendant in the prosecution of the case; and, having waited a reasonable length of time without receiving such directions, they were justified in assuming that defendant had waived the performance of this particular service, and they were entitled to recover upon the contract, as if such service had been actually performed. The complaint in this case alleges full performance of the contract upon the part of Silent, Wade & Fitzgerald, whereas the evidence upon the part of plaintiff tended to show performance by them of all services contemplated by the contract, except in relation to the suit against the Los Angeles Times, and as to that a waiver of performance by defendant. We do not regard the variance as material. The evidence was received without objection, and it is apparent from the record that the defendant was not misled thereby. This being so, the variance is to be disregarded, under section 469 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which declares: "No variance between the allegation in a pleading and the proof is to be deemed material, unless it has actually misled the adverse party to his prejudice in maintaining his action or defense upon the merits." The evidence upon the trial was conflicting upon material points, but the case seems to have been fully and fairly tried, and we find no error in the record.

Judgment and order affirmed.

CUSTODY OF CHILDREN.

In chambers. Petition of Margaret J. Olsen for a writ of habeas corpus, to obtain the custody of Della Gracie Gates, petitioner's daughter by a former marriage. Writ discharged.

BEATTY, C. J. The petitioner, Margaret J. Olsen, a resident of Santa Clara county, is the mother of Della Gracie Gates, aged 10 years and 5 months, who, the petitioner alleges, is unlawfully restrained of her liberty by James Eldridge, at his residence, in Lassen county. Said Eldridge admits that he has the custody of the child, and claims that he has a right thereto by virtue of an order of the superior court of Shasta county, appointing him her guardian. From the facts disclosed by the petition, the return, and the evidence adduced at the hearing, I am satisfied that the order appointing Mr. Eldridge guardian of the child is void for want of jurisdiction, and that the petitioner is the person legally entitled to her custody. But, in view of the special circumstances of the case, I do not feel called upon to make any coercive order by which the mere legal right of the petitioner may be enforced against the child's manifest inclination and reasonable choice to remain where she is. The petitioner voluntarily relinquished the care of her child when she was scarcely a year old, and ever since she was two years of age has left her in the exclusive charge and control of Mr. and Mrs. Eldridge, the latter being a sister of the child's father. The natural and inevitable consequence has been that this little girl, knowing no other parents or protectors, and never seeing her mother but twice in nearly nine years, has become deeply attached to her aunt and uncle, as they have to her, and has come to look upon her mother as a stranger. Though she has not reached the years of legal discretion, she is sufficiently intelligent to be trusted in some degree to choose in a matter affecting so deeply her feelings and her interests, and, having examined her privately, I am convinced that it would be nothing less than an act of extreme cruelty to tear her from the only home she has ever known, even for the purpose of placing her under the care of her own mother. Her material interests also will be promoted by leaving her where she is, and where she chooses to remain. Her mother is without means to support her, except as they may be provided by her present husband, who, however willing he may be, is under no legal obligation to support a step-child, and has but small ability to do so. Mr. and Mrs. Eldridge, on the contrary, have ample means and have no children of their own. They live in a healthy locality in the country, where all the surroundings are favorable to the moral and physical well-being of the child, and they have the disposition and ability to provide for her nurture, education, and future comfort and security. Under these circumstances, I consider that my duty in the premises is fulfilled by seeing that the child is freed from all illegal restraint, and leaving her free to go to the home of her choice. Writ discharged.

KELLEY v. OWENS et al. (No. 13,804.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 3, 1892.)

EVIDENCE—SHIFTING BURDEN OF PROOF—FRAUD.

1. Plaintiff asked that an agreement made by her to convey land to defendant for stock in an iron and steel company be canceled, alleging that defendant induced her to make the contract by representing that a new method had been discovered for the cheap manufacture, at a great profit, of a superior quality of fine steel and iron, for which invention a caveat had been filed, and that this company had been formed for the manufacture of steel under this process; which representations plaintiff alleged to be false, and known by defendant so to be. Held that, as these were negative allegations, but little was necessary to shift the burden of proof to the party having the best opportunities for knowledge of the facts, and that testimony of an expert that the process, as given in the caveat, would not produce steel, was sufficient to place on defendant the burden of proving the truth of the representations made by him.

2. In such case, if the representations made by defendant were false, he cannot show that plaintiff did not rely on them by evidence that plaintiff investigated the matter for herself, and expressed herself as fully satisfied, when such investigations consisted merely in asking information from persons to whom she was referred by defendant, and who knew and could know nothing of the process, except what they were told of it by him.[1]

3. Where fraud in the purchase or sale of property is in issue, evidence of other frauds of like character, committed by the same parties, at or near the same time, is admissible.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Contra Costa county; R. CROUCH, Judge.

Action by Mrs. H. S. Kelley against William Owens, executor, and Helen M. Owens. From a judgment for defendants, and an order denying a motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

D. M. Delmas, (Bull & Cleary, of counsel,) for appellant. Garret W. McEnerney and George Maxwell, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. This was a suit in equity to rescind and cancel an agreement for the sale of land made by appellant with said H. K. Owens, and a conveyance to him of said land pursuant to said agreement. H. K. Owens died after the commencement of the action, and the executor of his estate was substituted. Helen M. Owens, the wife of H. K. Owens, was made a party originally, because of the conveyance of said land to her by her husband. Defendants had judgment, and this appeal is taken from an order denying appellant's motion for a new trial.

[1] Decision on this point withdrawn. See 31 Pac Rep. 14.

Appellant was the owner of 480 acres of land in Colusa county, alleged to be of the value of $20,000, and found by the court to be of the value of $17,000; and on June 5, 1884, entered into a contract with H. K. Owens, by which she agreed to convey said land to him in consideration of 55,240 shares of the capital stock of the Pacific Coast Steel & Iron Manufacturing Company. The said stock was transferred to appellant immediately after said contract was made, and on the 14th of June, 1884, appellant conveyed said land to said Owens. The complaint alleged, in substance, that said Owens, in order to induce plaintiff to exchange said land for said stock, represented that one "Lee was the discoverer and inventor of a new method for the cheap manufacture, at great profit, of a superior quality of fine steel and merchantable iron from pig iron and other iron and iron ore;" that said Lee had secured the right to have his said invention patented; that he (Owens) had aided and assisted Lee in obtaining said right to a patent, and in forming a corporation for the manufacture of said steel by said process,—which representations she alleged were false, and known so to be by Owens; that she relied upon them, and believed them to be true, and was thereby induced to enter into said contract and make said conveyance. The complaint further charged that Lee and Owens confederated together to form said corporation for the purpose of defrauding plaintiff and other purchasers of stock, and, in pursuance of said design, made representations similar to those above recited, all of which averments were denied in the answer. The court found the contract, conveyance, and transfer of the stock as alleged. The findings upon the other allegations, upon which issues were raised, are very full, covering seven pages of the transcript. These findings are to the effect that H. K. Owens did not, for the purpose of inducing the plaintiff to make the conveyance or otherwise, represent that Lee was the discoverer or inventor of the said process, but that he did represent that he "believed Lee was the discoverer and inventor of a new method for the cheap manufacture, at great profit, of a superior quality of fine steel and merchantable iron, from pig iron and other iron and iron ore." The findings further show that Owens represented to plaintiff that Lee had filed a caveat for his said invention; that Owens had advanced from time to time large sums of money to Lee to enable him to perfect his invention, and manufacture specimens of steel; that he had aided Lee in forming said corporation; and that his representations were true. The court further found "that said Lee was, at all times alleged in the amended and supplemental complaint mentioned, the discoverer and inventor of a new method for the cheap manufacture, at great profit, of a superior quality of fine steel and merchantable iron, from pig iron and other iron and iron ore." It was further found that the representations made by Owens to plaintiff were none of them false, or known or believed by Owens to be false, but that each of them was true, and known and believed by Owens to be true; that the plaintiff did not rely upon said representations, or any of them, in making said contract and deed, and was not induced thereby to do so. Appellant, in her motion for a new trial, attacked nearly all of the findings, including those above mentioned, upon the ground that they were not justified by the evidence.

Many witnesses were examined, and the testimony is voluminous. I think the findings in several particulars covered by appellant's specifications are not sustained by the evidence. Some general facts disclosed by the evidence, and not controverted by counsel, may be first stated. In 1883, Dr. Lee claimed to have discovered the process mentioned in the complaint for the manufacture of steel. He was without financial ability to conduct experiments necessary to perfect his alleged discovery; as Owens stated to the witness Cousins, he (Lee) was very poor, that he had nothing, that he (Owens) furnished him means, and, he thought, even bought him clothes. Under these circumstances, Mr. Owens furnished Lee a laboratory in the city of San Francisco, where for some time he prosecuted his experiments, and then a plant at Melrose was secured, where it was claimed steel was made by Lee's alleged process. This plant was afterwards moved to Martinez, for the purpose of securing better freight facilities, and where a larger plant was to be and was in part erected. In the mean time, in October, 1883, Lee and H. K. Owens organized the corporation known as the Pacific Coast Steel & Iron Manufacturing Company, with a capital stock of 215,000 shares, of the par value of $5 each, and of which stock the complaint alleges, and it is not denied, Lee and Owens had issued to them 115,000 shares, and of which corporation Lee was president and Owens treasurer; three other persons, with Lee and Owens, constituting the board of directors.

1. The representation that Lee was the discoverer and inventor of a new method for the cheap manufacture, at great profit, of a superior quality of fine steel, whether true or false, or whether made positively, or upon belief merely, lies at the foundation of this controversy. The fifth finding is that H. K. Owens did make that representation to plaintiff, but that it was made upon belief, while the tenth finding is that it is true; and, if true, it is immaterial whether it was made as the positive assertion of a fact, or merely as an assertion that he believed Lee was the discoverer of such new process or method. This representation was very comprehensive. It was not merely the discovery of a method of making steel, but of a new method for the cheap manufacture, at a great profit, of a superior quality of fine steel. Then, as now, the manufacture of steel was a great industry. Methods of its manufacture had long been known. The opportunity for any one to engage in its manufacture by methods theretofore known was open, but by such methods the new manufacturer must compete on not more than equal terms with those who then occupied the field. The inducement, therefore, to engage in this enterprise was a new method, a cheap one, affording large profits, while the product was superior, thus assuring a ready market, and in addition that a caveat protecting the discovery had been filed, thus securing the corporation against competition in the use of the same process. In order, therefore, to justify the tenth finding, something more must appear than that Dr. Lee discovered a method theretofore unknown to him, by which he could make steel; but the method must be new, in the sense that it was unknown to and unused by all others engaged in the manufacture of steel, while the cheapness of the method, insuring large profits, and the superior quality of the steel, were equally potent elements in recommending it to the favor of investors. The evidence bearing upon the proposition that such discovery or invention was not made by Dr. Lee is voluminous, and is found in parts of the testimony of many witnesses. The alleged discovery or invention is described in the caveat filed by Dr. Lee in the United States patent office, under date of April 12, 1884, copy of which appears in the transcript. Patrick Noble, a witness called on behalf of the plaintiff, testified that he was superintendent of the Pacific Rolling Mills, had been in that business eight years, and was familiar with the manufacture, composition, and handling of metals, including steel; that he had made a study of that subject, and was familiar with the different processes of making steel that are known to the world; that he had seen the caveat which was in evidence, and had carefully examined the drawing attached to it; that the caveat does not describe any method whatever of making steel; that steel could not be made by following the directions contained in the caveat; that it would spoil the metal; that putting a warm blast on top simply burns the metal; that if the air is put in the metal it would make steel, but would be an infringement of the Bessemer process; that none of the fluxes used are calculated to make steel. No experts were called to contradict this testimony of Mr. Noble. Mr. Hatton, who was in charge of the rolling department in the Pacific Mills, testified that Dr. Lee brought some steel there, that he rolled it for the doctor, but he did not know where it came from. The only thing tending to identify it was that it appeared to have been cased in a railroad bar, or something like that; and defendants' witness Holland testified that he was in Lee's employ, that he was with him at Melrose, that he remembered of steel being sent to the rolling mills, that it was run in a railroad bar, but that he did not see the chemicals put in. This testimony therefore raises no conflict with the testimony of Mr. Noble. It only shows that steel of some quality was made by Dr. Lee at Melrose, but by what method or process, new or old, cheap or expensive, does not appear. Both Mr. Owens and Dr. Lee exhibited to appellant and others at Martinez specimens of what was represented by them as steel made by Dr. Lee's process at Melrose.

One of plaintiff's witnesses, Alfred F. McMillan, a blacksmith who had worked at his trade continuously more than 20 years, testified that Owens exhibited to him three different pieces of metal professed to be manufactured by Lee's process, and he found them to be common Bessemer steel. This witness further testified that Owens afterwards gave him a piece of waste metal and asked witness to test it, and told him it was manufactured the same as the others; that he tested it, and informed Owens that it was only a piece of pig iron decarbonized a little; that it could not be rolled nor hammered; that it was worthless. At this time Owens further said to the witness "the process of manufacturing steel was a secret between him and Dr. Lee;" and Owens then requested witness "not to say anything about it, so as people should not think anything wrong was going on, as I understood." The witness further testified that Lee came to him, and asked if he did not have a piece of steel. "I told him I did, — two pieces of iron, — of those bars Mr. Owens gave me. He asked me what I thought of the steel. I told him it was an ordinary grade of open hearth or Bessemer steel. During the conversation I broke off a piece of this steel and a piece from an old plowshare, and bet the doctor a new hat if he could pick out his from the two pieces, and the doctor said it was hard to tell." Ostello, a witness for appellant, testified that three pieces of steel of different grades were brought to him, that Robbins and Perrin tried some, and both reported to him that it was good. Other witnesses, among them Patrick Noble, examined and tested these specimens,—some of them were undoubtedly steel. One bar, Noble testified, "was steel; that it looked like tool steel; that is, high in carbon. That it was an article well known to commerce, coming from Damascus, and has been for centuries, two or three," and "that it was not different from merchantable steel known to commerce for fifteen years or more." I find in the record, however, no evidence, beyond the representations of Lee and Owens, that these specimens of steel were made at Melrose, or, if made there, that they were made by the process alleged to have been discovered by Lee, nor that, if so made, that the process was cheap, or resulted in the manufacture of a superior quality of steel. It cannot be said that these representations were evidence of the fact stated in the findings under consideration, or that it in a legal sense conflicts with the testimony of Noble, that the formula shown by the caveat filed by Lee would not produce steel.

It may be added, however, that Owens, in a conversation with the witness Cousins, after this suit was brought, said that he did not know that Dr. Lee had ever made that steel; that he never saw him make it; that Dr. Lee might have bought it, or got it from some other source. The witness further said he referred to the steel that was exhibited by Lee and Owens to induce stockholders to subscribe for stock. There was some metal that was called "steel" by Dr. Lee and others, made at Martinez, and which was also referred to by the appellant in a letter to Mrs. Paddock, put in evidence by respondent; but upon examination it will be found that all the statements or expressions, in regard to the manufacture of steel at that place, were simply repetitions of Lee's statements; while the witness Williamson, an iron founder and machinist of 35 years' experience, and who was employed by Dr. Lee about the 1st of June, 1884, at the works in Martinez, and who cast the battery shoes represented to be of steel, testified as follows: "I went there some time after Mr. Owens left, and after this lady (Mrs. Kelley) bought her stock. I think that was about the beginning of June. From that time I remained there in charge of the works up to the time that Dr. Lee left. During the time I was there, there was not any steel made at those works Dr. Lee claimed these stamps and dies that I have spoken of to be steel, and he claimed that it was produced by the use of his chemicals. He either put in the chemicals himself, or had some one else. * * * On one heat there was none put in, as I said before. That was the heat I ran, which was the last one. While I was there I urged Dr. Lee to make steel." Again the witness said: "From my observation of Dr. Lee during the time while I was there, as an expert I say that he didn't manifest any knowledge of working that iron and steel. * * * I did not see any evidence or any trace of any new process of manufacturing steel during the time I was there. * * * The doctor professed to be making steel out of the cupola, and made what he termed to be steel, but I could see no steel about it. * * * I tested it by heating it and trying to work it, and I pronounced it as not steel, * * * if it has got to be a direct answer." Mr. Bunker, another witness, testified that he urged Dr. Lee to make some of his fine steel, to which the doctor replied that he would not till he got ready. It may also be added that some time in August, 1884, Dr. Lee abandoned the enterprise, as it appeared, and, so far as the record shows, was never heard of by those interested afterwards. Counsel for respondents do not contend that Lee did discover such process, but say that the evidence upon this point was not deemed satisfactory by the court, and it therefore prefaced the findings by the statement that the allegation that Lee was not the discoverer of such new method, etc., "is not sustained by the evidence, and the court therefore finds," etc. The only comment made by respondents' counsel upon this finding is "that the testimony is such as would not ordinarily produce material [moral?] certainty or conviction in an unprejudiced mind." It is true the burden was on appellant of proving her negative allegation, that being the foundation of her action. The degree of proof of a negative allegation is seldom measured by that required of an affirmative allegation. In some cases a negative may be positively and conclusively proved, and in such cases the general rule laid down in section 1869, Code Civil Proc., must be complied with; but in many cases this is impossible, and hence the amount of proof required to support the negative proposition and to shift the burden will vary according to the circumstances of the case; and very slight evidence will often be sufficient to shift the burden to the party having the greatest opportunities of knowledge concerning the fact to be inquired into. Steph. Dig. art. 96; U. S. v. Southern Colorado Coal, etc., Co., 18 Fed. Rep. 273.

It is perfectly clear that appellant made all the proof of her negative allegation that the nature of the case and the rules of evidence required. The witness Noble, whose learning and experience qualified him to testify as an expert, and whose competency was not questioned, testified that the method or process given in the caveat would not produce steel. That, without anything more, was quite sufficient to shift the burden of proof to the other side. If it had been met by the testimony of another expert that it was a new method, and would produce steel profitably, there would have been a material conflict in the testimony; or if it had been shown that Lee's process had, by actual test, shown that steel could be produced by it of a superior quality, cheaply and profitably, and that the method was new, the great preponderance of the evidence would have been with respondents; and that evidence they were bound to produce, if it existed. Appellant, however, did not rest upon that, as she might have done, but proved by Williamson, who was in charge of the works at Martinez under Lee, that what Dr. Lee called steel, made by his process, was not steel. The bars of steel exhibited and tested at Martinez, and which were represented by Lee and Owens to have been made by this process at Melrose, were not proved to have been so made, and therefore raised no conflict in the evidence.

As to the finding that these representations which were made by Owens to the plaintiff were made only upon his belief, little need be said. Appellant testified positively that Owens' statements were made positively and repeatedly; that he exhibited to her specimens of steel which he asserted were made by Lee by his new method. About the same time, and before, as well as after, he made the same statements to Cousins, Barry, Bunker, and others. But it is claimed on behalf of respondents that appellant's testimony is contradicted by Mrs. Paddock, who was present at the first conversation between appellant and Owens. That conversation was at Mrs. Paddock's house, early in April, when Mrs. Paddock was trying to sell to appellant 200 shares of the stock in this corporation, and had called in Mr. Owens and introduced him to appellant as one "who knew all about it." It is not necessary to discuss the want of probability, under all the circumstances, of Mrs. Paddock's statement that Owens said he "believed Lee had invented the process and had made the steel which he exhibited, inasmuch as that was a different transaction, not involved in this suit. Appellant bought Mrs. Paddock's shares in April, and afterwards, in June, exchanged her farm for the stock owned by Owens. It is conceded by respondents' counsel that, after appellant purchased Mrs. Paddock's stock, Mr. Owens may have changed the form of his representations from "belief" to that of an absolute fact, when he came to negotiate a sale of his own stock. If it be true that he did, the former representation can have no weight. Appellant's testimony shows that Owens called upon her many times after her purchase of Mrs. Paddock's stock, and made these representations as statements of fact, and urged her to visit Martinez and see the works, and there showed her specimens of steel, which he declared in Lee's presence was made by Lee by his process, and "that is our make of steel," and made other expressions of like character, and also informed her that he had the formula of Dr. Lee, but did not know that he could make the steel himself without experiment; all which statements and occurrences, subsequent to the first conversation at Mrs. Paddock's, are wholly uncontradicted. It is true that at the time she gave her testimony Mr. Owens was dead, and could not, therefore, contradict her. That fact should require the court to scrutinize her testimony, but could not authorize such distrust of it, if otherwise reasonable and probable, as to seriously diminish its weight. The same positive statements were made to others before, and at about the same time, in reference to the same facts, and while inducing others to take stock in the corporation. This testimony, counsel for respondents contend, was irrelevant, and, even if admitted by the court below without objection, should not be considered here. The cases cited by respondents' counsel are not in point; with one exception these were criminal cases, and the evidence held irrelevant was of other, distinct offenses, of the same character. In criminal cases, where the knowledge of the defendant is an essential ingredient of the offense, other offenses of the same character may be shown, as, for example, where the offense charged was that of passing a counterfeit bill, it is competent, for the purpose of showing that the defendant knew it was counterfeit, that about the same time he passed other counterfeit bills of like character, which were known to him to be counterfeit. Cases of fraud are, however, exceptions to the general rule. In Lincoln v. Claflin, 7 Wall., at 138, the court said: "On the trial declarations of the defendants were received, which related, not merely to the transaction which is the subject of inquiry in this action, but to similar contemporaneous transactions with other parties. The evidence was not incompetent or irrelevant, as contended by counsel. Where fraud in the purchase or sale of property is in issue, evidence of other frauds of like character, committed by the same parties, at or near the same time, is admissible." See, also, Cary v. Hotailing, 1 Hill, 311.

The only other finding necessary to be noticed is the fifteenth, viz.: "That said plaintiff did not rely upon said representations, nor upon any thereof, in making said contract or deed, nor was she by said representations, or any thereof, induced to make said contract or deed." Appellant, after testifying fully to the representations made to her by Owens, testified that she had never been engaged in the business of manufacturing steel or iron of any kind; that she knew nothing about it further than had been represented to her by Mr. Owens; that she believed his representations, and relied and acted upon them in making the transfer of the land to him. It is not necessary that we should repeat these representations. The only testimony in the case tending to show that appellant did not rely upon the representations made to her by Owens was the testimony of Mr. James F. Stewart, an attorney, whose son, also an attorney, occupying the same office with his father, drew up the contract between appellant and Owens. Mr. Stewart testified that while the contract was being drawn Mr. Owens left the office, and he took occasion to ask appellant if she knew the facts connected with the matter, and she replied that she did; that she had informed herself fully; that she had received her information from parties at Martinez; that she was competent to make the agreement; and that she got her information outside of Owens. The uncontradicted evidence in the case, however, shows that up to the time this agreement was entered into no one at Martinez, except Dr. Lee and Owens, knew anything about the matter, except from the representations of those two men; and further shows that others could not have known anything about the alleged process otherwise. Therefore the invitations of Owens, repeatedly given to appellant, to go to Martinez and investigate, was an invitation to hear from others the representations he had made them, and in so doing simply repeated to her the representations he had made to her before, but in such manner as to greatly strengthen her confidence in him. While, therefore, to Mr. Stewart, who knew nothing of the situation at Martinez, it might appear that appellant had fully investigated the subject, and did not rely solely or principally on Mr. Owens' statements, in the light of the record, his testimony does not raise a material conflict. My conclusion, therefore, is that the findings referred to are not justified by the evidence. The testimony of Mr. Stewart should have been excluded, and the court erred in receiving it, in the light of the circumstances shown by the record; but whether the appellant was prejudiced thereby to such extent as to justify a reversal upon that ground alone it is not necessary to decide.

Respondents' counsel have argued at considerable length that appellant's complaint does not state facts sufficient to support a judgment in her favor, and contend that for that reason the order denying a new trial should be affirmed, regardless of error. In this case there was no appeal from the judgment, and it is well settled that the sufficiency of the pleadings cannot be considered on appeal from an order denying a new trial. Brison v. Brison, 90 Cal. 323, 27 Pac. Rep. 186, and cases there cited. I think the order should be reversed, and new trial granted, with leave to the plaintiff to amend her complaint if she desires, and so advise.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order appealed from is reversed, and new trial granted, with leave to the plaintiff to amend her complaint if she desires.

MORGAN v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. (No. 14,841.)

INJURY TO PASSENGERS — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—DAMAGES—EXCESSIVE.

1. In an action for personal injuries caused by defendant's negligence, it appeared that plaintiff was a passenger on defendant's train; that at the station where plaintiff wished to leave the train, while in the act of alighting, she was thrown from the steps of the car platform by a sudden backward movement of the train. Witnesses for plaintiff testified that she was not on the platform when the car stopped, and did not leave her seat till afterwards, and that it was from a half minute to a minute after the train stopped before it started back. The engineer testified that when the train stopped he immediately reversed the engine, and moved the train back. Held, that the question of contributory negligence was for the jury.

2. Where, in such case, the whole charge of the court is on the theory that exemplary damages cannot be given, and the jury is instructed that the measure of plaintiff's "recovery is what is called 'compensatory damages,'—that is, such sum as will compensate her for the injury she has sustained,"—it is not reversible error to say in such charge that "money is an inadequate recompense for pain."

3. In an action for personal injuries there was evidence that plaintiff's right arm and shoulder were greatly injured; that the internal ligaments of the shoulder joint were ruptured; that she suffered great pain, and at the time of the trial, two years after the injury, still suffered great pain in the shoulder, in the back of the head and neck, and in the chest; that her memory was impaired; that she was unable to do any work of value; that but little progress had been made towards recovery; and that her injuries would probably be permanent. Held, that a verdict of $15,000 should not be disturbed as excessive.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Kern county; A. R. CONKLIN, Judge.

Action by Flora Morgan against the Southern Pacific Company to recover for personal injuries received while a passenger on defendant's train. From a judgment rendered on the verdict of a jury in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

E. L. Craig and Horace Hawes, (R. B. Carpenter, of counsel,) for appellant. Lamberson & Taylor and J. W. Ahern, for respondent.

MCFARLAND, J. This action was brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant, a railroad company. It is averred in the complaint that while plaintiff was in the act of alighting from the car of defendant, it was, through the negligence of defendant's servants and employes, suddenly and violently put in motion, whereby plaintiff was, without any fault on her part, thrown upon the ground, and seriously injured. The jury gave a verdict in favor of plaintiff for $15,000, for which amount judgment was rendered; and defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

1. The point of appellant that the evidence was insufficient to warrant any finding of liability on the part of defendant for the injury complained of cannot be maintained. The accident happened at the town of Delano. At that place the train usually stops with the locomotive at a water tank, so that water may be taken for the engine while passengers are going off and on the train. When the train arrived on the evening of the accident, the engineer did not succeed in stopping it until the locomotive had gone about a car's length beyond the water tank, and he moved the train back far enough to bring the engine at the proper place to take water. He testified that he did this immediately, so that there was only a moment of time between the first stop and the commencement of the backward movement, and his testimony to this effect was to some extent corroborated. Counsel for appellant contends that, this fact being established, it follows that plaintiff must have been guilty of contributory negligence; because if she had retained her seat in the car until the train first stopped, as she ought to have done, she could not have been on the steps of the platform when the train started back. It is argued that she must have been wrongfully on or near the steps before the car stopped. But witnesses for the plaintiff testified that it was from a half minute to a minute after the train stopped before it started back; plaintiff testified that she did not leave her seat until the car stopped; and another witness testified that she was not on the platform when the train stopped. There was therefore a substantial conflict of evidence as to the period of time which elapsed between the stop and the beginning of the movement backwards. Counsel say that it was natural and in accordance with the usual course of things for the engineer to have immediately reversed his engine and started back when he found himself beyond the water tank; that there was no reason for his waiting 30 or 60 seconds before doing so; and that, therefore, the contrary testimony of plaintiff's witnesses should not be considered as raising a substantial conflict. It could be well argued, and no doubt was so argued to the jury, that the engineer's version of the affair was more probably correct than that of plaintiff's witnesses; but, after all, the question was one of probability, to be determined by weighing conflicting evidence. It was therefore a question fairly within the province of the jury to decide.

2. The court, in the course of its charge to the jury, used the following language: "Money is an inadequate recompense for pain, but, as the law can afford no other redress, it aids the sufferer to obtain this in such measure as a jury dispassionately considering all the circumstances of the case will allow; and, whether the injury is the result of negligence or direct personal violence, the resulting pain is an element of damage to be compensated. In other words, it is an element of compensatory damage." And appellant contends that the use of the words, "money is an inadequate recompense for pain," constitutes a material and reversible error.

The language objected to would, no doubt, be more appropriate to social and private conversations and disputations than to the grave duty of instructing a jury, in discharging which the utmost possible accuracy should be aimed at, and loose and general remarks avoided. The remark objected to is probably true in a general abstract sense, although it can hardly be considered as specially apropos to a charge in which the jury are told that money may be given as a recompense for pain. But, taken in connection with other parts of the instruction, we do not see how the language objected to could have influenced the jury to the prejudice of appellant. Counsel contend that by this language the court invited the jury to give any sort of damages they might see fit to give, compensatory or exemplary, and to any amount within the prayer of the complaint; and that in effect it told them that, no matter how large their verdict might be, it would still be "an inadequate recompense for [plaintiff's] pain." But such would be a strained and incorrect construction of the language used, and it is not to be presumed that a jury would give it any such meaning. The whole charge was upon the theory that exemplary damages could not be given, and at appellant's request the court expressly instructed the jury that, if plaintiff was entitled to recover, "the measure of her recovery is what is called 'compensatory damages;' that is, such sum as will compensate her for the injury she has sustained." The jury were correctly told that "the determination of the amount is committed to the judgment and sound discretion of the jury," and that it should be "in such measure as a jury dispassionately considering all the circumstances of the case will allow;" and we do not think that the weight of these instructions could be lessened to any appreciable extent by the general remark which appellant assails.

3. The most difficult question in the case is raised by appellant's point that the damages awarded by the jury are excessive. The amount of the verdict is certainly quite large,—larger than we, if sitting as a jury, would have felt it our duty to give. But that consideration alone is not sufficient to warrant us in disturbing the verdict. There is no absolute rule in such a case, and about all that can be safely said on the subject may be found in the opinion of the court in Aldrich v. Palmer, 24 Cal. 513, and the cases there cited. The general conclusion, as nearly as one can be formulated, is as there stated, namely, that a verdict will not be disturbed because excessive, "unless the amount of the damages is obviously so disproportionate to the injury proved as to justify the conclusion that the verdict is not the result of the cool and dispassionate discretion of the jury." Cases are cited where verdicts for damages less than the amount awarded in the case at bar have been set aside, but there are many cases where verdicts for larger amounts have been allowed to stand. Two cases exactly alike are not to be found. Counsel argue that because in the case at bar legal interest on the amount of the verdict would exceed in value plaintiff's past earnings, and her probable future earnings if she had not been injured, therefore the amount is excessive. But that rule has never to our knowledge been applied to a case where the cause of action was the plaintiff's own personal injury; it has been applied only to cases where suit has been brought for the death of a relative. Such was the fact in the authorities cited on the point by appellant. Cooley, Torts, 274; Railroad Co. v. Bayfield, 37 Mich. 205; Rose v. Railroad Co., 39 Iowa, 254.

The great difficulty in the present case is in determining the extent of plaintiff's injuries, or, rather, what conclusion the jury had the right to arrive at from the evidence as to the extent of those injuries. As no bones were broken, and there was but little external evidence of injury, it is no doubt possible that plaintiff's sufferings from the result of the accident, and its injurious effect upon her physical and mental health, may have been greatly exaggerated. But there was direct testimony to the points that she was greatly injured in the right arm and shoulder; that the internal ligaments of the shoulder joint were seriously ruptured; that she suffered great pain, and at the time of the trial, nearly two years after the accident, still suffered great pain in the right arm and shoulder, in the back of the head and neck, and in the chest; that her memory was at times impaired; that she was unable to earn a livelihood, and practically unable to do work or perform services of any value; that but little progress had been made towards recovery; and that her injuries would probably be permanent. There was, no doubt, some evidence tending to show that her condition was not as bad as above stated; but the issue as to the extent of her injury was one of fact, about which there was a substantial conflict of evidence; and we cannot say that the jury were not warranted in finding according to the direct testimony above referred to. And such being the case, we are not prepared to say that the verdict should be set aside for excessiveness in the amount of damages. There are no other points in the case requiring notice. Judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

MORGAN v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. (No. 14,842.)

DEATH BY WRONGFUL ACT—DAMAGES—PLEADING.

1. In an action for the death of a child, the amount of plaintiff's recovery is limited to the actual pecuniary injury sustained by her, by reason of the death of her child.

2. Where, in such case, it appeared that plaintiff's child was a daughter two years old at the time of its death, a verdict of $20,000 is excessive.

3. A complaint in such case need not specially aver the loss of the services of the child.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Kern county; A. R. CONKLIN, Judge.

Action by Flora Morgan against the Southern Pacific Company to recover damages for the death of her child caused by defendant's negligence. From a judgment rendered on the verdict of a jury in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

The facts fully appear in Morgan v. Pacific Co., 30 Pac. Rep. 601.

E. L. Craig, Horace Hawes, and P. D. Wiggington, for appellant. Lamberson & Taylor and J. W. Ahern, for respondent.

McFARLAND, J. The parties to this action are the same as in Morgan v. Pacific Co., 30 Pac. Rep. 601, (No. 14,841, this day decided,) in which plaintiff recovered a judgment for $15,000 for alleged personal injuries received by being thrown from the steps of defendant's car, which judgment was by this court affirmed. When she fell from the steps of the car she had in her arms her infant daughter, aged about two years. Nine days afterwards the child died from an attack of pneumonia; and plaintiff brought this present action to recover damages for the death of said child, upon the theory that the pneumonia was caused by said fall. The jury gave her damages in the amount of $20,000, for which sum judgment was rendered; and defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial. The evidence upon the issues of the alleged negligence of defendant's employes at the time of the accident, and the alleged contributory negligence of plaintiff, was substantially the same as in the other case, and as to those issues the verdict cannot be disturbed. There was some evidence tending slightly to show that the death of the child was caused by the accident, but it is not necessary to inquire whether or not it was sufficient to establish that fact, because the judgment must clearly be reversed on account of the excessive damages awarded by the jury.

There was no averment in the complaint of any special damage, and no averment of any damage at all, except the general statement that the child died, "to the damage of plaintiff in the sum of fifty thousand dollars;" and there was no evidence whatever introduced or offered upon the subject of damage. The jury, therefore, had nothing before them upon which to base damages except the naked fact of the death of a female child two years old; and it is apparent, at first blush, that "the amount of the damages is obviously so disproportionate to the injury proved as to justify the conclusion that the verdict is not the result of the cool and dispassionate discretion of the jury." The main element of damage to plaintiff was the probable value of the services of the deceased until she had attained her majority, considering the cost of her support and maintenance during the early and helpless part of her life. We think that the court erred in charging that "the jury is not limited by the actual pecuniary injury sustained by her, by reason of the death of her child." An action to recover damages for the death of a relative was not known to the common law; it is of recent legislative origin. There are statutes in many of the American states providing for such an action, and it has been quite uniformly held that in such an action the plaintiff does not represent the right of action which the deceased would have had if the latter had survived the injury, but can recover only for the pecuniary loss suffered by the plaintiff on account of the death of the relative; that sorrow and mental anguish caused by the death are not elements of damage; and that nothing can be recovered as a solatium for wounded feelings. The authorities outside of this state are almost unanimous to the point above stated. The following are a few of such authorities: Railroad Co. v. Vandever, 36 Pa. St. 298; Iron Co. v. Rupp, 100 Pa. St. 95; Railroad Co. v. Freeman, 36 Ark. 41; Railroad Co. v. Brown, 26 Kan. 443; Pennsylvania Co. v. Lilly, 73 Ind. 252; Donaldson v. Railroad Co., 18 Iowa, 280; Railroad Co. v. Paulk, 24 Ga. 356; Railroad Co. v. Miller, 2 Colo. 466; Kesler v. Smith, 66 N. C. 154; March v. Walker, 48 Tex. 372; Railroad Co. v. Levy, 59 Tex. 563; James v. Christy, 18 Mo. 162; Hyatt v. Adams, 16 Mich. 180; Chicago v. Major, 18 Ill. 349; Railroad Co. v. Delaney, 82 Ill. 198; Blake v. Railroad Co., 18 Q. B. 93.

With respect to the decisions in this state we do not think those cited by respondent (except one) are, when closely examined, inconsistent with the general authorities. Beeson v. Mining Co., 57 Cal. 20, is a leading case on the subject, and is cited by all the cases which follow it. In that case the action was brought by the widow for the death of her husband, and the question was whether or not the lower court erred in allowing evidence of the kindly relations between the plaintiff and the deceased during the lifetime of the latter. The court sustained the ruling of the court below, but clearly upon the ground that those relations could be considered only in estimating the pecuniary loss. The court say: "It is true that in one sense the value of social relations and of society cannot be measured by any pecuniary standard; * * * but, in another sense, it might be not only possible, but eminently fitting, that a loss from severing social relations, or from deprivation of society, might be measured from a pecuniary standpoint. * * * If a husband and wife were living apart by mutual consent, neither rendering the other assistance or kindly offices, the jury might take into consideration the absence of social relations and the absence of society in estimating the loss sustained by either from the death of the other. So if the husband and wife had lived together in accord, each rendering kindly offices to the other, such facts might be taken into consideration, not, as the books say, for the purpose of affording solace in money, but for the purpose of estimating pecuniary losses. The loss of a kind husband may be a considerable pecuniary loss to a wife; she loses his advice and assistance in many matters of domestic economy." A quotation is made from a Pennsylvania case where the same rule was applied to the loss of a wife, the court saying that "certainly the service of a wife is pecuniarily more valuable than that of a mere hireling." The Beeson Case, therefore, does not decide that the jury may depart from a pecuniary standpoint in assessing damages; it merely holds that in estimating the pecuniary losses of a wife from the death of her husband they may consider whether or not the deceased was a good husband, able and willing to provide well for his wife. The opinion of the court no doubt goes somewhat further in this direction than the general current of authorities, but it decides nothing more than above stated. Cook v. Railroad Co., 60 Cal. 604, also cited by respondent, decides nothing more than the Beeson Case. In McKeever v. Railroad Co., 59 Cal. 300, the point was not involved, and in Nehrbas v. Railroad Co., 62 Cal. 320, the point does not appear in any way to have been involved; and the dictum at the close of the opinion, as it refers to the Beeson Case, must be held as only intended to go to the length of the latter case. It is true, however, that in Cleary v. Railroad Co., 76 Cal. 240, 18 Pac. Rep. 269, a decision in department, views were expressed favorable to respondent's contention. The opinion of the commission in that case was, however, expressly based on Beeson v. Mining Co., supra, and upon, as we have seen, a misunderstanding of that case. There appears to have been no petition for a hearing in bank. It was stated in that case that there could be a recovery for the "mental anguish and suffering of the parents," but we have been referred to no other case that holds such doctrine. Certainly it was not so held in the Beeson Case. But entirely contrary views were expressed in the latest decision of this court on the subject, (Munro v. Reclamation Co., 84 Cal. 515, 24 Pac. Rep. 303.) In that case—which was for the death of an adult son—the lower court had instructed that the jury in estimating the damages might consider "the sorrow, grief, and mental suffering occasioned by his death to his mother;" and this court held the instruction erroneous, and for that reason reversed the judgment, the court holding that such a rule would afford an "opportunity to run into wild and excessive verdicts." The court said: "We are of opinion that the court erred in including in the instruction the words, 'sorrow, grief, and mental suffering, occasioned by the death of the son to his mother.' In thus directing the jury the court fell into error. In our opinion, the damage should have been confined to the pecuniary loss suffered by the mother, and the loss of the comfort, society, support, and protection of the deceased. * * * We have found no case in which damages for sorrow, grief, and mental suffering are allowed, under any of the statutes." And, further, that the statutory action is a new one, "and not the transfer to the representative of the right of action which the deceased person would have had if he had survived the injury." The case was decided in bank. Justice THORNTON delivered the opinion, which was concurred in by two other justices, and a fourth justice concurred in the judgment, and must, therefore, have concurred in the one main reason for which the judgment was reversed. He may not have been ready to say that the "comfort and society" of the deceased could be considered. There was only one dissent, but upon what ground does not appear. We think, therefore, that the case is full authority on the main point. At all events, we think that the opinion states the general propositions of law governing the case correctly, although, as to one matter, it may be misunderstood. The language, "the loss of the comfort, society, support, and protection of the deceased," must be held as having been used within the meaning given to it in Beeson v. Mining Co., supra, as hereinbefore stated, that is, with reference to the value of the life of the deceased, and the pecuniary loss to the plaintiff caused by the death. The said language would not be correct in any other sense. But in the case at bar the jury were not confined by the instructions to pecuniary loss or any other kind of loss; they were given wide range to run into any wild and excessive verdict which their caprice might suggest. We do not think that the complaint is defective because it does not specially aver the loss of the services of the deceased; that was a natural and necessary sequence of the death. It was not special damage necessary to be averred. There is nothing in the point made by respondent that the answer was not verified. Upon that point the court ruled in favor of defendant, and plaintiff is not appealing. The judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and a new trial ordered.

SHARPSTEIN, J. I concur.

DE HAVEN, J. I concur in the judgment and generally in the foregoing opinion. The measure of damages in actions by a parent for the death of a child, when the facts are not such as to warrant exemplary damages, is correctly stated in section 763 of Shearman and Redfield on Negligence, as follows: "The damages recoverable by a husband, parent, or master for a negligent injury to the person of his wife, child, or servant are strictly limited to an amount fully compensatory for the consequent loss of service for a period not exceeding the minority of the child, or the term of service of a servant, and the expenses which the plaintiff has incurred in consequence of the injury, such as for surgical attendance, nursing, and the like." The sixth instruction given upon the request of plaintiff, to the effect that "in estimating the damage sustained by her the jury is not limited by the actual pecuniary injury sustained by her by reason of the death of her child, but such damages may be given as under all the circumstances of the case may be just," is contrary to this rule, and was erroneous. The object of section 376 of the Code of Civil Procedure is not to give redress or compensation for the mental distress of a mother, consequent upon the death of her child. The general language of section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure, that in actions of this character "such damages may be given as under all the circumstances of the case may be just," is used with reference to the fact that the damages which are allowed to be recovered by sections 376 and 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure are, with the exception of the expenses incurred by the plaintiff in consequence of the injury resulting in the death for which they are claimed, prospective in their nature, relating, as they do, to the loss of future service, and necessarily based upon probabilities, and upon data which in many respects are uncertain, and therefore the estimate of such damages calls for the exercise of a very large discretion upon the part of the jury; and all that is meant by the language quoted is that the jury shall, in view of all the circumstances of the case, and considering also the age and the ability of the deceased to serve the relative for whose benefit the action is brought, give such damages as they shall deem just, keeping in view that such damages are to be measured by what shall fairly seem the pecuniary injury or loss to the plaintiff.

BATES v. BABCOCK et al. (No. 19,017.)

APPEAL—REVIEW—DEFECTS IN COMPLAINT—STATUTE OF FRAUDS.

1. Objections to a complaint, such as uncertainty and ambiguity, which should be pointed out by special demurrer, if overruled after being so specified, will not be considered for the purpose of sustaining a judgment for defendant which was erroneously rendered after trial on the merits.

2. An agreement to share the profits arising from the purchase and sale of real estate, apart from any contract for the transfer of an interest in the land itself, is not within the statute of frauds, and parol evidence thereof is admissible. Beatty, C. J., dissenting.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; W. L. PIERCE, Judge.

Action by Bates against Babcock and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Sprigg & Barber, for appellant. Works & Works, for respondents.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff brought this action against the defendants for an accounting upon a partnership agreement between them for the purchase and disposition of certain real estate in San Diego. At the trial of the action the plaintiff offered himself as a witness, and, under the objection of the defendants that it was incompetent and immaterial, gave testimony tending to show that an oral agreement had been made between himself and the defendant Babcock, acting on behalf of the defendant the Coronado Beach Company, of which he was president, by which they were to pay off the incumbrances upon certain real estate, sell and dispose of the same, and share the profits and loss in dealing therein; that for that purpose he gave to the defendants $15,000 with which to pay certain claims and incumbrances thereon, and that the same was so applied; and that at the request of the defendant Babcock a conveyance of the property was executed to one Hubbell, who was the secretary of the defendant corporation. After this testimony had been given the defendants moved to strike out all portions thereof "relating to an agreement for an alleged partnership between the plaintiff and the defendants, or either of them, in the land described in the complaint, or any partnership between the parties, upon the ground that the same is incompetent and immaterial; that a partnership of the character alleged in the complaint must be proved by an instrument in writing, signed by them, or one of them." The court granted the motion, saying that "the contract, as alleged in the complaint and supported by the evidence, is one clearly for an interest in lands, and as such is void under the statute of frauds." Upon the submission of the cause the court in its decision found that there had been no agreement for a partnership in the land, and rendered judgment in favor of the defendants. From this judgment, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, the plaintiff has appealed.

We cannot upon this appeal consider the objections to the complaint that were made by the demurrer thereto, except the one specifying that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer was overruled for "want of presentation," and the defendants, having gone to trial upon their answer, obtained a judgment in their favor upon the merits. Upon an appeal by the plaintiff from that judgment we can consider only such errors of the court as are shown to have contributed to its rendition, and not such as might have defeated a contrary judgment. If a judgment in favor of the defendant is the result of errors in excluding evidence that should have been received, he, as respondent upon an appeal, cannot for the purpose of sustaining that judgment have a consideration of errors against him which were entirely disconnected with the trial, or the judgment rendered. Objections to a complaint which should be pointed out by special demurrer, such as uncertainty or ambiguity, are insufficient, unless so specified, to defeat a verdict against the defendant, nor can they, if overruled after having been so specified, be considered for the purpose of sustaining a judgment in his favor that was erroneously rendered after a trial upon the merits. It is only when there is in the complaint an entire absence of averment of a fact essential to a recovery, so that no evidence of that fact could be received at the trial, that a judgment in favor of the plaintiff cannot be sustained; but, if the objection be merely that such fact is defectively alleged, evidence received under such averment, if sufficient, will sustain the judgment. While the complaint in the present case is not entirely free from criticism, and might have been made more certain and precise in some of its averments, yet we think that it contains a sufficient statement of facts to justify the court in receiving evidence thereof, and, if sufficient to sustain the averments, to render a judgment as asked by the plaintiff.

The character and effect of an averment that may be uncertain in one of its clauses is not limited to a construction of that clause merely, but the averment is to be considered as a whole, and in connection with the entire complaint. The averment that the defendants agreed with the plaintiff that if he would pay certain claims against the property "they would become equal partners with him in the said property," does not necessarily imply an agreement for a conveyance from him to them, and taken in connection with the averment immediately following, viz., "and would share equally with him, in the proportion of one half to plaintiff and one half to defendants, all sums received for said property, and all profits and losses accruing on account thereof," which is evidently inserted by way of explanation, shows that the agreement was for a partnership in the profits that might result from dealing in the land, and had no necessary relation to the ownership of the land. It appears from the complaint that at the time of this agreement the property in question was owned by one Miller and his wife, and that the defendant corporation held certain mortgages thereon, which were subordinate to certain other liens, and that the title to the property stood in the name of the plaintiff, and was held by him "as trustee for the benefit of said Miller and wife." It does not appear that the plaintiff had any beneficiary interest in the land, and the averment that $5,000 of the money advanced by him under the agreement was paid to the Millers, "for a release from the said trust in their favor," confirms the inference that it was merely a dry, naked trust. The subsequent averment that, "in pursuance of said agreement" then made, the plaintiff paid to the defendants $15,000 with which to remove certain charges and incumbrances, and that "all of said property was duly transferred by plaintiff to O. S. Hubbell, Esq., secretary of said Coronado Beach Company, as trustee for the parties hereto, to facilitate a sale," and that with the concurrence of the defendants the plaintiff paid liens and debts on account of said property amounting to $42,000, removes all possibility of construction that the agreement was for a sale of the property to the defendants, or for the creation of an interest or estate therein, and shows that the parties dealt with the property as assets of their said partnership.

A partnership may be formed for the purpose of dealing in lands, as well as for dealing in personal estate, or for engaging in professional or commercial or manufacturing occupations. Like any other contract of partnership, it is an agreement to share in the profit and loss of certain business transactions. Such a partnership may be formed for the purpose of buying and selling land generally, or it may be limited to a speculation upon a single venture. Dudley v. Littlefield, 21 Me. 422; Chester v. Dickerson, 54 N. Y. 1; Williams v. Gillies, 75 N. Y. 201.

Whether such a partnership can be formed, except by an agreement in writing, has been the subject of conflicting decisions. There is a dictum in Gray v. Palmer, 9 Cal. 639, to the effect that it must be in writing, for which Story, Partn. § 83, is cited as authority; and in Smith v. Burnham, 3 Sum. 458, it was so held by that distinguished jurist. The great weight of modern authority, however, is in support of the rule that such a partnership may be formed in the same mode as any other, and that its existence may be established by the same character of evidence. It was so stated in Coward v. Clanton, 79 Cal. 23, 21 Pac. Rep. 359, where it was held that an agreement for the purchase of a tract of land, and its subdivision and sale in parcels and for a division of the profits resulting therefrom, in which one party was to furnish the capital and take a conveyance of the land, and the other to furnish the skill and labor in making the sales, could not be avoided after the transaction had been completed, merely because it was not in writing. More than a hundred years ago it was held by Lord THURLOW in Elliot v. Brown, reported in 3 Swanst. 489, 1 Vern. 217, that the right of survivorship in a joint demise of a farm was destroyed by reason of the tenants having farmed the land upon joint account, and thus by their acts made it partnership assets. The question was very fully considered by Vice Chancellor WIGRAM in Dale v. Hamilton, 5 Hare, 369, wherein previous decisions involving similar principles were reviewed, and it was held that under the principles of those decisions the existence of such a partnership could be shown by general evidence, without the necessity of a written agreement. In that case a parol agreement had been entered into under which a tract of land was to be purchased in the name of one McAdam, and laid out in lots, and resold, he furnishing the capital, and the plaintiff the skill and labor, necessary therefor, and the profits resulting from the venture were to be divided between them. The purchase was accordingly effected in the name of McAdam, but the defendants, who had succeeded to McAdam, with notice of the agreement, afterwards refused to carry it out. Thereupon the plaintiff filed his bill for an accounting and a sale of the land under the direction of the court, with a division of the proceeds, in accordance with the terms of the agreement. The defendants resisted the suit upon the ground that the agreement was within the statute of frauds, and could be established only by an instrument in writing, but the vice chancellor overruled their objections and upheld the bill. In his opinion (page 383) he uses the following illustration in support of his conclusion, which is peculiarly appropriate to the present case: "In order to try this question in the most simple manner, I will suppose the case to be the converse of what it is. I will suppose that the land purchased, instead of rising, had fallen in value, that a loss had been sustained, and that Hamilton and McAdam were the plaintiffs, seeking to compel Dale to contribute his proportion of the loss. If in this case the authorities would have enabled Hamilton and McAdam, by proving the partnership with Dale, and that the land was part of the partnership stock and effects, to have compelled contribution from Dale, the same authorities will upon like proof support the present suit upon the principle—that of mutuality in remedies—which enables a vendor to recover the purchase money in this court, though the remedy at law may be equally adequate and more appropriate," and cites several authorities to the effect that in such a case the defendant would have been liable for contribution. The rule laid down in Dale v. Hamilton has since been generally followed, and, although there are some decisions to the contrary, may now be said to be the prevailing rule upon that subject. Irrespective of any decision, however, an agreement of this character cannot be said to contravene the provisions of the statute of frauds. It does not contemplate any transfer of land from one party to the other, or the creation of any interest or estate in lands. In one sense the parties to such an agreement may be said to have an interest in the lands that are to be purchased under the agreement,—that sense in which the beneficiary under a trust for the sale of real estate, and payment to him of the proceeds of the sale, has an interest in the land but it is only a pecuniary interest resulting from the sale, and a right to have the land sold, rather than an interest in the land itself. The statute of frauds does not prevent parol proof for the purpose of showing an interest in lands, but declares that an agreement by which an estate or interest in lands is to be created must be in writing. No interest or estate in the land is created by such an agreement, but by the subsequent acts of the parties under the agreement rights are acquired in reference to the land that may be purchased in pursuance of the agreement, which a court of equity will protect against any attempt to make the statute of frauds an instrument of fraud. A bill for the conveyance of the lands could not be maintained under such an agreement, but, by reason of the acts of the parties thereunder, an equity would be raised in their behalf which would be superior to the legal title held by him to whom the land was conveyed, and would control that title in subordination to this superior equity. It is a familiar rule in equity that lands acquired by a partnership for partnership uses are partnership assets, and are treated in equity as personalty, whether the partnership was formed by oral or written agreement. The same principle should apply when the object of the partnership is to deal in lands, and the assets of the partnership with which the lands are to be purchased are made up of the skill and money which are respectively contributed by the partners as its capital. Upon proof of the existence of such a partnership, the rights and obligations of the respective partners should be determined upon the same principles and with the same results as in other partnerships.

The settlement of partnership accounts, and the conversion into money of the assets of the partnership, whether real or personal, and their division among the partners, has always been one of the functions of a court of equity, and that court never stops to inquire into the source of the title of such assets, or in whose name they are held. The question has frequently arisen in actions for the division of the proceeds after a sale under such an agreement, and it has been invariably held that the statute of frauds is no defense thereto. Bruce v. Hastings, 41 Vt. 380; Benjamin v. Zell, 100 Pa. St. 33; Trowbridge v. Wetherbee, 11 Allen, 361; Babcock v. Read, 99 N. Y. 609, 1 N. E. Rep. 141; Coward v. Clanton, 79 Cal. 23, 21 Pac. Rep. 359; Reed, St. Frauds, § 727. See, also, Byers v. Locke, 93 Cal. 493, 29 Pac. Rep. 119. Under such an agreement it is invariably held that an action for the division of the profits can be maintained after they have been received, whereas, if the agreement was invalid at the outset, it could not form the basis of such an action. If, however, the agreement was valid at its inception, it is not rendered invalid by the subsequent act of one of the parties, and, although it cannot be changed into a different agreement, such as an agreement for the conveyance of the land, yet either party has the right to its enforcement for the purpose of carrying out its original purpose, the division of the profits resulting from the speculation. The same principles are applicable in an action to subject land which has become a portion of the assets of such a partnership to a sale under the directions of a court of equity, with a distribution of the proceeds thereof according to the rights of the individual partners. This was the case presented and maintained in Dale v. Hamilton. The same procedure was upheld in Richards v. Grinnell, 63 Iowa, 44, 18 N. W. Rep. 668; Bunnel v. Taintor, 4 Conn. 568; Hunter v. Whitehead, 42 Mo. 524; Bissell v. Harrington, 18 Hun, 81; Holmes v. McCray, 51 Ind. 358; Coward v. Clanton, 79 Cal. 23, 21 Pac. Rep. 359. After the agreement for the purchase and sale has been executed by making the conveyance in accordance with such agreement, it cannot be objected that such conveyance could not have been compelled on account of the statute of frauds. Pico v. Cuyas, 47 Cal. 174. The statute of frauds has no application to an executed agreement.

That the agreement between the parties which is averred in the complaint, and the evidence given in support thereof, did not contemplate any transfer of the land, or of any interest therein to the defendants, or either of them, but had for its object only a division of the profits and loss that would remain after its sale, is shown by a consideration of the averments of the complaint hereinbefore presented, and, also by the direction of Babcock to the plaintiff while negotiating the agreement to "sell it off as soon as you can, pay up the debts, and divide the profits." It was not necessary for the plaintiff in support of these averments to produce written evidence of the agreement, but the agreement could have been established by his oral testimony, and the court erred in striking out the testimony that he gave in support of the agreement. The first question to be determined by the court was whether there was a partnership, and that fact could be shown by general evidence. In Forster v. Hale, 5 Ves. 309, where the right to an interest in the leasehold of a colliery claimed by virtue of a partnership with one of the lessees was involved, and it was objected that, by permitting parol evidence to establish such interest, an interest in real estate or a declaration of trust would be gained without any writing, in violation of the statute of frauds, Lord Loughborough said: "That is not the question; it is whether there was a partnership. The subject being an agreement for land, the question is whether there was a resulting trust for that partnership by operation of law. The question of partnership must be tried as a fact, and as if there was an issue upon it. If by facts and circumstances it is established as a fact that these persons were partners in the colliery in which land was necessary to carry on the trade, the lease goes as an incident. The partnership being established by evidence upon which a partnership may be found, the premises necessary for the purposes of that partnership are by operation of law held for the purposes of that partnership." Under the same principles, if in the present case the court should find upon sufficient evidence that a partnership existed between the parties, the fact that they would have an interest in the land which forms a portion of the assets of the partnership would result by operation of law as an incident to such partnership, but this result would not constitute a reason for excluding parol testimony to establish the existence of the partnership. For the error of the court in striking out the evidence of the plaintiff, the order and judgment are reversed, and the court is directed to grant a new trial.

We concur: Paterson, J.; Sharpstein, J.; De Haven, J.; Garoutte, J.; McFarland, J.

Beatty, C. J. I dissent. The complaint, in my opinion, shows no cause of action, and the evidence offered and stricken out by the court was of a parol contract, invalid under the statute of frauds.

People v. Murback.[1]

Murder—Degrees—Instructions — Judgment—Corrections.

1. On trial for murder, the court instructed the jury that "you can find defendant guilty of murder in the first degree, or guilty of murder in the second degree, or guilty of manslaughter, or you may render a verdict of not guilty; and it is for you to decide which one of those verdicts you may render. But if you do find the defendant guilty of murder in the first degree you have the discretion to determine the nature of his punishment; and if, in your sound judgment and discretion, there is any fact or circumstance in the case which ought to mitigate the extreme penalty of death, you will by your verdict indicate the same; but if you find no such mitigation in the facts of the case, and think the death penalty should be inflicted, you will simply find him guilty of murder in the first degree." Held, that the language of this instruction does not assume that defendant is guilty of murder in the first degree.

2. Such instruction does not restrict the jury, in the exercise of their discretion, to determine the punishment to be inflicted.

3. No words of reproach, however grievous, are sufficient provocation to reduce the offense of intentional homicide with a deadly weapon from murder to manslaughter.

4. The statement by the court to defendant of the nature of the offense of which he has been convicted, although necessary as preliminary to pronouncing judgment, is not a part thereof, and a mistake in the entry of such statement does not invalidate the judgment, but may be corrected by order of the court made pending an appeal from such judgment.

5. Where such mistake in the entry is merely clerical, and does not prejudice the defendant in any substantial right, (Pen. Code Cal. § 1404,) the judgment will not be reversed on appeal, although the mistake has not been corrected.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Napa county.

Indictment against John Murback for murder. There was a verdict of guilty, and from a judgment entered thereon, and also from an order made after judgment, defendant appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Henry C. Gesford, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Marshall and Dist. Atty. Coombs, for the People.

McKee, J. Appeal from a judgment of death pronounced against the defendant upon a conviction for murder in the first degree, and also from an order made subsequent to the judgment. The assignments of error are that the court exceeded its jurisdiction in making the order appealed from, and that it misdirected the jury by the following instructions, namely: "(1) You can find defendant guilty of murder in the first degree, or guilty of murder in the second degree, or guilty of manslaughter, or you may render a verdict of not guilty; and it is for you to decide which one of those verdicts you may render. But if you do find the defendant guilty of murder in the first degree you have the discretion to determine the nature of his punishment; and if, in your sound judgment and discretion, there is any fact or circumstance in the case which ought to mitigate the extreme penalty of death, you will by your verdict indicate the same; but if you find no such mitigation in the facts of the case, and think the death penalty should be inflicted, you will simply find him guilty of murder in the first degree. (2) No words of reproach, however grievous, are sufficient provocation to reduce the offense of an intentional homicide with a deadly weapon from murder to manslaughter." Objection is made to the first instruction that the court in saying to the jury "but if you do find the defendant guilty of murder in the first degree," etc., virtually announced that the defendant was guilty of that crime; and that by the other parts of the instruction the jury were improperly restricted in the exercise of their power of discretion to determine the punishment to be inflicted upon the defendant. There was no assumption of the guilt of the defendant in the language employed by the court. The jury were properly directed that they could, upon the indictment, find the defendant guilty of any offense included within the crime for which he was indicted; but if they should find him guilty of the highest offense, namely, murder in the first degree, it would be their duty to decide whether he should suffer death or confinement in the state prison for life, and that was to be determined at their discretion. With this power of discretion a court cannot interfere. The jury should be left entirely free to act according to their judgment. If they see fit to exercise the power at all, they have the exclusive right to determine, within the limits prescribed by the law which gives them the power, the punishment for which the defendant ought to be sentenced. And we find nothing in the challenged instruction which limited or restrained them in the exercise of that power. The second instruction was applicable to the case, and was a correct explanation of the law of the subject to which it related. People v. Turley, 50 Cal. 470; People v. Butler, 8 Cal. 435; Whart. Crim. Law, 368.

[1] This case, filed November 28, 1883, is now published by request, with others, in order that the Pacific Reporter may cover all cases in volume 64, California Reports.

The question upon the appeal from the order made after judgment arises out of the following facts: The indictment charged that the murder was committed on the 26th day of November, 1882. Of that crime the defendant was convicted, and, upon the conviction, judgment of death was regularly pronounced. But the clerk, on making up his minutes of the proceeding in court when the defendant appeared for sentence, entered, as part of the proceeding, that the court informed the defendant "of the indictment found against him for the crime of murder committed on November 26, 1883." This entry did not express the fact; and, after discovering the mistake which had been made, the court, upon notice to defendant and his counsel, ordered the entry to be corrected by changing the figures "1883" to "1882," so as to express the truth. The order to that effect was made March 12, 1883. Meantime the appeal had been taken from the judgment, and it is contended that the court had no jurisdiction, pending the appeal in this court, to make the order. But the true statement which was made by the court to the defendant of the nature of the charge made against him, and of which he had been convicted, although necessary as preliminary to pronouncing judgment, (§ 1200, Pen. Code,) was no part of the judgment pronounced; and a mistake made by the clerk in the entry of the statement on the minutes of the court would not invalidate the judgment. The mistake was therefore one which could be corrected at any time, while the record of the case was subject to the physical control of the court, so as to make the record speak the truth The power of the court in that regard was not suspended by the appeal. Rousset v. Boyle, 45 Cal. 64; Sheldon v. Gunn, 57 Cal. 40; Boyd v. Burrel, 60 Cal. 284. Besides, as the defendant was sentenced for the crime for which he had been indicted and convicted, by a judgment regularly pronounced, the error as to date in the entry referred to would be so evidently a mere clerical mistake, which in no way prejudiced the defendant in any substantial right, that the judgment itself would not be reversed, even if the error had not been corrected. Section 1404, Pen. Code; People v. Sprague, 53 Cal. 491; People v. Gilbert, 57 Cal. 96; People v. Brotherton, 47 Cal. 388; People v. Colby, 54 Cal. 37. Judgment and order affirmed.

STATUTE OF LIMITATIONS — ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF DEBT — RIGHTS OF MORTGAGEE AGAINST PURCHASER.

1. An acknowledgment by a mortgagor to a stranger of the existence of the debt secured by the mortgage, without an express promise to the mortgagee to pay such debt, will not prevent the bar of the statute of limitations from applying in a suit to foreclose the mortgage.

2. A mortgagee is not entitled to the benefit of a contract between the mortgagor and a purchaser of the mortgaged premises, to pay off the mortgage as a part of the purchase money, except in so far as he may be subrogated to the rights of the mortgagor; so that, if the contract of sale between the mortgagor and such purchaser be rescinded before suit to foreclose the mortgage, the mortgagee has no recourse against the purchaser.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county.

Action by Phillip Biddel against B. Brizzolara and Austin Roberts to foreclose a mortgage given to secure a purchase-money note, executed by defendant Brizzolara, and due June 25, 1875. The complaint, filed March 22, 1881, alleged that defendant Brizzolara sold the property in question to his codefendant, Roberts, October 22, 1878, for $11,000, Roberts paying a part of the purchase money by assuming the mortgage on the property held by plaintiff; that after the execution of the contract Roberts resold the property to Brizzolara; and that so late as June 28, 1880, after the reconveyance by Roberts to Brizzolara, the latter, in writing, acknowledged the existence of plaintiff's mortgage lien on the property. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

[1] This case, filed November 28, 1883, is now published by request, with others, in order that the Pacific Reporter may cover all cases in volume 64, California Reports.

Venable & Scott and Craig & Meredith, for appellant. W. J. Graves and J. M. Wilcoxon, for respondents.

McKinstry, J. The court below sustained the defendant's demurrer to the complaint. The defendant by his demurrer, among others, took the objection that the cause of action alleged in the complaint was barred by the statute of limitations, and the objection that the complaint did not contain a statement of a cause of action. The complaint contains the allegation: "So late as the 28th day of June, 1880, * * * the defendant Bartolo Brizzolara, by an instrument in writing signed by him, acknowledged said mortgage indebtedness, and that the same was a lien on said mortgaged property." To establish a new contract, made after the statute has run, there must be a promise to pay, or an acknowledgment from which a promise is necessarily implied. Biddel v. Brizzolara, 56 Cal. 374. It is very certain that an actual promise can only be made to the creditor, and it follows that the acknowledgment from which the promise is to be inferred must be made to the creditor. An admission to a stranger of the existence of the debt cannot be construed an acknowledgment to the creditor such as indicates an intention on the part of the person making the admission to hold himself bound to pay, nor is it expressive of his willingness to pay. "An unqualified acknowledgment to a stranger will not take a case out of the statute, or constitute a good cause of action." Trousdale's Adm'r v. Anderson, 9 Bush, 276. See Kyle v. Wells, 17 Pa. St. 286; Taylor v. Hendrie, 8 Nev. 243. Treating the complaint as a bill for the foreclosure of the mortgage, the action was barred by the Code limitation of time within which such an action may be commenced. In the contract of sale of the mortgaged premises from Bartolo Brizzolara to Roberts, the consideration of the sale is thus stated: "That the consideration of said sale is as follows: Eleven thousand dollars in gold coin, to be paid as follows: The party of the second part assumes a mortgage on said property held by Phillip Biddel, principal and interest amounting to $6,090, and assumes to pay the county and state taxes on said property for the current year, amounting to $136, and this day pays to the party of the first part the sum of $1,000 in cash, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged by the party of the first part, and the balance of such purchase money, $3,774.50, is secured to be paid by a promissory note of this date, payable on the 5th day of November, 1878." The complaint alleges that Roberts, prior to the commencement of this action, reconveyed the mortgaged property to Bartolo Brizzolara, the mortgagor. It is urged by appellant that, although the statute of limitations may have run against the mortgage debt, the plaintiff is entitled to a decree for the sale of the mortgaged premises, and to a personal judgment for any balance of the mortgage debt unsatisfied by application of the proceeds of the sale, against Bartolo Brizzolara, as successor in interest of Roberts; and that, as the promise of Roberts was made within four years before the commencement of this action, the plea of the statute is not well taken against the action as an action on such promise. There is no averment in the complaint that Bartolo, by reason of any language in the reconveyance from Roberts or otherwise, ever promised the latter to pay the mortgage. It was held in New York the liability to the mortgagee of the grantee of the mortgagor, who assumes and agrees to pay the mortgage, arises out of the broad doctrine that, when one makes a promise to the benefit of a third person, the latter may maintain an action upon it. Burr v. Beers, 24 N. Y. 178. But the case last cited was an action at law, and Denio, J., says there was abundant authority to the point that the right to a personal judgment for a deficiency against the grantee of the mortgagor was not based in the previous chancery decisions in New York upon the notion of a direct contract between the grantee of the equity of redemption and the holder of the mortgage, but upon the principle that the undertaking of the grantee to pay off the incumbrance is a collateral security acquired by the mortgagor, which inures by an equitable subrogation to the benefit of the mortgagee. He proceeds to say that the common-law judgment in the case then before the court obviously could not be sustained by reference to the doctrine of courts of equity. He adds, i. the judgment could be sustained at all, it must be upon the broad principle that if one person make a promise to another, for the benefit of a third person, the third person may maintain an action on the promise. He admits that upon that question there has been a good deal of conflict of judicial opinion, and that the cases supposed to create a direct obligation from the purchaser of the equity of redemption to the mortgagee "are doubtless subject to some of the criticisms which have since been applied to them. Some of the opinions were pure obiter dicta, and in others the case, though presenting the point, was decided on other grounds. * * * Finally, the question came squarely before this court in Lawrence v. Fox, 20 N. Y. 268, and we there held, with hesitation on the part of a portion of the judges who concurred, while others dissented, that the action would lie. We must therefore regard the point as definitely settled, so far as the courts of this state are concerned." In view of the very able and exhaustive examination of the cases by Mr. Justice Comstock, in his dissenting opinion in Lawrence v. Fox, we can give but little persuasive effect to the judgments in that case and in Burr v. Beers.

The doctrine of Burr v. Beers—which has not been generally approved—can have no place in courts of equity, where the right of the mortgagee to take a decree against the grantee personally, for a balance unsatisfied by the sale of the premises mortgaged, has been placed upon different ground. The case at bar is not an action at law. The framework of the complaint is that of an equitable pleading, and the prayer is for a sale of the premises, and for a personal judgment for deficiency against the defendants, Bartola Brizzolara and Austin Roberts, etc. Indeed, under our Code, an independent action at law cannot be maintained for a debt, whatever its form, secured by mortgage. Code Civil Proc. § 720.

It has distinctly been decided by the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts that no action at law by the mortgagee lies on a promise made to the vendor, by the purchaser of an equity of redemption, to assume a mortgage on the premises, and to pay the mortgage note. Mellen v. Whipple, 1 Gray, 317, 324. The court in that case say that certain expressions used by Lord HOLT in Yard v. Eland, 1 Ld. Raym. 368, and by BULLER, J., in Marchington v. Vernon, 1 Bos. & P. 101, note, to the effect that "on a promise, not under seal, made by A for a good consideration to B., to pay B.'s debt to C., C. may sue A.," had been transferred into various textbooks, as if it were a general rule of law. But Mr. Justice METCALF remarked that the maxim required great modification, because it expresses rather an exception to a general rule than the rule itself; and adds that, by recent decisions of the English courts, the operation of the rule or maxim is restricted within their narrower limits, and the general rule to which it is an exception is now more strictly enforced. "That general rule is, and always has been, that a plaintiff in an action on a simple contract must be the person from whom the consideration of the contract actually moved, and that a stranger to the consideration cannot sue on the contract. The rule is sometimes thus expressed: There must be a privity of contract between the plaintiff and defendant, in order to render the defendant liable to an action, by the plaintiff, on the contract;" citing cases. The learned judge then proceeds to classify the exceptions to the general rule, and the court are quite certain that the promise to the mortgagor by the purchaser of the equity of redemption, to pay off a mortgage, does not constitute an exception. The classification of the Massachusetts court may not be exhaustive, but, if there be other exceptions, they must be such as stand upon a like footing of reason and justice with those enumerated. For convenience the classes of exceptions may be summarized: First, those in which the action for money had and received may be maintained, where a debtor has put money or property as a fund into the hands of one who has promised to pay the debt of him from whom he has received the fund, (but see Weston v. Barker, 12 Johns. 282;) second, where promises have been made to a father or uncle for the benefit of a child or nephew. The supreme court of Massachusetts were very confident that the case Mellen v. Whipple did not come within any recognized exception. The defendant there—the purchaser of the equity of redemption—had no money which in equity and good conscience belonged to the plaintiff, the mortgagee. No funds of the mortgagor, property, money, or credit, had been put into the defendant's hands for the purpose of meeting the plaintiff's claim on the mortgagor. The sale of the equity of redemption did not lessen the plaintiff's security for the mortgage debt. (A different reason is given by the Massachusetts court, but it is equally true in the case at bar that the sale of the mortgaged premises did not lessen the plaintiff's security. Except for the limitation pleaded, he retained a right to a decree for a sale of the mortgaged premises, and to judgment over for any deficiency.) There was (and is here) no nearness of kin between the parties. It was held in Mellen v. Whipple that the mortgagee could not maintain an action at law against the purchaser, because there was nothing in the nature of the transaction to take it out of the general rule in the opinion recited. The doctrine of courts of equity with reference to the liability of the grantee of the mortgagor is very clearly set forth in the cases cited by Mr. Jones in his work on Mortgages, (sections 740, 770,) and especially in Crowell v. Hospital, 27 N. J. Eq. 650. In the case last referred to it was said that a stipulation in a deed of conveyance inter partes, that the grantee shall assume and pay a prior mortgage on the premises, is a contract with the grantor simply for his indemnity, and will not be regarded in law or equity as a contract with the mortgagee or for his benefit. And in Halsey v. Reed, 9 Paige, 446, where the purchaser assumed the bond and mortgage, and there was a recital in the conveyance, "the amount thereof [of the mortgage debt] constitutes a part of the consideration of this conveyance, and has been deducted therefrom," Chancellor KENT held that this agreement was not intended as an absolute and unconditional promise to pay the principal and interest to the mortgagor, but an agreement to indemnify the mortgagor against the payment of the mortgage debt. In Crowell v. Hospital it was adjudged that the right of the mortgagee to a personal decree for a deficiency against a subsequent purchaser, whose deed contained such a stipulation, does not result from any fixed or vested right in the mortgagee, arising either from the acceptance of the conveyance of the mortgaged premises by the grantee, or from his obligation to pay the mortgage debt as between himself and his grantor; but it rests merely on the doctrine of courts of equity, that a creditor may have the benefit of all collateral obligations for the payment of a debt which a person standing in the position of surety holds for his indemnity, and in such case the mortgagee may proceed directly against the purchaser, who is ultimately liable, to avoid circuity of action. In the same case it was held that if the liability of the subsequent purchaser to his grantor to indemnify him against the mortgage debt be extinguished, as between themselves, by a reconveyance before bill for foreclosure filed, the contract of indemnity being thereby put an end to by the act of those who were parties to it, the mortgagee will not be entitled to a decree for a deficiency against such a purchaser, founded on such a stipulation in his deed. Roberts, the purchaser in the case at bar, is not a party to this appeal. As we have seen, the attempt here is to obtain a decree for the sale of the mortgaged premises, although the statute of limitations has barred an action on the mortgage debt and a personal judgment against the mortgagor, not only as mortgagor, but in his capacity of grantee from Roberts, although the deed from Roberts, accepted by Bartolo, the mortgagor, contains no language which can be construed a reassumption of the mortgage debt by the latter, or a promise on his part to indemnify Roberts. It is certain that, if plaintiff was not entitled to a personal judgment for deficiency against Roberts, he is not entitled to such judgment against Bartolo Brizzolara. If the complaint had been filed for a foreclosure before the running of the statute, plaintiff would have been entitled to a personal judgment for deficiency against Bartolo as mortgagor, but to no such judgment against Roberts if the reconveyance had been made before the filing of the complaint, and to none such against Bartolo in his distinct character as grantee of Roberts.

The general rule of chancery is that, as to strangers to the contract, the parties may at their pleasure abandon it, and mutually release each other from its performance. 2 Spence, Eq. Jur. 280. And the case at bar does not come within any established exception to the general rule. The case cannot be brought within the class in which trusts have been enforced by beneficiaries who have not previously agreed to the creation of the trust. The mortgagee, being the representative and standing in the place of the mortgagor, to enforce the rights of the latter against the purchaser, and having no greater or other equity in himself, is entitled only to such remedy as the mortgagor himself had when the bill was filed. "In other words, being a stranger to the contract of the purchaser with the mortgagor, and to the consideration whereon it was founded, it will be competent for those who were parties to it to rescind and extinguish it at their pleasure; and, after such rescission and extinguishment, the contract becomes utterly incapable of enforcement." Crowell v. Hospital, supra. The mortgagee can only be entitled to be subrogated to an existing remedy of his debtor, the mortgagor, upon a legal, existing stipulation. But the contract between Bartolo Brizzolara and Roberts was at an end when the complaint herein was filed. Even where the rule has been established that the purchaser is bound by his promise as a promise made for the benefit of the mortgagee, it is still necessary that the grantor should be personally liable upon the mortgage in order to render the grantee liable upon his covenant to the holder of the mortgage assumed. In King v. Whitely, 10 Paige, 465, the grantor of an equity of redemption in mortgaged premises, neither legally nor equitably interested in the payment of the bond and mortgage, except so far as the same were a charge upon his lands, conveyed the lands subject to the mortgage, and the conveyance recited that the grantees therein assumed the mortgage, and were to pay off the same as part of the consideration. It was held that, as the grantor in that conveyance was not personally liable to the holder of the mortgage, the grantees were not liable to the holder of the mortgage to pay the same. So late as the year 1877, King v. Whitely was approved, and its principle affirmed. Vrooman v. Turner, 69 N. Y. 280. In the case last cited the previous New York cases, including Burr v. Beers, are carefully considered and distinguished.

Under the section of the Code of Civil Procedure, (726,) "there can be but one action" for the recovery of any debt secured by mortgage, in which the court must by its judgment direct the sale of the incumbered property, and the application of the proceeds to the debt and costs, and, if it appear by the sheriff's return that the proceeds are insufficient, judgment can be docketed against the mortgagor, etc. Thus, whatever the form of the debt, the mortgagor can be legally compelled to pay no part of it until decree is entered for the sale of the premises mortgaged, and the liability which shall then accrue to him is a liability to pay only a deficiency, which shall appear on the sheriff's return. The liability of the mortgagor is therefore contingent on the fact that a sale of the mortgaged premises shall fail to satisfy the debt and costs. It is against this contingency that the purchaser indemnifies him. True, the statute authorizes a single decree which provides for a sale of the mortgaged premises, and a subsequent judgment over against the mortgagor, to which, upon the equitable principle of subrogation, may be added a judgment over against the purchaser (where the latter has indemnified his vendor) for any deficiency which may appear from the sheriff's return. But the return of the sheriff, which makes absolute the personal liability that was before conditional, and liquidates and renders certain the damages for which the mortgagor is personally liable, must always follow and depend upon a decree for and a sale of the premises. In the case before us the mortgagor did not pay his debt, and he never became liable to a personal judgment for deficiency, because no decree for a sale of the premises was ever entered. Had the title to the premises remained in Roberts, Bartolo Brizzolara, the mortgagor, would have had no cause of action against him, nor would the plaintiff, who could have claimed only to be subrogated to Bartolo's claim against Roberts, such as it was. Plaintiff cannot take a decree for the sale of the lands in this action, against demurrer or plea of the statute of limitations. He cannot take a personal judgment for a deficiency, because the amount of the deficiency, if any, can be ascertained only after decree for the sale of the premises, a sale thereof, and the sheriff's return of said sale.

Judgment affirmed.

SHARPSTEIN, MYRICK, THORNTON, and ROSS, JJ., concurred.

MCKEE, J., (specially concurring.) I concur. Where a purchaser of real estate from a mortgagor assumes payment of the mortgage debt, as a part of the consideration of his contract of purchase, there arises out of the transaction, upon the principle of subrogation, a cause of action for the benefit of the mortgagee, which he may enforce, at any time within the life of his mortgage, by an action at law or in equity against the purchaser. But if, as in the case in hand, the mortgagee sleeps upon his remedial rights against the mortgagor and purchaser, until the time of the statute of limitations has run against the mortgage debt, and the lien of the mortgage has become extinguished, and the purchaser and mortgagor have rescinded their contract, there is no remedial right which can be enforced at law or in equity by the mortgagee against the mortgagor or the purchaser. GRADY v. SUPERIOR COURT OF FRESNO COUNTY.[1]

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 21, 1883.)

FINE—ENFORCEMENT OF EXECUTION.

An adjudication of the judge of the superior court of one county, that a judgment of the superior court of another county, directing that a person be imprisoned until he pay a fine for a contempt, was in excess of its jurisdiction, is in effect an adjudication that so much of the judgment as directed the imprisonment was void, and therefore brings the case within Pen. Code, par. 1214, which provides that, "if the judgment is for a fine alone, execution may be issued thereon as a judgment in a civil action."

In bank.

Application by W. D. Grady for a writ to review the proceedings of the superior court of Fresno county in enforcing the collection of a fine against him for contempt by execution. Pen. Code, par. 1214, provides that, "if the judgment is for a fine alone, execution may be issued thereon as on a judgment in a civil action."

W. D. Grady, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. It is admitted that the superior court had jurisdiction of the proceedings for contempt. That being the case, and the court having imposed a fine, it was competent for the court to enforce its collection by execution. Section 1214, Pen. Code. As to that portion of the order adjudging the petitioner guilty of contempt, which directed that imprisonment should be used as a means of collecting the fine imposed, it is sufficient to say that section 1487 of the Penal Code makes it the duty of the court or judges to whom a writ of habeas corpus is returned, in case it shall appear that the petitioner is in custody by virtue of process from any court, judge, or officer, and that the jurisdiction of such court, judge, or officer was exceeded in adjudging that the petitioner should be imprisoned, to discharge the petitioner. Section 1496 of the same Code declares that no person who has been discharged by the order of a court or judge on habeas corpus can be again imprisoned, restrained, or kept in custody for the same cause, except in certain specified cases, of which the present is not one. We think that the adjudication of the superior judge on habeas corpus that the judgment of the court, in adjudging that the petitioner be imprisoned, was in excess of its jurisdiction, (upon which followed the consequence that the petitioner could not again be imprisoned for the same contempt,) was in effect an adjudication (which the judge on habeas corpus had full power to make) that the portion of the contempt judgment which provided for such imprisonment was null and void. This leaves the judgment of the superior court in the contempt proceeding as imposing a fine only, and places the case within section 1214 of the Penal Code. We wish it to be distinctly understood that we express no opinion with respect to the correctness of the judgment of the superior judge on habeas corpus. His view of the law is not authority binding upon any other judge or court should the same question arise in another case upon the same or similar facts. The application for a writ of review is denied, and the order to show cause is discharged.

THORNTON and SHARPSTEIN, JJ., expressed no opinion.

MOULTON v. PARKS et al.[2]

INJUNCTION — FICTITIOUS PARTIES — TRESPASS — PLEADING—CONSTITUTIONAL LAW—DRAINAGE.

1. The complaint alleged that plaintiff was ignorant of the true names of certain defendants designated as John Doe and Richard Roe. The record did not show that the true names of such defendants were discovered, and there was no amendment of the pleadings by substitution of other names for the fictitious ones. Held, that an injunction granted in the action was operative only against the real defendants designated by their proper names.

2. An action was brought against A., B., C., D., E., F., and others, to enjoin them from maintaining a dam, and for damages. The dam was built by defendant A. under a contract with the board of supervisors of S. county, of which defendants B., C., and D. were members, awarded by the board in pursuance of Act March 25, 1868, defendants B. and C. having signed the contract with A. Pending the action the dam was swept away, and was rebuilt by members of swamp land reclamation district No. 226, under Act March 28, 1868. The building of the original dam was unlawful on account of the unconstitutionality of the act of March 25, 1868. Held, in the absence of a supplemental pleading showing that the subsequent rebuilding connected defendants E. and F. with the original unlawful act, that the court erred in rendering judgment against them.

3. A finding that defendant D. was a member of "the board of supervisors," and took part in "the proceedings" under which the original unlawful contract was awarded, was not sufficient to justify a judgment against him, since it does not follow therefrom that he favored the contract in question.

4. The act of March 25, 1868, empowers the board to take possession of any land outside the levee district and "within the county of S." necessary for the construction of a levee or other work of protection within the district. Held, that the board of S. county had no authority thereunder to establish a levee in the adjoining county of C., though necessary for the protection of a district in S. county.

5. Such act, making it obligatory on the board of supervisors to establish a levee district at the expense of the entire county, on the petitions of persons owning more than one half of the acreage of any specified portion of the county, and that "it shall not be required to submit the question of tax to a vote of the people of any district so erected," is in conflict with Const. art. 1, § 8, providing that "private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use" without just compensation, etc.

Appeal from district court, Colusa county.

Action by L. E. Moulton against W. H. Parks and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Modified and affirmed.

Belcher & Belcher and Van Clief & Cowden, for appellants. A. L. Hart, for respondent.

McKinstry, J. In his complaint plaintiff alleges "that he is ignorant of the true names of the defendants above designated as John Doe and Richard Roe, and therefore has thus designated them, and prays that when their true names are discovered the pleadings and proceedings herein may be amended by inserting such names in the place and stead of the names herein used to designate such defendants." The "defendants" filed an answer. The record does not show that the true names of the defendants designated in the complaint as John Doe and Richard Roe have been discovered, nor have the pleadings and proceedings herein been amended by substituting any names for the fictitious names. Did the complaint not show that the names John Doe and Richard Roe were fictitious names, we might hold, perhaps, that the persons, whomsoever they were, who appeared and answered as John Doe and Richard Roe, were bound by the judgment; they having failed to plead the misnomer, or to respond in their real names to the allegations made against them. But as the record reads we construe the answer to be the answer of those of the defendants sued by their proper names, to wit, W. H. Parks, Eli Davis, W. H. Perdue, A. B. Van Arsdale, G. W. Santee, George Ohyler, and James T. Leary, and the injunction as operative only against such persons, their servants, etc.

The complaint was filed January 13, 1875. It avers that the plaintiff now is, and for more than two years last past has been, the owner and in possession of a tract of land containing 158 acres, situated in the county of Colusa, which tract is specifically described; that the land has been held and possessed by plaintiff for farming, grazing, and fruit-growing purposes, and is of the value of $5,000 for such purposes; that plaintiff has, and for more than a year past has had, on said land a dwelling house usually occupied by plaintiff's tenants and employes, about one half mile of fence, a well, corrals, and an orchard of fruit-bearing trees of the value of $800. The foregoing allegations of the complaint are denied by the answer, but the court below found them to be true, and the evidence is not before us.

The complaint further avers that plaintiff's land is situated between Butte creek and the Sacramento river, above where Butte slough puts out of said river; that said slough puts out of said river below plaintiff's land, less than a mile therefrom, and, running in a southeasterly direction to the mouth of Butte creek, flows thence in a southerly direction to and into said river, at a point more than 20 miles south of and below plaintiff's land; that Butte creek rises and has its source more than 40 miles northeast of plaintiff's land, and flows in a southwesterly direction and into Butte slough, at a point on said slough about 2½ miles southeast from plaintiff's land; that Butte creek and Butte slough, from their point of confluence with each other, and the said Butte creek from a point at least 20 miles northeast of plaintiff's land to such confluence, flow through a basin of lowland, which basin is bounded on the west by a strip of highland from one to three miles in width, extending along the east bank of the Sacramento river from a point on said river about 30 miles above and north of where said Butte slough puts out of said river to a point where said slough enters said river, and on the east by the high lands adjacent to the Butte mountains, and the highlands along the west bank of the Feather river, which said basin has an average width of about two miles; that during the winter and spring months in each and every year large quantities of water flow through said basin, slough, and creek, filling their banks in said basin and overflowing the same, and the waters from the Sacramento river above said highlands find by natural means their way into said basin, so that the water flowing into and in said basin during said months is in volume double that of the main Sacramento river at any point opposite said basin, and said waters are discharged through said creek, slough, and basin into the Sacramento and Feather rivers more than 20 miles south of and below plaintiff's land.

The answer admits the allegations of the complaint last set forth, except that the defendants deny that Butte slough runs to the mouth of Butte creek, or into the Sacramento river at any point; deny that Butte creek runs into Butte slough, or that there is any junction or confluence of said creek and slough, "except that both run into the same large basin of tule and swamp lands;" alleged that the water flowing into or through the basin described in the complaint is in volume not more than one tenth of the water of the main Sacramento, and deny that the waters of the basin described in the complaint, or any part thereof, are discharged from the Sacramento or Feather river, through said creek or slough, at any point south of the head of said slough.

The court found that Butte slough runs to the mouth of Butte creek, and flows thence in a southerly direction "to and into the tules of Sutter county" at a point more than five miles south of and below plaintiff's land; that Butte creek flows into Butte slough at a point on said slough about two and one half miles southeast of plaintiff's land; that Butte creek and slough, from the point of their confluence, flow through the basin described in the complaint, and discharge their waters into the said "tules of Sutter county," and that in the winter and spring months the waters flowing to and in said basin are in volume about equal to that of the main Sacramento at points opposite said basin. Thus the finding of the court accords with the last recited allegations of the complaint, except that the court finds that, after their junction, Butte creek and slough flow into the tules of Sutter county, instead of finding that Butte creek and slough flow into the Sacramento and Feather rivers, as alleged in the complaint.

It is averred in the complaint, and admitted by the answer, that the Sacramento river is a navigable stream from the town of Red Bluff, in the county of Tehama,—a distance of 70 miles above and north of plaintiff's land,—to its mouth, and from said town to said land and slough flows nearly due south; that opposite the basin described in the complaint the banks of said river are from 10 to 20 feet higher than the banks of Butte creek where said creek flows through said basin. The complaint further alleges that plaintiff's land is part of the said strip of highland lying on the east bank of the Sacramento river, and during the winter months of every year is at times partially overflowed by the waters of said Butte creek, and by the waters of the Sacramento river that find their way into said basin as aforesaid, but such overflow is slight, and does not interfere with the use and enjoyment of said land for the purposes for which it is owned and possessed; that said land is relieved from said overflow by the flowing off of said waters through said basin, creek, and slough, which constitute the natural and only outlet for said water; that if said slough, creek, and basin remain open, and the slough and creek unobstructed, the flood waters of each year will be drained off before any injury is done to said land of plaintiff, or the improvements thereon. The answer denies these last averments. The court found as alleged by plaintiff, except that it found a portion only of plaintiff's land was part of the highland on the east bank of the Sacramento.

The plaintiff further pleads that defendants, on the 17th day of October, 1874, unlawfully and wrongfully raised, constructed, and ever since have maintained, a dam across said basin below and within about two miles of plaintiff's land, and upon the freehold of defendants; that said dam extends from the highlands on the east side of said basin to the highland on the west side thereof, and crosses said Butte slough and Butte creek at points one fourth of a mile above and north of their confluence, and is of sufficient height, length, and strength to dam up and entirely obstruct, and does dam up and entirely obstruct, said creek, slough, and basin, and prevents the flow of any of said waters through the same at and below said dam, and has since its construction, and before the commencement of this action, caused the waters that flow upon plaintiff's land as aforesaid to remain thereon, and the waters which naturally, and which, but for said dam, would flow through said basin, creek, and slough without damage or injury to plaintiff's land, to back up, overflow, and remain upon plaintiff's land, to his damage in the sum of $1,000. The answer denies that either of the defendants ever built the dam, except as in the answer subsequently admitted, and expressly denies that the dam has obstructed the creek, slough, or basin, or that it caused any water to flow or remain upon plaintiff's land, or that, by reason of the dam, plaintiff has sustained any damage. The court found that the dam dammed up and obstructed the said creek, slough, and basin, and did cause the waters flowing upon plaintiff's land to remain thereon for a greater length of time than they would have remained except for said dam.

The plaintiff, in his complaint, further alleges that the defendants intend to and will, unless prevented by the judgment of the court, forever maintain said dam at its present height, length, and strength, and will forever by it dam up and obstruct said creek, slough, and basin, and prevent the flow of any of said waters; that, if defendants so maintain and so obstruct the flow of said waters, the waters that flow upon the land of plaintiff as aforesaid will remain thereon, and the waters will back up and overflow said land, flood plaintiff's dwelling house, wash away and destroy his fences, fruit trees, and other improvements, deposit injurious sediment, etc. These averments are denied by the defendants. Plaintiff's prayer is for an injunction, damages, and costs.

The defendants further allege in their answer that in the spring of 1871, in pursuance of an act of the legislature entitled "An act to provide for the protection of certain lands in the county of Sutter from overflow," approved March 25, 1868, defendant W. H. Parks, together with other persons not parties to this action, claiming in good faith to be the owners and in possession of over 60,000 acres of land in the county of Sutter, subject to overflow, petitioned the board of supervisors of said county, in accordance with said act of the legislature, to set apart and erect into a levee district "a specified portion of said county," with defined boundaries, of which the said lands of the petitioners constituted more than one half the acreage, and to place such levee district under the provisions of the act of the legislature, and in accordance therewith, as "Levee District No. 5," in said county; that such proceedings were regularly had; that on or before the 1st day of June, 1871, said portion of said county, containing over 100,000 acres of land in one body, was duly, by said board of supervisors, erected in a levee district, and placed under the provisions of said act, and called "Levee District No. 5;" that before the 15th of August, 1871, said levee district was duly and in good faith organized by the election and qualification of all such officers as are provided for by said act; that continually ever since the said petitioners, the board of supervisors, and all the officers of said district have in good faith claimed that said district was duly organized under said act, and that it became thereby a municipal corporation in fact; that the district, by its officers, has in good faith claimed the same to be such corporation, and, as such, has assessed the property of the district, levied and collected taxes, adopted plans for the protection of said district from overflow, contracted and paid for a large amount of work in pursuance of such plans, issued warrants and bonds for large sums of money, which are outstanding and unpaid, and done all other acts which said levee district might lawfully have done; that a part of one of the plans adopted by said board of supervisors and the engineers of said district to protect said district from overflow was the building of the dam or levee complained of; that the contract for said dam or levee, according to specifications fixed and prescribed by said engineers and board of supervisors, was awarded to defendant W. H. Parks, and duly executed by him on the 23d day of July, 1874; that defendant Parks, with his servants, built said dam or levee in exact accordance with said contract and specifications, and that none of the other defendants assisted or participated in the building thereof; that defendants Perdue and Van Arsdale, as members of said board of supervisors, and ex officio directors of said levee district, signed said contract for the building of said levee (called "dam" in the complaint;) that defendant Parks completed said levee according to said contract, and the same was accepted by said levee district, and Parks discharged from further obligations on said contract, long before the commencement of this action. Defendants further answered that after the commencement of this action, and on the ——— day of January, 1875, said dam or levee was wholly abated and removed.

The court below found that a petition in due form was presented by defendant Parks and others, not parties to this action, for the formation of a levee district, as alleged in the answer, and under the act referred to; that petitioners were the owners of more than one half of the lands described in the petition; that on the 11th of March, 1871, the board of supervisors duly made and entered an order as required by law, erecting said lands into "Levee District No. 5;" that the building of the dam was part of the plan adopted; that on the 23d of July, 1874, the board of supervisors, in pursuance of the act, made and entered into a contract with the defendant Parks for the construction of the dam described; that at the time of the presentation of the petition and the making of said order and the taking of the other proceedings, the defendants Perdue, Van Arsdale, and Davis "were members of said board of supervisors, and participated in the proceedings hereinbefore set forth;" that in pursuance of said contract defendant Parks constructed on lands of said defendant and others a dam across said basin, creek, and slough, within about two miles of plaintiff's said land; that said dam was constructed from the highlands on the east side of said basin to the highlands on the west side thereof, crossing said creek and slough at points about one fourth of a mile above and north of their confluence; that said dam, as constructed, was of sufficient height, length, and strength to dam up and obstruct, and did dam up and obstruct, said creek, slough, and basin so as to prevent, "except through a gate, culvert, and waste way, respectively," the flow of any of the waters of the same at and below said dam, and did cause the waters flowing upon plaintiff's land as aforesaid to remain thereon for a greater length of time than they would have remained had it not been for said dam; that said dam was constructed by said Parks in the summer and fall of the year 1874; that on the 19th of January, 1875, and after the commencement of this action, the said dam was broken by the pressure and force of the waters standing above and north thereof, and about 600 feet of said dam was then washed and carried away by said waters, the land above said dam, including plaintiff's said land, being thereby relieved from overflow, the water causing said overflow finding an outlet through the break in said dam.

The court, also at the request of defendants, adopted certain findings to the effect following: That the object of the dam or levee was to reclaim and protect from overflow by water the swamp and overflowed lands within the district No. 5; that the dam or levee was built in strict accordance with plans and specifications made by the engineer of district No. 5 and the contract of defendant Parks with said district through its proper agents, and was completed pursuant to said contract, and accepted by said district, before any injury resulted therefrom to plaintiff; that the basin referred to annually fills and overflows from the waters of the Sacramento river and Butte creek to a depth that renders a portion of plaintiff's said land unfit for cultivation, and has so overflowed every year for more than 20 years, except the year 1864; and the largest proportion of the water filling said basin flows from the Sacramento river over its banks and through Butte slough; that said basin fills as the river rises, and empties, if unobstructed, as the river falls; that on the 26th day of November, 1874, the said dam backed the waters up and over the plaintiff's land, and caused the same to remain thereon until the 19th of January, 1875, and that by said dam plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $100.

Such were the issues made by the pleadings, and such the findings of the court so far as they responded to such issues. The cause was tried in the district court in January, 1876, and the court, in addition to the findings above set forth, found in substance as follows: That after the break in the dam, and after this action was commenced, certain lands in Sutter county were formed and created into a swamp land reclamation district, designated as "Swamp Land Reclamation District No. 226," under and in pursuance of an act of the legisature entitled "An act to provide for the management and sale of lands belonging to the state, approved March 28, 1868; and the defendant W. H. Parks was thereupon duly elected one of the trustees of said reclamation district, and he then and there qualified and acted as one of said trustees. That at the time of the formation of said reclamation district the defendants Davis, Ohyler, and Leary were the duly elected, qualified, and acting supervisors of the said county of Sutter, and have ever since constituted the board of supervisors of said county. That the trustees of said reclamation district —the defendant Parks being one of them— afterwards, and in pursuance of a plan of reclamation by them adopted, made and entered into a contract with one——— for the repair of said dam, and in pursuance of the said contract the said ——— in the summer and fall of 1875 did repair said dam by rebuilding so much thereof as has been previously washed away as above stated, and did at the same time enlarge and strengthen the whole of said dam; so that the same as repaired, enlarged, and strengthened is sufficient to dam up and obstruct the said waters as aforesaid. That the said trustees of said reclamation district ever since—the defendant Parks being one of them—have had their agents and employes upon said dam protecting and maintaining the same. That, unless restrained, the said trustees will continue to maintain said dam, and to keep the same in repair, and will forever thereby dam up the waters flowing through said creek, slough, and basin, so as to overflow and remain upon plaintiff's said land as aforesaid, and thereby to cause the waters to remain upon a portion of plaintiff's land for a period of at least six weeks longer each year than they otherwise would.

The judgment appealed from enjoins the defendants, their servants, etc., from constructing, maintaining, etc., and provides that plaintiff recover of defendants $100 damages, and $369.10 costs. The findings were all filed at the same time, but, for convenience of reference, we shall style those first hereinbefore set forth as the "original findings," and those stated to have been filed in addition, as the "additional findings." The additional findings, except in so far as they are evidence of an intent on the part of defendant Parks to continue the dam, are entirely without the issues, and cannot uphold a judgment against the defendants Ohyler and Leary. If it be conceded that the original erection of the dam was unlawful, and that Parks, Perdue, and Van Arsdale (the two last by reason of their having signed the contract with Parks) were parties to such unlawful erection, all others who aided or assisted in the work, and all who, after it was erected, either before or after the commencement of the action, aided or assisted in continuing or repairing the dam as agents, servants, employes, or coworkers with the persons who constructed it, would of course be bound by the judgment and restraining order against Parks, Perdue, and Van Arsdale, by virtue of their connection with and relation to the defendants last named. But plaintiff ought not, under the pleadings in this action, to have a judgment for damages and costs against Ohyler and Leary, who had in no way interfered with his rights, or assisted others in interfering with his rights, prior to the commencement of the action. It is found that defendants Ohyler, Leary, and Davis were members of the board of supervisors when a "reclamation district" was formed under the act of March 28, 1868, and when the trustees of such reclamation district let the contract for the rebuilding of the dam, in pursuance of a plan by them adopted. But if the establishment of the reclamation district so connected the defendants Ohyler, Leary, and Davis with the rebuilding of the dam—such rebuilding being conceded to be unlawful— as that they would be held to be parties to the rebuilding, the establishment of the reclamation district was a new and independent act on the part of Ohyler, Leary, and Davis, in no way connected with the previous formation of a levee district (No. 5) under the act of March 25, 1868, or with the erection of the dam thereunder,—an act which occurred after the commencement of this action, and no supplemental or amended complaint was filed under which they could be tried for such subsequent act. Plaintiff was not authorized to take a judgment for damages and costs against those who, as we have seen, if they did him any wrong, did it after suit brought, without supplemental pleading; a fortiori when it appears they are acting officially and independently in accordance with an act of the legislature different from the act under which the original wrongdoers claim to justify. And even if it should be conceded that, in consequence of the fact Ohyler and Leary having been members of the board of supervisors when the "reclamation district" was formed, etc., they should be held as the servants or coworkers of the persons who originally built the dam in maintaining and continuing it, and therefore bound by any injunction which should issue against such persons, yet, in the absence of supplemental complaint, charging them as such co-workers, and giving them an opportunity to deny the charge, no judgment for damages and costs should have been entered against them. The judgment is therefore erroneous as to defendants Ohyler and Leary.

On the other hand, the other defendants were not entitled to defend under the act of March 28, 1868. If it should be conceded that the original erection of the dam was unlawful, nevertheless, if the act of March 28, 1868, is a valid act, and the dam was rebuilt in strict pursuance of that act, the defendants would have been entitled to assert the facts (although the rebuilding was done after the suit was brought) by way of defense, to show that the dam ought not to be abated, or its continuance enjoined, had they pleaded the facts by supplemental answer. But they failed to do so. Hence, under the pleadings, neither was plaintiff authorized to take a judgment against defendants Obyler, Leary, and Davis, based upon the fact that they were members of the board of supervisors when certain things were done, subsequent to the commencement of the action, nor can defendants rely as a defense upon the establishment of a "reclamation district," under the act of March 28, 1868, after the commencement of the action. The answer avers that defendants Perdue and Van Arsdale, as members of the board of supervisors and ex officio directors of levee district No. 5, signed a contract for the buiding of the dam by defendant Parks. Whether the admission that they signed the contract makes them responsible is a question hereafter to be considered. But there is no finding in the "original" findings which can be held to charge either the defendant Perdue or Van Arsdale or Davis. The finding is that, when the petition was presented by Parks and others, when the order was made by the board of supervisors erecting "Levee District No. 5," and when the contract was made with Parks, "Van Arsdale, Perdue, and Davis were members of said board, and participated in the proceedings." Non constat but at least one of the three voted against the reception of the petition, against the order erecting the district, and against the order, if any, directing the contract to be executed. The finding fails to state who of the three favored the proceedings. There are, therefore, no facts found which can uphold the judgment against the defendant Davis.

The judgment against the defendant Santee is clearly erroneous. The findings in no way connect Santee with any of the acts claimed to be wrongful.

It remains to inquire whether the judgment against Parks, Perdue, and Van Arsdale should be permitted to stand. As we have seen, the court below found that the dam or levee was built in strict accordance with plans and specifications made by the engineer of district No. 5, and the contract. It may be conceded, for the purposes of this decision, that, if the legislature had power to pass the act of March 25, 1868, and that act was pursued by the supervisors and other officers whose duties are prescribed by it, and the dam was a work which they had authority to erect under the act,—the plans by them adopted and carried out not being inherently defective or violative of the law,—the present action cannot be maintained; that, under such circumstances, any incidental damage which may have occurred to plaintiff in the prosecution or completion of a public work authorized by the state is damnum absque injuria. Green v. Swift, 47 Cal. 536. The present constitution of the state provides: "Private property shall not be taken or damaged for public use without just compensation having been first made to, or paid into court for, the owner." Article 1, § 14. The constitution of 1849 reads: "Nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation." Article 1, § 8. The dam was erected, and the case at bar tried by the district court, while the former constitution was in force. In Green v. Swift, supra, it was held that the incidental damage caused by a public work authorized by law in flooding or washing away of the soil from the land of a citizen—the work having been done in strict accordance with law, skillfully, and without malice—was not a taking of private property within the meaning of the constitution then in operation. We have repeatedly intimated that we would follow the construction of the provisions of the former constitution given by the highest tribunal created by that constitution. And it may be conceded, for the purposes of this decision only, that the doctrine of Green v. Swift is applicable to the facts of the present case.

It is proper to inquire whether the erection of the dam or levee found to have damaged the plaintiff's land was authorized by the act of March 25, 1868. The land within the delta above the junction of Butte creek and Butte slough is in Colusa county. Pol. Code, § 3916. The court below found that the dam, as constructed, extended from the highlands on the east side of the basin to the highlands on the west side thereof, crossing said creek and slough at points about one fourth of a mile above and north of their confluence. The portion of the dam between the creek and slough was therefore in Colusa county.

The act of the legislature under which defendants Parks, Perdue, and Van Arsdale seek to justify is entitled "An act to provide for the protection of certain lands in the county of Sutter from overflow." St. 1867-68, p. 316. By its terms it confers power on the board of supervisors of Sutter to establish levee districts only within the limits of their county. Sections 2, 21. The board of supervisors is authorized to adopt a plan for the protection of any levee district created under the act, to divide it into sections, and to let contracts for the construction of sections of a levee or other work of protection. Section 10. The power to adopt a plan is not in terms limited to the adoption of a plan which shall provide for the construction of levees or other works only within Sutter county, nor is the power conferred upon the board to contract for the construction of levees without the county, unless such power is conferred by the general terms of the grant. It may be that, in the opinion of the board of supervisors of Sutter county, no efficient plan for the protection of levee district No. 5 could be carried into effect which did not provide for the construction of a levee outside of the district and outside of the county, and it may be argued that such a condition of things must have been anticipated by the members of the legislature, when the general power of adopting plans, and constructing works in accordance therewith, was given to the board. But the board of supervisors of Sutter county had the right to employ only such power, with respect to the adoption of plans and construction of works, as was conferred by the act of the legislature; and in inquiring whether the grant is limited we should consider as well the whole act as the nature of the official powers, under the constitutions and laws of the supervisors, as legislative and executive public agents. The eighth section of the act empowers the board to take possession of any land within the district that may be necessary for any levee or work of reclamation. It also empowers the board to take possession of any land outside the district and within the county that may be necessary or proper to furnish material for the construction of a levee, or other work of protection, within a district. The same section requires that if the property, within the district or county, of which possession may thus be taken, is private property, the board shall petition the county judge of the county of Sutter to appoint three appraisers, etc. It may be conceded that the private proprietor may voluntarily surrender possession and waive damages, and that the power to condemn includes the power on the part of the county to accept lands within the district or county thus donated for the purpose of a levee, or for the purpose of the taking of material therefrom. There is no power conferred by the act upon the board of supervisors to contract for the purchase of lands for a consideration, or to levy an assessment to provide moneys to pay for lands thus purchased. It would seem that it was not within the contemplation of the legislature that lands should be acquired whereon to erect levees or works of protection, or from which to take building material, except through the employment of the power of eminent domain, (within which is included the acquisition by means of donations, which are operative by reason of the waiver of "just compensation" on the part of the private proprietor,) and, as we have seen, the employment of the power of eminent domain through the supervisors is carefully limited to the district where the land is taken for a levee, and to the county where it is taken for material.

This view is strengthened by a consideration of the nature of the office of supervisor. They are local officers. The act imposes the duty of keeping the levees and other works in repair, and of levying and collecting taxes upon all the property within the district for the purpose of raising funds to keep them in repair. If the supervisors of Sutter have power to cause to be erected and kept in repair a levee, or part of a levee, in Colusa, they have power to erect and keep in repair levees, all but one of which shall be in other counties than Sutter. It is not to be supposed that legislators closed their eyes to the complications between counties and property owners in different counties which would thus arise. Again, if the board of supervisors are authorized to include within levees large bodies of land not within the district, the effect may be a direct benefit to such lands, or portions of them, by protecting them from overflow. But the lands within the limits of the district only can be assessed for benefits conferred upon such lands. The legislature has no power to relieve a portion of the lands benefited. People v. Lynch, 51 Cal. 15. It may be said that the facts of this case do not show any of the lands without the district to be benefited by the work. But we are now considering the interpretation to be given the act of March 25, 1868, and may reasonably presume that the legislature did not intend that the power to adopt plans and build levees should be employed in such manner as to result in consequences which might be obnoxious, because violative of constitutional principles. People v. Parks, 58 Cal. 624. The establishment of an assessment district is a declaration that the only lands which will be benefited by the proposed protection works are the lands within the district. It must be admitted it was not intended the board should include within levees lands without the district which should be benefited by the work. It will be urged, however, that the board has power to determine that lands without the district are not benefited by the levees, and to include such lands within the district levees; that it is to be presumed the board had the limitation in mind, and that the levees as actually erected did not include any lands benefited other than the lands within the district. But whence comes the power to the supervisors of determining (after the creation of the district which itself determines that certain lands, and none other, will be benefited by the proposed work) that any lands—inside or outside the district—will be or will not be benefited? The argument would lead to this: By creating a levee district, the supervisors adjudge that the lands within the district will be benefited by work to be done at any places outside the district which the board shall subsequently provide for; the board reserving the entire power, by its final and conclusive judgment, of deciding that any plan it may adopt will not include any lands which will be benefited, other than the lands within the districts. In view of the other sections of the statute, the nature of the functions of supervisors, and the consequences which might follow from the adoption of the construction claimed by counsel for appellants, we ought not, in the absence of any provision of the act conferring on the board the power of extending their works beyond their county, to hold that such vast discretionary authority has been conferred on the supervisors merely because of the clause which authorizes them generally to adopt plans, etc. Our conclusion is that the officers of the county of Sutter had no power to cause a levee to be built in the county of Colusa.

We add that there are constitutional objections to the act of March 25, 1868, not heretofore considered by the supreme court. The twenty-first section of the act is mandatory. It reads: "Sec. 21. Whenever a petition shall be received by said board of supervisors from persons in possession of more than one half of the acres of any specified portion of said county, asking to be set apart and erected into a levee district, said board shall at once erect such territory into a levee district, and place it under the provisions of this act, to be called 'Levee District No. 1, 2, 3,' and so on, as the case may be; provided, that it shall not be required to submit the question of tax to a vote of the people of any district so erected." Here is an attempt to transfer to persons in possession of more than one half of the acres of any portion of the county of Sutter, which they may specify, the power to declare that such portion of the county will be benefited by works to be erected at the expense of all the property, real and personal, within it, and to set in motion machinery for the enforcement of a tax and assessment against the owners of a minority of the acreage. The act provides for no judicial inquiry as to what lands will be benefited by a proposed work, nor does it contain any declaration by the state legislature that any specified lands will be benefited, nor provide that such declaration may be made by the supervisors, or by any officer or agent of the state or county. When those in possession of more than half of the land by them specified file a petition they assert that they will be benefited by the proposed work, and they also attempt to determine that the owners of other lands will be benefited. They determine that the work will benefit all, and attempt to levy a tax upon others as well as themselves, which shall be expended in work of joint as well as several benefit. No man can be a judge in his own cause, and no man's property can be taken without due process of law.

With respect to assessments for local improvements, Mr. Justice Cooley says: "The district within which the tax shall be laid may be determined in either of two modes: (1) The legislative authority either of the state, or, when properly organized, of the municipality, may determine over what territory the benefits are so far diffused as to render it proper to make all lands contribute to the cost; or (2) the assessors or commissioners who, under the law, are to make the assessment, may have the whole matter submitted to their judgment, to assess such lands as, in their opinion, are specially benefited, and ought therefore to contribute to the cost of the work." Cooley, Tax'n, 449. It is manifest that the act of the legislature we are considering does not provide for the creation of an assessment district in either of the two modes above pointed out. Under the twenty-first section, if valid, the levee district, which is the assessment district, is established neither by the legislative authority of the state or county, nor by assessors or commissioners authorized to ascertain what lands will be benefited by the proposed levees or works of protection. The section provides that on the presentation of a petition the board of supervisors "shall at once proceed" to erect the territory described in the petition into a levee district, "and place it under the provisions of this act." The supervisors have no discretion to reject the petition, or to modify or change the boundaries of the district, or otherwise to exercise any judgment with reference to the expediency of fixing the limits of the assessment district where the petition fixes them. One man in possession of 3,000 acres of land, which he believes will be protected by a levee, may thus decree that 5,999 acres (of which 2,999 are owned by 100 other men) will be benefited by a levee, and arbitrarily adjudge the 100 to pay almost half of the expense of building it. Under our constitution there never has been power in the legislature to delegate such legislative functions to interested individuals. By entering into the contract with defendant Parks for the construction of the levee the defendants Perdue and Van Arsdale aided and abetted the former in his unlawful act. The judgment against defendants Parks, Perdue, and Van Arsdale should be affirmed; against Santee, Ohyler, Davis, and Leary should be reversed. Ordered that the judgment of the district court be modified by reversing and setting aside so much thereof as adjudges that plaintiff have and recover of and from defendants Davis, Santee, Ohyler, and Leary the sum of $100 damages and $369 costs, and that the said judgment of the district court be in all other respects affirmed.

Ross, Sharpstein, and Myrick, JJ., concur. McKee and Thornton, JJ., concur in the judgment.

People v. Markham.[1]

Bribery—Sufficiency of Indictment—General Reputation of Witness—Appealable Order.

1. A demurrer to an information for bribery, on the ground that it cannot be ascertained therefrom whether defendant is charged with making a corrupt agreement not to arrest for violation of a state law, or for violation of a city ordinance, must be overruled, under Pen. Code, § 1004, providing that defendant cannot demur to an information on the ground that it is uncertain.

2. Pen. Code, § 68, provides that every executive officer who receives, or agrees to receive, any bribe upon any understanding that his "action upon any matter then pending, or which may be brought before him in his official capacity, shall be influenced thereby," is punishable, etc. An information alleged that defendant received a bribe of $15 upon an understanding that he would not arrest persons engaged in violating a gaming ordinance. Held, that the indictment was sufficient, without alleging that any such offense had been brought before defendant in his official capacity.

3. The officer accepting such bribe may be found guilty under such statute, without proving that the offense of gaming, which he was bribed not to prosecute, was in fact subsequently committed.

4. The general reputation of a witness for truth, honesty, and integrity cannot be established by his reputation as to those particulars among the police officers of a small town.

5. Under laws of California, an order denying a motion in arrest of judgment is not appealable.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county.

Moore, Laine & Lieb, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Marshall and Dist. Atty. Campbell, for the People.

McKinstry, J. The charging part of the information is as follows: "The said W. W. Markham, on the 30th day of December, A. D. 1882, at the county and state aforesaid, then and there being an executive officer, namely, a police officer of the city of San Jose, county of Santa Clara aforesaid, did ask, receive, and agree to receive a bribe, to wit, fifteen standard dollars, lawful coin of the United States of America, upon an understanding and agreement that he would not arrest persons engaged in violating section 330 of the Penal Code of the State of California, nor would he arrest persons engaged in violating the gaming ordinance of the said city of San Jose, contrary to the form of the statute," etc. Defendant demurred to the information on the ground "that said information is uncertain, in that it cannot be ascertained therefrom whether he is charged with making a corrupt agreement not to arrest under section 330 of the Penal Code, or for a violation of a city ordinance." A defendant cannot demur to an information on the ground that it is uncertain. Pen. Code, § 1004. It is contended by appellant, however, that the facts stated in the information do not constitute a public offense. Section 1012 of the Penal Code provides: "When the objections mentioned in section 1004 appear on the face of the indictment or information, they can only be taken by demurrer, except that the objection to the jurisdiction of the court over the subject of the indictment or information, or that the facts stated do not constitute a public offense, may be taken at the trial, under the plea of not guilty, or after the trial, in arrest of judgment." At the proper time defendant moved in arrest of judgment, on the ground that the information did not state facts constituting a cause of action. He also moved for a new trial. Section 68 of the Penal Code reads: "Every executive officer * * * who asks, receives, or agrees to receive any bribe, upon any agreement or understanding that his vote, opinion, or action upon any matter then pending, or which may be brought before him in his official capacity, shall be influenced thereby, is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not less than one nor more than fourteen years," etc. The seventh section of the same Code defines the word "bribe" to signify anything of value or advantage, present or prospective, or any promise or undertaking to give any, asked, given, or accepted, with a corrupt intent to influence unlawfully the person to whom it is given in his action, vote, or opinion in any public or official capacity. The objection of appellant's demurrer is more specifically stated in his points filed in this court: "There was nothing [in the information] to show that anything ever could or did come before him in his official capacity concerning the matter." If we understand the argument of counsel, it is to the effect that the information should have stated that section 330 of the Penal Code was being violated by certain persons when the $15 was given and received with the understanding that defendant should not arrest such persons, or that when the money was paid it was paid in contemplation of an intended violation of the section by certain persons, and was received under an agreement of defendant that he would not arrest such persons. Further, that, in case the information had alleged that section 330 was being violated when the money was paid, it should also have alleged that defendant, in fact, failed to arrest the persons guilty of such violation. At the least, the argument of counsel for appellant involves the proposition that in case the information alleges that money is paid a police officer, and by him received, with the understanding that he will not arrest persons who subsequently shall commit a certain crime, it must also allege that some person or persons did subsequently commit the crime, and the officer, having the opportunity and ability to arrest, failed to arrest such person or persons. But we think, when a police officer receives money in consideration of his promise that he will not arrest any one of a class of offenders against the criminal laws, he is guilty of receiving a bribe, because the case of one who has committed the offense, and the consequent duty of the officer to arrest, is "a matter which may be brought before him in his official capacity." We are of opinion that a police officer who shall receive a weekly stipend, or a single payment of money, in consideration of his promise not to arrest any violator of the gaming law, is not only morally guilty, but may be found guilty under the statute, without his trial involving the necessity of the prosecution establishing the commission of a distinct crime by a third person, together with a want of energy and efficiency on the part of the officer in securing the arrest of the third person.

The scope of the definition of "bribery" is as broad as the duties of the officer who accepts the bribe. It is the duty of a police officer to arrest, with or without warrant, according to circumstances, every person who violates section 330 of the Penal Code. If, therefore, he agreed, in consideration of money paid him, not to arrest any person who should violate section 330, it would seem to the ordinary comprehension that he was bribed with respect to a matter which might be a subject of his official action. In opposition to the view above set forth, appellant cites certain cases. They are People ex rel. Perley, 2 Cal. 564; Barefield v. State, 14 Ala. 603; Collins v. State, 25 Tex. Supp. 202; State v. Hughes, 43 Tex. 518; Newell v. Com., 2 Wash. (Va.) 88; and Old v. Com., 18 Grat. 918. But the decision in People ex rel. Perley turned upon the phraseology of a statute different from that now under consideration. It was held that under the statute of 1850, which confined the offense of bribery of a judicial officer to the payment or offer to influence such officer "to acting more favorably to one side than the other in any suit, matter, or cause depending or to be brought before him," it should appear that a particular legal proceeding named in the presentment was commenced, or, at least, was to be commenced. In Barefield v. State the defendant below had been indicted for bribing a justice of the peace by corruptly promising him $25 to influence his decision in a certain controversy or proceeding that might be brought before him, wherein Miles Barefield was to be plaintiff and W. H. Owen was to be the defendant. Two of the three judges of the supreme court of Alabama held that while an offer to bribe a judicial officer was a grave offense at the common law, yet under the statute (similar to ours) it was necessary, to constitute the bribery, that there must have been an acceptance of the bribe; and also it must appear that the cause or proceeding was pending before the justice when the offer was made, or that the cause or proceeding was afterwards instituted, so that in the ordinary course it would come before him. Mr. Justice CHILTON dissented from his brethren upon both the points on which their conclusion rested, and we concur with his view of the law. He said: "But I feel constrained to differ with my brethren as to the construction which they place upon the statute under which the conviction was had. In my judgment, it is not indispensable that the matter, cause, or proceeding in which the decision or judgment of the officer is to be influenced by the bribe should afterwards be actually brought before him, in order to constitute the offense. But if the party corruptly give or promise any gift or gratuity whatever, 'with intent to influence the act, vote, opinion, decision, or judgment' of any officer, whether executive, legislative, or judicial, on any matter, cause, or proceeding which may be then pending, or may by law come or be brought before him in his official capacity, the crime is complete, although the matter never should come before such officer. The law, it is well remarked, abhors the least tendency to corruption; and at common law attempts to bribe, though unsuccessful, were held indictable. 1 Russ. Crimes, 156; U. S. v. Worrall, 2 Dall. 384; Rex v. Plympton, 2 Ld. Raym. 1377; Rex v. Vaughan, 4 Burrows, 2494, affirmed in Rex v. Pollman, per Lord ELLENBOROUGH, 2 Camp. 230. It is true the intention to corrupt the justice in regard to his anticipated action upon the case is not an offense which the law can punish; but, when that intention is evidenced by overt acts,—when the promise is complete to confer upon the officer the reward as a premium to incline him to act contrary to his duty, and in violation of the known rules of honesty and integrity,—the defendant has done his part towards consummating the guilt, and the punishment inflicted is not disproportioned to the demerit of his crime. The matter, cause, or proceeding must be one which may come before him,—that is, comes within his jurisdiction,—or which may be brought before the officer, or which may be pending at the time of the corrupt promise. The legislature, I think, did not intend that the prosecution should depend upon the fact whether the officer actually had it in his power to carry out the corrupt agreement before the indictment was exhibited. It is sufficient, I think, that the subject-matter upon which the bribe was to operate existed, and could legally be brought before the officer in his official capacity. The offense consists, in contemplation of the statute, in poisoning and corrupting the fountain of justice, and, although the particular deleterious consequence designed to be effected by the parties has not ensued, the state, nevertheless, has an officer corrupted, and society has lost all protection for its rights, so far as the administration of the law by him is concerned." In State v. Hughes, the defendant was indicted under a statute which made it a felony to bribe a witness. It was held that a charge that the defendant offered a person money to avoid becoming a witness was not authorized by the wording of the statute. In Newell v. Com., (decided in 1795,) it was said that a common-law information which attempted to allege that defendant, a justice of the peace, corruptly received a bribe to vote for a certain person as clerk of the peace, and that he did vote for such person, was too uncertain in not averring that an election for clerk of the peace was in fact held. In Old v. Com., the only question considered was whether the evidence justified the verdict of guilty. It was held that a new trial was properly denied. In Collins v. State, 25 Tex. Supp. 202, the indictment, founded upon a statute, omitted to state that the matter, to influence his action upon which it was alleged money was offered to the district attorney, was a matter of such nature as ever could come before him for official action.

None of the cases cited, when analyzed, would require a construction such as is claimed by appellant to be the correct construction of the section of our Code. The nearest case is Barefield v. State, and of that case we remark that the reasoning of the dissenting judge is to us more satisfactory than that of the prevailing opinion. Here the duty of the defendant was to arrest those violating a certain law, and the duty was one which he might at any time be required to discharge. The matter might be presented to him for official action. The sixty-seventh section of the Penal Code provides that any person who gives or offers a bribe to any executive officer, with intent to influence him in respect to any act, etc., as such officer, is punishable. By the sixty-seventh section the offense defined is that of one who offers, by the sixty-eighth that of one who receives, a bribe. If the witness who testified he paid money to the present defendant was informed against, would it not be enough to allege in the information that he paid the money in consideration of a promise that the officer would not arrest any person for a violation of section 330 of the Penal Code? His offense was complete. In the language of Mr. Justice CHILTON, "the legislature did not intend that the prosecution should depend upon the fact whether the officer actually had it in his power to carry out the corrupt agreement before the indictment was exhibited." See, also, People v. Ah Fook, 6 Pac. Coast Law J. 1021. People v. Kalloch, 60 Cal. 113, in no degree conflicts with the views above expressed. At the trial a witness, Cole, was asked by defendant's counsel: "Do you know Ah Hung's reputation for truth, honesty, and integrity in San Jose?" Ah Hung had been examined as a witness on behalf of the prosecution. To the question above recited the witness Cole answered: "I know his general reputation among the officers of San Jose; that is all." On objection, the answer was ruled out by the court. A witness may be impeached by evidence that his general reputation for truth, honesty, and integrity is bad. Code Civil Proc. § 2051. The section of the Code as to reputation for truth is but declaratory of the common-law rule. The evidence, to be competent, must be as to witness' general reputation in the community in which he resides; that is to say, to impeach him when the inquiry is as to his reputation for truth, he must have reached the bad eminence of notoriety as a liar. Bates v. Barber, 4 Cush. 107; Knode v. Williamson, 17 Wall. 586; Whart. Ev. 562, 563. The attack must be on his reputation among his neighbors, whether they know him personally or not, or among those who have had opportunities of ascertaining his reputation as generally estimated. 1 Greenl. Ev. 461. The question propounded to the witness was not as to the general reputation of Ah Hung, and the answer of the witness did not respond to any supposed question as to general reputation. The number of police officers in San Jose is, for aught that appears in the transcript, very limited, and there is no suggestion that Ah Hung's acquaintances and associates were confined to members of the police department. However this may be, if we assume, as we must assume, that there are few policemen in San Jose, their opinion of his character does not establish his general reputation in the community. Read as a whole, the charge of the court below fairly presented the law. The order denying defendant's motion in arrest of judgment is not appealable. Judgment and order denying new trial affirmed.

IRRIGATION—DIVERSION OF WATERS—ADVERSE POSSESSION—ESTOPPEL.

1. The right of a proprietor to use a due proportion of the waters of a stream, upon which his lands border, for irrigation purposes, cannot be affected by the grant of a right to divert the waters of the same stream, made by an adjacent proprietor.

2. The right to the exclusive use of the waters of a stream for irrigating purposes cannot be acquired by adverse possession, where, during the time in which such prescriptive right is claimed to have accrued, there has been an abundant supply of water in the stream for all claimants.

3. In such case, the supply of water having from natural causes proven insufficient for the wants of all claimants, the failure of a proprietor to object to the diversion of a disproportionate share of the water by an adjacent proprietor, during the season of abundance, will not estop him from making such objection thereafter.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county.

Action by the Anaheim Water Company and others against the Semitropic Water Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Bicknell & White and Glassel, Smith & Patton, for appellant. Smith & Hupp, for respondents.

ROSS, J. In its course through Los Angeles county, the Santa Ana river forms the dividing line between the Ranchos Canon de Santa Ana, San Juan y Cajon de Santa Ana, and Las Bolsas on the one side, and the Ranchos Santiago de Santa Ana and Lomas de Santiago on the other. Between the Ranchos Canon de Santa Ana and the San Juan y Cajon de Santa Ana, and also fronting on the river, is a small piece of land belonging to the government. From a map furnished us by the respective parties, it appears that the Rancho Santiago de Santa Ana has a frontage on the river almost equal to the combined frontage of the Ranchos Canon de Santa Ana, San Juan y Cajon de Santa Ana, Las Bolsas, and the government land, and reaches from the sea to a point on the river but a little distant from where the river enters the boundary of the county. The plaintiffs assert a right to divert from the river sufficient water to keep their ditch, which is alleged and found by the court below to be six feet wide at the bottom, eight feet wide at the top, and two feet deep, (grade not given,) flowing full at all times and seasons of the year; and in this asserted right the decree of the court below secures them, without regard to the quantity of water that may be left in the river when such a quantity is so diverted, and irrespective of the wants and the necessities of the owners of the Santiago de Santa Ana rancho, under and for whom the defendant asserts the right to divert a portion of the water of the said river. Counsel for the plaintiffs contend that the right thus asserted and adjudged them is founded (1) in grant; (2) upon prescription; (3) upon prior appropriation; and (4) upon an estoppel in pais.

It will be convenient to consider these grounds in their order.

1. Omitting details, the plaintiffs' title by grant rests—First, upon a deed executed September 1, 1857, by Bernardo Yorba, the then owner of the Rancho Canon de Santa Ana, to Juan Pacificus Ontiveras, the then owner of the lower rancho, San Juan y Cajon de Santa Ana; and, secondly, on two deeds executed September 12, 1857, by Ontiveras and wife to George Hansen and John Frohling,—the two last-named persons being the predecessors in interest of the plaintiffs. By the deed of September 1, 1857, Bernardo Yorba conveyed to Ontiveras, for the expressed consideration of $200, a right of way in and over a certain strip of the Rancho Canon de Santa Ana commencing at a point 100 varas below a dam in the river on his said rancho, "which leads a portion of the water of said river into a ditch running through a portion of said lands, and into and through a portion of the aforesaid lands of the said Juan Pacificus Ontiveras, (to wit, the Rancho San Juan y Cajon de Santa Ana,) and which is now used by him for irrigating a portion of said lands, and running from said point in a westerly direction to the boundary line of the Rancho Cajon de Santa Ana;" said strip of land to be sufficiently wide for the construction of a water ditch of capacity to hold and convey water sufficient to irrigate 1,200 acres of land, and for the passage of a man on horseback on either side of the ditch, for the purpose of inspecting and keeping it in order; "and also the right to construct a sufficient dam at the before-mentioned point in the said river in order to supply the said ditch with water for the uses and purposes above mentioned." By one of the aforesaid deeds of September 12, 1857, Ontiveras conveyed to Hansen and Frohling the same rights and interests conveyed to him by the aforesaid deed from Yorba; and by the other deed of September 12, 1857, Ontiveras conveyed to Hansen and Frohling 1,165 acres of the Rancho San Juan y Cajon de Santa Ana, afterwards and now known as the "Anaheim Tract;" "and also the right of way in and over a strip of land twelve varas wide, running through the said Rancho San Juan y Cajon de Santa Ana, for the purpose of making a ditch of capacity to carry water sufficient to irrigate the said piece of land; said ditch to be commenced at a point on the eastern boundary line of the aforesaid rancho, (San Juan y Cajon de Santa Ana,) which may be most convenient for the purpose, and to run as directly as the nature of the soil and the conformation of the ground will permit, to the said tract of 1,165 acres; and also the privilege of using so much of the water from the Santa Ana river as appertains to the said rancho (San Juan y Cajon de Santa Ana) for the purpose of irrigating the same, by virtue of the grant of said rancho by the former Mexican government, and by the laws and customs of the country at the time of such grant, and by virtue of the existing laws and customs as may be sufficient for the purpose of irrigating the aforesaid tract of 1,165 acres of land, together with the privilege of making such other ditches through the said rancho (San Juan y Cajon de Santa Ana) as may be necessary for irrigating and cultivating said tract of land." There can be no doubt that by the deed last mentioned Ontiveras conveyed to Hansen and Frohling the privilege of using so much of the water of the Santa Ana river as appertained to the Rancho San Juan y Cajon de Santa Ana as should be necessary for the irrigation of the Anaheim tract of 1,165 acres, provided the quantity of water appertaining to that rancho, and previously unconveyed by Ontiveras, was sufficient for that purpose. But, of course, this grant by Ontiveras could not affect any right of the owners of the Rancho Santiago de Santa Ana to the use of the water of the river.

It is said, however, that at the time of the execution of the deed from Yorba to Ontiveras of date September 1, 1857, Yorba was the owner of an undivided interest in the Rancho Santiago de Santa Ana, and that by his deed to Ontiveras he conveyed to him the right (subsequently vested in the predecessors of the plaintiffs) to divert sufficient of the water of the river for the irrigation of 1,200 acres of land upon the Rancho San Juan y Cajon de Santa Ana. It is not necessary to decide whether the deed of September 1, 1857, from Yorba to Ontiveras conveyed to the latter the right to divert any of the water of the river that pertained to the Rancho Canon de Santa Ana; for, while those who have succeeded to the rights of Yorba in that rancho were originally made defendants to this suit, the action was subsequently dismissed as to them, and the contest continued only as to those holding under the Santiago grant. Whatever else might be held with respect to the deed from Yorba to Ontiveras, we think it perfectly clear that no right to divert any of the water of the river that appertained to the Rancho Santiago was conveyed by it. The deed starts with the recital that, "whereas, the parties of the first part [Yorba and wife] are seised in fee of a certain rancho or tract of land called 'Canon de Santa Ana,' * * * lying on and near to the river, said river being one of its boundaries, and the said party of the second part [Ontiveras] being seised in fee of a certain tract of land called 'San Juan y Cajon de Santa Ana,' * * * bounding also on said river Santa Ana, and lying near to and below the lands of said Bernardo and Andrea Yorba: Now, therefore," etc., in consideration of $200, the grantors convey to Ontiveras the right of way over a strip of the Rancho Canon de Santa Ana, commencing and running as already described, sufficiently wide for the construction of a water ditch of capacity to hold and convey water sufficient for the irrigation of 1,200 acres of land, and also the right to construct a sufficient dam in the river at the point of commencement of the strip over which the right of way is conveyed in order to supply the said ditch with water for the irrigation of the 1,200 acres. There is no express grant in this deed by Yorba—and we speak of him as the grantor, because the court below found that, though his wife joined him in the deed, she had no interest in the property—of any right on the part of Ontiveras to divert any of the water of the river, and certainly no express grant of the privilege of diverting any of the water of the river that pertained to the grantor, as owner of an undivided interest in the Rancho Santiago de Santa Ana. Impliedly it undoubtedly recognized the right in Ontiveras to divert a part of the water, but it must be remembered that, by reason of his proprietorship of the Rancho San Juan y Cajon de Santa Ana, Ontiveras then possessed the right to divert such portion of the water of the river for the purposes of irrigation as appertained to his rancho. And the fact that he was then diverting a portion of the said water for that purpose is expressly recited in the deed; for by its terms the strip of the Canon rancho over which Yorba conveys to him the right of way for a ditch is made to commence at a point 100 varas below a dam in the river, on the Canon rancho, "which leads a portion of the water of said river into a ditch running through a portion of said lands, and into and through a portion of the aforesaid lands of the said Juan Pacificus Ontiveras, and which is now used by the said Juan Pacificus Ontiveras for irrigating a portion of his said lands." But no reference whatever is made in the deed to the Rancho Santiago. Irrigation upon that rancho, as well as upon the Ranchos Canon and Cajon, with the water of the river was then carried on, and had been carried on for many years. There was then, according to the findings of the court below, and continued to be until within a year or two prior to the commencement of this action in 1877, sufficient water flowing in the river to supply the wants of all the parties bordering on the stream. Under these circumstances, certainly, the owners of each of these were entitled to divert, for the purposes of irrigation upon their respective tracts, such portion of the water of the river as appertained to their respective ranchos, due regard being had to the rights of each and all the others. Ontiveras, as owner of the San Juan y Cajon de Santa Ana, was entitled to divert, for the purposes of irrigation upon his rancho, such portion of the water as rightly appertained thereto; and, in the deed by which he conveyed to Hansen and Frohling the Anaheim tract of 1,165 acres, he expressly granted to them the privilege of using so much of the water of the river appertaining to his rancho as should be sufficient for the irrigation of that tract. But in the deed from Yorba to Ontiveras, executed but a few days before, there is no such language. Yorba thereby conveyed to Ontiveras a right of way over his Rancho Canon for the construction of a ditch of capacity to hold and convey water sufficient for the irrigation of 1,200 acres of the Rancho San Juan y Cajon de Santa Ana, and also the right to construct a sufficient dam in the river at a designated point upon the Canon rancho in order to supply the ditch with water for the 1,200 acres. Whether the water thus to be diverted was the water that appertained to Ontiveras, as the owner of the Rancho San Juan y Cajon de Santa Ana, or water that appertained to Yorba, as the owner of the Rancho Canon de Santa Ana, need not be determined for the reason already assigned; but by no construction of the deed consistent with reason or authority can it be held to be any part of the water appertaining to the owners of the Rancho Santiago de Santa Ana, which is situated upon the opposite side of the river, and which is in no manner alluded to in the Yorba deed; and, even were this otherwise, it is clear that Yorba's deed could not affect the rights of the other owners of the Santiago rancho.

2. The title by prescription relied on by the plaintiffs is based on the fact found by the court below to the effect that from the 1st of January, 1858, until within a year or two prior to the commencement of this action, the plaintiffs, their predecessors, etc., quietly, openly, notoriously, and continuously appropriated, used, and enjoyed enough of the water of the river to keep their ditch, which was constructed in and over the strip of land described in the deed from Yorba to Ontiveras, flowing full to its utmost capacity at all times and seasons of the year, claiming the right and title so to do, adversely to the whole world, and so diverted, appropriated, used, and enjoyed the said water without let, hindrance, or objection by any person whomsoever; and that the owners of the Santiago rancho, with knowledge thereof, stood by and made no objection. But the court below also found that during the same time the water of the river was diverted, appropriated, used, and enjoyed by the owners of the Ranchos Santiago and Canon for the irrigation of their respective tracts, and, further, that while the diversion and use of the water by the respective parties, and upon the respective ranchos and tracts of land as stated in the findings, "has been done and claimed as of right, and claimed to be done adversely to all others, still, until within a year or two prior to the commencement of this action, there has been no interference of serious importance with the diversion or attempted diversion of any one by any of the others, there having prior to that time been sufficient water flowing in the river to supply the respective wants and demands of all the parties; but since then, that is, within a year or two prior to this suit, on account of the increased appropriations and diversions above the ditches of all the parties, water has become scarce and insufficient to supply the demands and necessities of all the parties; that, except as to noninterference and failure to object under the circumstances aforesaid, there has never been any acquiescence or consent to the use of water as to any person, party, or corporation, by the owners or claimants of any of the ranchos mentioned in these findings, or of any of the parties hereto or their predecessors or grantors; but ever since water has become scarce, as aforesaid, each party has respectively asserted, and at all times attempted, as best they could, to maintain, the rights as respectively claimed by them."

In the face of such facts as these, how can we be expected to hold that, as against the owners of the Santiago rancho, the plaintiffs have established any prescriptive right? In order to establish a right by prescription, the acts by which it is sought to establish it must operate as an invasion of the right of the party against whom it is set up. The enjoyment relied upon must be of such a character as to afford ground for an action by the other party. This is thoroughly settled. Now, it is very clear that, while there was sufficient water flowing in the river to supply the wants and demands of all the parties, its use by one would not be an invasion of any right of any other; and as the court below found, as a fact, that, until within a year or two prior to the commencement of the action, there was sufficient water flowing in the river to supply the wants and demands of all the parties, it is plain that the plaintiffs, as against the owners of the Santiago rancho, have acquired no right by prescription.

3. As against the owners of the Rancho Santiago, have the plaintiffs established a right to divert the water in question by reason of its prior appropriation and beneficial use? This claim of the plaintiffs is negatived by the facts found by the court below. As seen already, there was, according to the finding, sufficient water flowing in the river to supply the wants and demands of the owners of each of the ranchos mentioned, until within a year or two prior to the commencement of this action in 1877. It also appears from the record that from an early day irrigation with the water of the river was carried on upon the Rancho Santiago by its owners and their tenants. It was so carried on in 1857, when the conveyances from Ontiveras were made to the predecessors of the plaintiffs under which the plaintiffs' ditch was constructed, and sufficient of the water of the river diverted and appropriated to keep it flowing full to its utmost capacity at all times and seasons of the year, for the purpose of irrigating the Anaheim tract of 1,165 acres. But this appropriation by the predecessors of the plaintiffs was, according to the findings of the court below, neither prior to the use of the water of the river by the owners of the Santiago rancho, nor did it in any manner interfere with the use of it by the latter; for, according to the findings, there was then enough water flowing in the river to supply the wants and demands of all of the parties, and continued to be until within a year or two prior to 1877. As observed already, the court below found that, at the time of the purchase by the predecessors of the plaintiffs from Ontiveras in 1857, and for years before, the owners of the Santiago rancho were and had been using the water of the river for the irrigation of their rancho; but the court further found that prior to 1871 "said irrigation and cultivation were irregular both as to time and place, and also as to ditches, some years more and some years less, at one place one year and a different place another year, and during some years some of the ditches were not used, so that during some years not more than three irrigating heads, being each one hundred square inches under four inches pressure, were diverted and used during some years, and their ditches were often neglected and filled with weeds and dirt, and their capacity at times greatly diminished, and such was their condition in 1857." But that irrigation upon the Santiago rancho was, prior to 1871, "irregular, some years more and some years less, at one place one year and at a different place another year," and that during some years some of the ditches were not used, and other years some of them were neglected, is unimportant. The fact remains that the owners of the rancho did use the water of the river according to their wants and demands, and were so using three irrigating heads of it in 1857, and, further, there was at all times an abundant supply in the river for all parties until within a year or two prior to 1877. It may be added that while the court below found that the water diverted and appropriated by the predecessors of the plaintiffs in 1857, that is to say, sufficient of the water of the river to keep their ditch flowing full to its utmost capacity at all times and seasons of the year, for the purpose of irrigating the Anaheim tract of 1,165 acres, "was then, ever since has been, and now is, necessary for that purpose," it also found as a fact that the plaintiffs have sold water to parties on said Cajon rancho, outside of the Anaheim tract, "commencing about 1869, and gradually increasing said outside supply to about six hundred or eight hundred acres, except in very dry seasons, as existing at the time of the diversions complained of, when about all the water in the ditch is necessary for the Anaheim tract." These findings are not only inconsistent, but it certainly cannot be that water diverted and appropriated for the purpose of irrigating the Anaheim tract can be sold by the plaintiffs to supply other lands, to the injury of the owners of the Rancho Santiago, who, from a time long anterior to the purchase of the plaintiffs' predecessors, have been accustomed to use a portion of the water of the river for the irrigation of that rancho.

4. With respect to the estoppel relied on by the plaintiffs it is sufficient to say that, as the findings of the court below show that there was sufficient water flowing in the river in 1857 and for nearly 20 years thereafter to supply the wants and demands of the owners of each of the ranchos bordering on the stream, the owners of the Santiago rancho were neither called upon to object to the diversion and appropriation by the predecessors of the plaintiffs, nor had they any right to object thereto. No right of theirs was interfered with. Nor does it appear that there was any fraud, misrepresentation, or concealment of any kind practiced upon the predecessors of the plaintiffs by the owners of the Rancho Santiago. In a recent case we had occasion to quote with approval what was held here in the case of Boggs v. Mining Co., 14 Cal. 368: "There must be some degree of turpitude in the conduct of a party before a court of equity will estop him from the assertion of his title,—the effect of the estoppel being to forfeit his property and transfer its enjoyment to another." The findings in this case show that the scarcity of water in the river, that first made itself felt within a year or two prior to the commencement of this action, was caused by diversions made by parties above the highest ditch of any of the parties to this controversy. With the scarcity of the water arose disputes between the respective claimants. It is not strange that this was so, for in the region in question water for irrigation is essential to the proper cultivation and enjoyment of the land. Upon the Anaheim tract, as well as upon the Rancho Santiago, numerous and extensive and valuable vineyards and orchards have been raised with the aid of the water of this river. Its continued use is all-important to all parties concerned. The plaintiffs, by virtue of the purchase of their predecessors from Ontiveras, and their subsequent appropriation and use, are undoubtedly justly entitled to such portion of the water of the river appertaining to the Rancho San Juan y Cajon de Santa Ana as is sufficient for the proper irrigation of the Anaheim tract. Whether, if the portion of the water appertaining to that rancho is insufficient for that purpose, the plaintiffs are entitled to enough of the water of the river appertaining to the Rancho Canon de Santa Ana to make good the deficiency, by virtue of the deed from Yorba to Ontiveras, we cannot now decide, for the reason already explained. But as, for the reason already given, the plaintiffs have acquired no right to any portion of the water that appertains to the owners of the Rancho Santiago de Santa Ana, the decree of the court below which secures to the plaintiffs sufficient of the water of the river to keep their ditch flowing full to its utmost capacity at all times and seasons of the year, without regard to the quantity of water that may be left in the river after such diversion, and irrespective of the wants and necessities of the owners of the Rancho Santiago de Santa Ana, cannot be sustained. We must therefore reverse the judgment, and remand the cause for a new trial. In doing so, we think it not improper to suggest, in view of the value of the water in dispute and the large interests at stake, whether it is not advisable for the parties to the controversy to divide the water upon an equitable basis, and devote the money that may otherwise be expended in litigation in the proper development and judicious use of it.

Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

MYRICK, J., concurred.

THORNTON, J. I concur. I am of opinion that the plaintiffs have failed to make out any case for relief upon the grounds of prescription or estoppel in pais. The reasoning on these point in the opinion of Justice Ross is conclusive. On whatever rules the rights of the parties herein are to be admeasured, whether by the rules applicable to appropriation, or those applicable to the common-law doctrine of riparian rights, the rights of the parties are at least equal; neither has made out a claim superior to the other. There has never been any exclusive appropriation by plaintiffs prior to that of defendant, and the same may be said of the appropriation by defendant. I can see no exclusive appropriation by either party of the water of the stream, or any part of it. The use of the water has always been had by either party, with the observance of the right of the other to a reasonable use of it for irrigation. Under these circumstances, the parties must be held to have at least equal rights to use the water for the purpose indicated. The court, therefore, in adjudging that the plaintiffs have, under all circumstances, the right to have their ditch flow full of water to the exclusion of the defendant, has violated the equality of right above mentioned, and has fallen into an error for which the case must be tried anew. The foregoing, in my opinion, is the substance of the able and elaborate opinion of Justice Ross, and I therefore concur in it. It is apparent that no question is made, in this case, as to the right to the use of the water for domestic purposes, and of course nothing is herein ruled in that regard.

McKEE, J. The case as made out in the court below failed to establish an exclusive right of ownership, arising out of prescription or estoppel, in the water of the Santa Ana river, to the extent claimed by the plaintiffs. In my judgment, the rights of the respective parties originated in a riparian source, are held by them in common, and invest each with equal rights to the use and enjoyment of the water of the stream. Being held in common, it is well settled that in a controversy between such owners as to their rights it is the duty of a court of equity to determine the respective rights of the parties so as to give to each the just proportion to which he may be entitled, and, if necessary, regulate the use between them according to their rights. Lyon v. McLaughlin, 32 Vt. 423; Arthur v. Case, 1 Paige, 447; Belknap v. Trimble, 3 Paige, 601; Webber v. Gage, 39 N. H. 182; Bardwell v. Ames, 22 Pick. 353; Ballou v. Hopkinton, 4 Gray, 324; Roath v. Driscoll, 20 Conn. 535; Brown v. Ashley, 16 Nev. 311. That principle was not observed in the adjudication of this case, and I agree that the judgment should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

JUNKANS v. BERGIN.[1]

JUDGMENT—JOINT DEFENDANTS—SERVICE OF PROCESS—COLLATERAL ATTACK.

1. A judgment by default entered against defendant in a joint action, when one of defendants was not served with process, is void, under Code Civil Proc. § 585, which provides that judgment by default may be entered in such action where all the defendants have been served and have failed to answer.

THORNTON, J. This action was brought to quiet title, and judgment was rendered for plaintiff. Defendant's motion for a new trial was denied, and he appealed from the judgment and order denying the motion. The judgment roll in Whitmore & Reed v. Ah Hoe et al. was improperly admitted in evidence. The action was a joint one against all the defendants, Ah Hoe, Mon Kong, Ah Juan, Ah Sam, and Charlie Hop Lee. Ah Sam was never served with process, and the action was never dismissed as to him. The judgment was by default, and was entered by the clerk without any action of the court. The judgment was void. The clerk is only authorized to enter judgment by default, such as the one entered herein, when all the defendants have been served and have failed to answer. Section 585, Code Civil Proc. The clerk is a minister or servant of the law, to act in that state of the case in which the law orders him to act. Then only is his action valid. When the casus legis does not exist, his entry of judgment is void and of no avail. This very point was determined in Kelly v. Van Austin, 17 Cal. 565, 566, where, as here, the judgment was collaterally attacked. This ruling has been frequently approved. See cases cited in notes to Kelly v. Van Austin, above referred to, in the second edition of 17 Cal., issued in 1872. The court, therefore, erred in admitting the judgment roll and all the other documents in the case above mentioned. As the above is conclusive against the plaintiff's right to recover, it is unnecessary to pass on the other points made and argued. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

CRIMINAL LAW—PRELIMINARY EXAMINATION—INDORSEMENT OF COMMITMENT.

Pen. Code, § 872, provides that an examining magistrate shall indorse his commitment of defendant "on the deposition" taken at the examination. Held, where the deposition was taken in shorthand and written out afterwards, that an indorsement of commitment on the complaint was sufficient, under section 1404, providing that departures from modes prescribed in the Code shall be immaterial, unless they prejudice defendant's substantial rights.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Yolo county.

Information against James Young for murder. Verdict of guilty, and judgment thereon. Orders were made denying motion to set aside information, refusing a withdrawal of pleas, denying motion in arrest of judgment, and refusing a new trial. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Pen. Code Cal. § 872, provides, with respect to the examination of persons charged with crime, that, "if there is sufficient cause to believe the defendant guilty thereof, the magistrate must make or indorse on the deposition an order" committing the defendant, etc. Section 1404 provides that departures from forms or modes prescribed in the Penal Code shall be immaterial, unless they prejudice or tend to prejudice defendant's substantial rights. Const. Cal. art. 1, § 8, provides that no person shall be deprived of life or liberty without due process of law.

C. P. Sprague and F. S. Sprague, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Marshall and Dist. Atty. Craig, for the People.

MYRICK, J. 1. The district attorney filed an information accusing the defendant of the crime of murder. When the defendant was arraigned, and before pleading, he moved that the information be set aside, on the ground that he had not been committed as provided in section 872, Pen. Code, previous to the filing of the information. The motion was based on the following facts: A complaint was laid before a justice of peace, December 25, 1882, accusing the defendant of the commission of the crime; an examination was had before the justice on the 5th of January, 1883; and, upon such examination being had, the justice made an indorsement upon the complaint, stating that it appeared to him that the offense had been committed, and that there was sufficient cause to believe the defendant, Young, guilty thereof, and ordering that he be held to answer the same, and that he be committed to the sheriff of the county; which indorsement was signed by the justice. This complaint, with the indorsement thereon, was filed in the superior court, January 8th. The information was thereafter, on the same day, filed. At the examination before the justice, the official shorthand reporter took down the evidence in shorthand, and subsequently wrote it out in longhand, and the depositions so taken and written out were indorsed, certified, and filed in the superior court, January 12th, four days after the filing of the information. The motion to set aside was made January 15th, and was denied by the court. We see no departure from any form or mode prescribed by the Penal Code, in respect to the proceedings narrated above, which prejudiced the defendant, or tended to his prejudice, in respect to a substantial right. Section 1404, Pen. Code. Before the information was filed, an examination had been had and commitment made by a magistrate, (section 8, art. 1, Const.;) the order of commitment, proper in form, being indorsed on the complaint. This was sufficient. People v. Smith, 59 Cal. 365.

2. The killing of the deceased by the defendant being admitted, whether or not the act was done in self-defense, or under circumstances of justification, was for the jury to determine. We see no error in the record. Judgment and order affirmed.

CORNELL v. CORBIN et al.[1]

SALE OF MINE—FRAUD OF VENDOR—FORMATION OF CORPORATION—FORECLOSURE OF MORTGAGE—PARTIES.

1. The vendor and vendee of a mine agreed that the vendee should convey the mine to a corporation to be formed, and that the vendor should receive a part of the stock of such corporation in part payment of the price of the mine. The corporation was formed, and the conveyance made by the vendee. No stock was actually issued. Held, in an action by the vendor's assignee to foreclose a mortgage given by the vendee (defendant) to secure the price, that the formation of the corporation in question did not prevent defendant from setting up as a defense the fraudulent representations of the vendor in the sale of the mine. SHARPSTEIN, J., dissenting.

2. In such case the corporation in question was properly made a defendant to the action.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Plumas county.

Action by L. Cornell against Frank Corbin and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

J. D. Goodwin, D. W. Jenks, John C. Hall, and Arthur Rodgers, for appellants.

W. S. Goodfellow and R. H. F. Variel, for respondent.

MYRICK, J. This is an action to foreclose a mortgage alleged to be held by the plaintiff, assignee of George P. Cornell, for $25,000, to whom the notes and mortgages were executed by the defendants Corbin and Handy. The date of the assignment to plaintiff, as stated in the complaint, is a day subsequent to the maturity of the notes. The complaint alleges that the defendant corporation has some interest in the mortgaged premises subject to the mortgage. During the pendency of the proceedings the complaint was amended by stipulation, by striking out the name of the defendant Corbin in the prayer that judgment for deficiency be docketed. The defendants Corbin and the Indian Valley Mining Company answered, denying the assignment to plaintiff, and that she is, or ever was, the owner of the notes or mortgage. For a further defense, and by way of set-off, the same defendants, in their answer, averred in substance, among other matters, the following: George P. Cornell, being the owner of the undivided one half of a mine, undertook to obtain title to the other undivided one half, and to convey the mine to Handy and Corbin upon the payment to him by them of $100,000, he (Cornell) to have a certain amount of the stock of a corporation to be thereafter organized. The agreement as to the payment was subsequently modified so as to make the payment to be, money, $50,000, and $50,000 by notes and mortgage. (The two notes in suit are for the last $25,000, the first note for $25,000 having been paid.) The answer contains averments of specific acts of fraud on the part of Cornell and Handy, by and through which Corbin was induced to join in the purchase and to pay two thirds of the first payment of $50,000, and to expend $50,000 in the working of the mine. It is averred that it was agreed, as parts of the transaction, that Handy and Corbin should proceed to the eastern states, and procure a corporation to be organized, and that the mine should be conveyed by Corbin and Handy to such corporation, and each of the parties, Cornell, Corbin, and Handy, to have named proportions of the shares of the stock. In pursuance of this arrangement, the defendant the Indian Valley Mining Company was incorporated, and, after the execution of the notes and mortgage for $50,000, the mine was conveyed to it. No stock of the corporation has been issued, but the parties still retain their respective interests as agreed upon. For the purposes of this decision we regard the assignment of the notes and mortgage in suit from George P. Cornell to the plaintiff, his wife, as having been made after maturity, and without value, and that the plaintiff must be regarded as George P. Cornell would have been regarded. We also deem the acts of fraud averred in the answer to be sufficient to justify relief if Corbin and Handy still retained the title to the mine, and were the only defendants. The question, then, for consideration is, has the creation of the corporation, and the conveyance to it of the title, since the execution of the mortgage, so far changed the relations of the parties to each other and to the property as that no relief can be afforded?

The plaintiff asserts: (1) As to the defendant Corbin, by the complaint as amended, no judgment was sought against him which could in any way operate to the injury of his legal rights. By reason of his conveyance to the corporation he had no estate or interest in the land which could be affected by the decree. He had no interest in the controversy, and was not, therefore, in a position, either in his own behalf or jointly with the corporation, to set up matters of defense as alleged in the answer. (2) In respect of the corporation, such title as it has was acquired subsequent, and is subject and subordinate, to the mortgage. The corporation, therefore, in effect, acquired such interest in the property as would remain after satisfying the mortgage. In this view, the foreclosure proceeding is not an attack upon its property rights, and it cannot deny the validity of the debt. Whatever may have been the fraudulent practices of Cornell and Handy upon Corbin, the corporation has had no dealings with Cornell, and it has no counterclaim or offset, nor any damage to recoup. It might, perhaps, be conceded that, if the corporation was an independent existence, having no relation to the parties or their purposes or agreements, these assertions would be entitled to weight; but in cases like the present a court of equity reaches beyond the form and shadow of things, and grasps the substance. In this case the formation of the corporation was a part of the transaction at its inception, and its existence was used to carry out the plan. We can repeat, with reference to the facts of this case, what was said by this court with reference to the facts in Shorb v. Beaudry, 56 Cal. 446, that the corporation was formed as a mere agency for more conveniently carrying out the agreements between the parties is sufficiently apparent. As a corporation, it paid nothing, and incurred no liability. The profits, if any, would be distributed among the three parties in the proportion to the shares of stock held by them according to the contract. No certificates of stock had been issued, but the ownership of the shares remains in first hands The relation which the corporation sustained to Cornell, Handy, and Corbin was substantially, if not technically, that of a trustee. Substantial justice can be administered in this case by treating the parties in the light of their agreements between themselves, independently of their incorporation, and in no other way that we have been able to discover can this be done. Corbin, by means of fraudulent representations made by Cornell and Handy, was induced to enter into a contract whereby he was to pay, and in pursuance of which he did pay, $33,000. It was further agreed that, in consideration that Cornell should convey the mine (through Corbin and Handy) to a corporation to be formed, the corporation should, in effect, assume a mortgage to Cornell for $50,000, $25,000 whereof has been paid. Corbin, in consideration of his assent that the deed should be made to the corporation, (through him and Handy,) and that the corporation should pay the amount secured by the mortgage in order to relieve its assets of the lien, was to receive a certain share of the stock of the corporation. When formed, the corporation became a party to the agreement. The fraud practiced on Corbin was the inducing him to receive, in return for his money, a share of the stock of the corporation laden with the lien of the mortgage. If he has a right to relief at all, by way of recoupment, by reason of the fraud, he can seek it only by asking that the assets of the corporation (and thus his shares of the stock therein) be relieved of the balance of the mortgage. Admitting that his stock is personal property, and that he has no equitable estate in the land conveyed to the corporation, will equity refuse him help for that reason? In Jones v. Bolles, 9 Wall. 364, it was held that a stockholder could enjoin the setting up of a claim for purchase money against the lands of a company (corporation) whose capital stock was divided into shares, the vendor having induced the stockholder to take the stock by a promise not to assert his claim for the purchase money. The effect of the foreclosure of plaintiff's mortgage against the company must be to depreciate the value of Corbin's stock. The answer shows that Corbin owned all the stock except that belonging to Cornell and that claimed by Handy. The corporation was a proper party, because—First, it held legal title to the mine; and, secondly, it was a proper party to the answer of Corbin, although the relief prayed for was in its favor. Jones v. Bolles, supra. The judgment is reversed, with instructions to overrule the demurrer to the answer of the defendants Corbin and the Indian Valley Mining Company.

McKinstry, Ross, and Thornton, JJ., concurred.

Sharpstein, J. I dissent. It appears that the mortgage sought to be foreclosed was executed by the defendants Corbin and Handy to plaintiff's assignor, G. P. Cornell, and that after the execution of the mortgage, and before the commencement of this action, the mortgagors conveyed the mortgaged premises to the defendant corporation. That being so, I think it to be well settled that the defendant who took and holds the premises subject to the prior mortgage is estopped from questioning the consideration or validity of it. Freeman v. Auld, 44 N. Y. 50. In New York it was repeatedly held that one who took title subject to a usurious mortgage, which by a statute of that state was absolutely void, was estopped from questioning its validity. Sands v. Church, 6 N. Y. 347; Murray v. Judson, 9 N. Y. 73; Hartley v. Harrison, 24 N. Y. 170; Dix v. Van Wyck, 2 Hill, 522. And I think it equally clear that the defendant Corbin, one of the mortgagors, after conveying his entire interest in the mortgaged premises to the defendant corporation, cannot in this action attack the validity of the mortgage on the ground that it was obtained from him through fraud. No personal judgment is sought against him for any deficiency there may be after applying the property to the debt. The pleadings show that he had no title or interest in the mortgaged premises to be affected by the decree. His being a stockholder in the defendant corporation would not in any conceivable case entitle him to set up a defense which the corporation could not. Nor do I think that he could have the matters set up in the cross complaint, which the court refused him leave to file, litigated in this action. The relief which he demanded was a judgment against his codefendant Handy for the sum of $300,000, and to have the plaintiff adjudged to be an involuntary trustee of the notes and mortgage executed by him (Corbin) and Handy for the benefit of him, (Corbin.) In the language of Comstock, C. J., in Insurance Co. v. McKay, 21 N. Y. 191: "I do not see that anything was in litigation between him and the plaintiff, or that any judgment could be rendered against him, except one for costs for interposing a groundless defense to the suit. According to the answer, no cause of action existed against him. The complaint claimed nothing against him personally, and stated no facts as the foundation of such a decree. The answer showed that he had no title or interest in the mortgaged premises to be affected by the decree." The plaintiff seeks to have the mortgage foreclosed, and alleges facts sufficient to entitle her to that relief. The only other party interested in the question is the defendant who purchased the mortgaged premises subject to the mortgage. I am unable to discover how defendant Corbin, who, according to his answer, has no interest in the mortgaged premises, can thrust himself into a case in which the sole question is whether the plaintiff is entitled to a judgment which will affect nothing except the mortgaged premises. How he is going to litigate in this action the question whether he has been defrauded by his codefendant Handy, and other persons who are not parties to the action, is to me incomprehensible. If Chater v. Sugar Refinery Co., 19 Cal. 220, or Shorb v. Beaudry, 56 Cal. 446, sustains the contention of the appellants, I must confess my inability to see it. I am unable to discover that any such question was involved or considered in either of those cases. I think the judgment and order appealed from should be affirmed.

SWAMP-LAND DISTRICT NO. 121 v. HAGGIN.[1]

(Supreme Court of California. Dec. 27, 1882.)

SWAMP LANDS—DRAINAGE—ACTION FOR ASSESSMENTS.

In an action by a swamp-land district to recover reclamation assessments, the complaint averred that the district had been a corporation since 1870, and was established by order of the county board of supervisors. Held, that these averments showed that the district acquired its rights under Act 1868, and as this was before the adoption of the Political Code, under the provisions of which the action was brought, a demurrer to the complaint was properly sustained.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Kern county.

Action by swamp-land district No. 121 against James B. Haggin to enforce an assessment levied for purposes of reclamation. From an order sustaining a demurrer to the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Stetson & Houghton, for appellant. Louis T. Haggin, for respondent.

McKINSTRY, J. The action is brought to enforce liens for assessments upon tracts of land belonging to defendant within a swamp-land district. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained in the court below, and, plaintiff having declined to amend, final judgment was entered in favor of defendant, from which judgment plaintiff has appealed. It is contended by respondent that it appears in the complaint the district was created and organized under the act of March 28, 1868, while the further averments show that the assessments were attempted to be made under the provisions of the Political Code. Inasmuch as it is not alleged that plaintiff was organized under section 3478 of the Political Code, the demurrer was properly sustained, if respondent correctly construes the complaint. Reclamation Dist. v. Kennedy, 58 Cal. 124. The averments of the complaint with reference to the creation and existence of plaintiff as a reclamation district are as follows: "That, as plaintiff is informed and believes, plaintiff, swamp-land district number one hundred and twenty-one, is, and ever since the 22d day of December, 1870, has been, a municipal corporation, to wit, a swamp-land district, or reclamation district, created, organized, and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of California, claiming in good faith to be a corporation, and a swamp-land or reclamation district, and as such doing business and exercising corporate powers, and the powers of a swamp-land district, under the laws of the state of California; that said district was established by an order of the board of supervisors of the county of Kern, in the state of California, which order, as plaintiff is informed and believes, was duly given and made," etc.

No force can be given to the allegation that plaintiff claimed "in good faith" to be a corporation. It is urged by appellant, however, that, if it was a corporation de facto when the assessment was levied, defendant can neither object that it had no legal existence, nor that the assessment was not levied in accordance with the statute in force, and applicable to the particular district. But the action is not brought to determine the right of plaintiff to property owned by it in ordinary proprietorship, or to enforce a contract entered into with a third person. It is an attempt to enforce a burden imposed in invitum upon the property of another, and can be maintained only in case the authority to impose it was conferred by statute. 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. (3d Ed.) 763, 769. If the mode of levying the assessment must be found in the statute, and if the mode differs in case the corporation was formed under one statute from that which may be pursued by a corporation formed under another statute, it would seem to follow that a complaint is insufficient unless it appears from it that the corporation was formed under the law which authorizes the levy of the assessment in the manner in which it is alleged to have been levied. The power is measured by the mode, since the statute under which the corporation exists limits the exercise of the power to the mode therein provided. The right to proceed under any particular act is jurisdictional, and must be pleaded. Reclamation Dist. v. Kennedy, supra.

But here it appears affirmatively that the corporation was organized under the act of 1868. It is said by appellant, the averment that the reclamation district was "established" by order of the board of supervisors is not the equivalent of an averment that plaintiff was incorporated by such order, and that the board alone could not incorporate a district. Further, that the averment of corporate existence "ever since December, 1870," is immaterial; the only material allegation being that the district, existing as a corporation, levied an assessment. But this is a refinement which we cannot recognize as relieving the plaintiff of the natural purport of the words employed. There are manifest and apparently sufficient averments that the district was established by an order of the board of supervisors "duly given and made," and that the plaintiff has been a corporation since December 22, 1870. The district, therefore, was established by order of the board of supervisors; that is, the judgment of the board, which, followed by other statutory steps, clothed the district with the powers of a corporation, was had and made prior to the adoption of the Political Code. The order was made while the act of 1868 was in force, and prior to the adoption of the Political Code there was no statute under which the board of supervisors could make such an order, except the act of 1868. It would seem plain that the averments of the complaint, fairly construed, show the plaintiff to have acquired the rights of a corporation as a swamp-land district under the act of 1868. The averments with respect to the mode of assessments are unmistakably averments of the acts required by the Political Code. The complaint follows exactly the language of section 3456 et seq. of that Code concerning the levying of assessments. It would extend this opinion unnecessarily to enter into details, but a comparison of the averments of the complaint with the act of 1868, and with the Political Code, clearly shows that, wherever the requirements of the former differ from those of the latter, the act of 1868 has been ignored.

It is urged by appellant that the district may claim to exist under the act of March 27, 1874, (St. 1873-74, p. 721.) That act recognizes the existence of the district, but does not in terms refer its origin to any particular act of the legislature. It does, however, in express terms, require that swamp-land district No. 116 (claimed by plaintiff to be the district now known as No. 121) shall have an extended time to complete its works of reclamation "in accordance with an act to provide for the management and sale of the lands belonging to the state, approved March 28, 1868."

Judgment affirmed.

ON REHEARING.

(September, 28, 1883.)

Ross, J. For the reasons given in the opinion delivered when this case was last before this court, (10 Pac. Coast Law J. 604,) the judgment of the court below must be affirmed. It is true, as said by counsel for appellant, that the district in question in the case entitled "Reclamation Dist. v. Kennedy," 58 Cal. 124, referred to in the opinion then delivered, was formed under a law in force prior to May 28, 1868, and could have reorganized (but did not) under the provisions of the Political Code, while the present appellant was formed under the act approved March 28, 1868, and was not permitted by the provisions of the Political Code to reorganize thereunder. But it is obvious that, if it be true that the act of 1868 was unrepealed by the provisions of the Political Code, the applicability of the Kennedy Case to the one at bar is strengthened by the circumstance alluded to by counsel. In Reclamation Dist. v. Goldman, 61 Cal. 205, it was distinctly decided that the act of 1868, in relation to the reclamation of swamp and overflowed lands, was not repealed by the provisions of the Political Code. It is now suggested that that decision is in conflict with the case entitled "Hagar v. Board," 51 Cal. 474. There is an apparent, but no real, conflict between the two cases. In Hagar's Case the question was as to the validity of an order made by the board of supervisors appointing commissioners to levy an additional assessment to pay for work which had already been done. After referring to sections 33 and 34 of the act of 1868, the learned justice who delivered the opinion of the court erroneously said that the law as there written so remained up to the time of the adoption of the Political Code; and, taking up the amendment to section 3459 of that Code, enacted March 30, 1874, by which authority was given for the levy of an additional assessment to pay for work which had already been done, as well as that which was to be done, sustained the validity of the order of the board of supervisors. Attention does not seem to have been attracted to the fact that by an act approved March 28, 1872, (St. 1871-72, p. 668,) section 34 of the act of 1868 was so amended as to authorize an additional assessment to pay for work which had already been done, as well as for that which was to be done. Indeed, the amendment of March 28, 1872, to the act of 1868, and the amendment of March 30, 1874, to the Political Code, are identical in substance, and almost in form. The language, therefore, upon which the decision in Hagar's Case was based, was a part of the act of 1868, under which the district then before the court was organized. The statement in the opinion in that case, to the effect that the provisions of the Political Code had superseded the act of 1868, was therefore not only unnecessary to the decision of the case, but was based on a misapprehension of fact. In Goldman's Case the question was distinctly presented whether or not the act of 1868 was repealed by the provisions of the Political Code, and it was held that it was not. Strength is given to the conclusion there reached by section 3478 of the Political Code, which reads: "Districts formed under laws in force prior to May 28, 1868, may reorganize under the provisions of this chapter," to wit, chapter 1, tit. 8, Pol. Code. Express grant of authority to districts formed under laws in force prior to May 28, 1868, to reorganize under the provisions of the Political Code, may fairly be taken as somewhat indicative of the intent on the part of the legislature to exclude districts formed under laws subsequent to the date named from that privilege; and when, in addition, provision was inserted in the Political Code by which, as was held in the Goldman Case, the act of 1868 was continued in force, the question must be regarded as settled.

There is nothing in People v. Haggin, 57 Cal. 579, at all inconsistent with what is here said, or with what was said in Reclamation Dist. v. Goldman. In People v. Haggin the counsel for the plaintiff distinctly stated in their brief that the action was brought under and pursuant to the provisions of the Political Code to collect an assessment levied thereunder, and the court, accepting the statement of counsel in that behalf as true, proceeded to point out the difference between the provisions of the Political Code and the act of 1868, in so far as the point then under consideration was concerned, and rightly held that actions brought under the provisions of the Code to collect an assessment levied thereunder must be brought in the name of the real party in interest, to wit, the reclamation district. There is, we repeat, no conflict between the cases alluded to by counsel, except an apparent one between the Goldman and Haggin Cases, which, however, is not real, as has already been shown. Judgment affirmed.

Hubert v. Mendheim.[1]

Official Bonds — Improper Payee — Deputy Treasurer — Re-election of Treasurer — Liability of Sureties.

1. A bond for the faithful discharge of his duties, executed by a deputy county treasurer to the treasurer, and not to the state, as required by Pol. Code, § 958, which declares that official bonds must be made payable to the state, is nevertheless an official bond, and may be sued on as such under section 963, providing that, if an official bond does not contain the conditions required by law, the party and sureties are equitably bound to the state or a party interested.

2. Under Pol. Code, § 963, which provides that, if an official bond is defective in not containing the conditions required by law, a party interested may by action suggest the defect, and recover against the officer and his sureties, it is a sufficient suggestion of the defect to attach a copy of the bond to the complaint in an action on the bond.

3. Under Pol. Code, § 878, which provides that an office of which the duration is not fixed by law is held at the pleasure of the appointing power, the continuance in office of a deputy during the second term of the official who originally appointed him is equivalent to a reappointment.

4. A county treasurer appointed a deputy, who executed an official bond, and the county treasurer, being re-elected, continued the deputy in office. Held, under Pol. Code, § 959, providing that an official bond is obligatory during the time the officer discharges the duties of or holds the office, in an action against the sureties, that the bond was not a continuing obligation, and did not extend to breaches committed after the expiration of the first term of the treasurer.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Charles Hubert against H. Mendheim, surety upon an official bond. From a judgment sustaining a demurrer to complaint, plaintiff appeals. Reversed in part.

J. P. Hoge, for appellant. Cope & Boyd and Lloyd & Wood, for respondent.

McKinstry, J. The objection taken under the demurrer to the third cause of action as stated in the complaint is that the bond therein mentioned is not an official bond, and is therefore void. The objection to the first and second counts is that they do not allege moneys to have been misappropriated by Cassebohm, deputy, during the term for which he was appointed deputy; it being averred that plaintiff was treasurer for more than one term. It is not necessary to decide that the bond is good as a common-law obligation. It is proper to observe, however, that it is by no means a corollary from the proposition that plaintiff might have been compelled by mandamus to require an official bond from his deputy that a private obligation of defendant, which he chose for a consideration to assume, would be void. No principle of public policy would seem to prohibit an officer from requiring for his personal protection security beyond the official bond, which protects also the state and third persons.

1. We think the third count of the complaint contains a statement of a cause of action. The demurrer to the third count, as well as the general demurrer to the whole complaint, should have been overruled. If the bond sued on is an official bond, the obligors are bound to the extent and to the persons that others are bound who execute official bonds. Nor, in presence of the averments of the complaint, at least, can the plaintiff add to the liability of the defendant by treating the instrument as a common-law bond. The sections of the Political Code which bear upon the point presented under the demurrer to the third count of the complaint are as follows: "Sec. 958. All official bonds must be in form joint and several, and made payable to the state of California in such penalty, and with such conditions, as required by this chapter, or the law creating and regulating the duties of the office. Sec. 959. Every official bond executed by any officer pursuant to law is in force and obligatory upon the principal and sureties therein for any and all breaches of the conditions thereof committed during the time such officer continues to discharge any of the duties of or hold the office, and whether such breaches are committed or suffered by the principal officer, his deputy, or clerk. Sec. 960. Every such bond is in force and obligatory upon the principal and sureties therein for the faithful discharge of all duties which may be required of such officer by any law enacted subsequently to the execution of such bond, and such condition must be expressed therein. Sec. 961. Every official bond executed by any officer pursuant to law is in force and obligatory upon the principal and sureties therein to and for the state of California, and to and for the use and benefit of all persons who may be injured or aggrieved by the wrongful act or default of such officer in his official capacity; and any person so injured or aggrieved may bring suit on such bond, in his own name, without an assignment thereof. Sec. 962. No such bond is void on the first recovery of a judgment thereon; but suit may be afterwards brought, from time to time, and judgment recovered thereon, by the state of California, or by any person to whom a right of action has accrued, against such officer and his sureties, until the whole penalty of the bond is exhausted. Sec. 963. Whenever an official bond does not contain the substantial matter or conditions required by law, or there are any defects in the approval or filing thereof, it is not void so as to discharge such officer and his sureties; but they are equitably bound to the state or party interested; and the state or such party may, by action in any court of competent jurisdiction, suggest the defect in the bond, approval, or filing, and recover the proper and equitable demand or damages from such officer and the persons who intended to become and were included as sureties in such bond." "Sec. 985. Every officer or body appointing a deputy, clerk, or subordinate officer may require an official bond to be given by the person appointed, and may fix the amount thereof." All the sections of the Political Code above recited, except section 985, are re-enactments of provisions of the statute of 1850, which were in force when the decisions were made by the supreme court of the state,—hereinafter cited,—to the effect that, where an officer is chosen for two successive terms, his bond given at the commencement of his first term only covers his conduct during such term.

The bond executed by Cassebohm is none the less an official bond because it is made payable to plaintiff, and not to the state of California. Section 963. Every bond demanded of and given by a deputy for the faithful discharge of his duties (however, in other respects, it may fail to comply with the form directed by the Code) is an official bond. It may be sued as such by the state or any person interested, and the same damages recovered as if there were no defects of form. Section 963. True, section 963 directs that the plaintiff shall "suggest the defect in the bond." But the bond, although it "does not contain the substantial matter or conditions required by law," is nevertheless an official bond. Section 963. Of course, the words last quoted do not authorize the courts to change a writing entirely irrelevant into an official bond. The writing as to which the suggestion is to be made must be a bond given by an officer or his deputy to secure the discharge of his duties. But, being such, it is an official bond. Any defect in its form must appear on the face of the instrument. The action provided for in section 963 is not a bill to reform the instrument so as to make it conform to the provisions of the Code. It is only necessary that the defect be suggested, and thereupon, if the breach is proved, the court is authorized to render a judgment, precisely as if the bond conformed in every respect to the statutory requirements. Conceding, for the purpose of the argument, that the suggestion of the defect should be made in the complaint, the mere omission of a formal averment that the plaintiff "suggests" that the bond is defective, in that it is not in terms made payable to the state of California, authorizes neither the plaintiff nor defendant, in the case at bar, to deny that the bond is an official bond. If the section of the Code requires a technical suggestion on the record with reference to the defect, for the purpose of calling the attention of the court to it, no particular form of words is necessary to accomplish that object. It is difficult to suppose that a sufficient complaint could be framed in an action brought for damages arising from the breach of the bond, which would not suggest its defects in form; since in every such action the bond should be set forth in hæc verba, or its substantial parts averred in their legal effect. However this may be, in the case at bar a copy of the bond is attached to the complaint. By the record the attention of the court was called to the fact that the bond sued on was an official bond, defective as to certain matters of form. By thus suggesting the defect in form, the plaintiff, a person injured by the default of Cassebohm, and authorized to bring suit upon his official bond, is estopped from claiming that the bond is not an official bond. On the other hand, the defendant cannot say the bond is unofficial, because he has executed an instrument which could be and has been declared upon as an official bond, and which he must have known could be so declared upon when he executed it.

2. The bond being an official bond, do the first and second counts of the complaint, respectively, state a cause of action? By section 4112 of the Political Code the treasurer is authorized to appoint as many deputies as he may deem necessary, but it would seem that provision has been made by law for the payment of salaries to but two deputies. Act 1869-70, p. 122. Section 878 of the Political Code refers to deputies, as well as to principal officers whose appointment is not elsewhere provided for. In section 876 deputies are called "subordinate officers." Section 878 reads: "Sec. 878. Every office of which the duration is not fixed by law is held at the pleasure of the appointing power." The power of appointing deputies, however, is in the principal officer, and not in the man; and the official existence, past and present, of the principal officer must be regarded, during a term, as limited by the commencement and end of such term. The powers of the principal officer, including his power to appoint, must be regarded during a term, as in like manner limited. If the principal officer is chosen for a second term, he is not, during the second term, the appointing power which nominated deputies during the first term, any more than would another person if elected to the second term constitute the appointing power which had named the deputies of his predecessor in office. If the same man shall be elected for two successive terms, and shall retain into the second term a deputy appointed for the first,—even without formal reappointment in writing or requiring of him a second bond,—he (the officer) must be held to have reappointed the deputy, and may then indulge the pleasure of removing him, because, under section 878, the second appointment of the deputy, like the first, is at the pleasure of the appointing power. The deputy of an executive officer is an assistant empowered by law to act in the name of the officer. He is appointed by the principal officer, but his authority is derived from the statute which permits his appointment. His functions are those of the officer in whose stead he discharges them. He is not the private agent of the individual who holds the office. So far as we are informed, it has been the uniform practice—certainly it is the duty—of the ingoing officer, if he desires to continue any deputy of his predecessor, to reappoint him. A contract extends only to the things concerning which it appears the parties intended to contract. Upon his re-election to the office of treasurer the plaintiff was required to give a new official bond, and the deputy whom he continued in place should also have been required to give a new official bond. Both the plaintiff and defendant knew this when the bond before us was executed. It cannot be presumed that defendant contemplated the plaintiff's probable re-election, and, in case of re-election, that plaintiff would fail to demand new security of his deputy, and thereupon defendant be bound by the instrument he had executed as a continuing obligation. Suppose, at the commencement of the second term, Cassebohm, on demand of plaintiff, had given a new official bond, would defendant still be bound by the present instrument for subsequent wrong conduct of the deputy? Why not? The execution of the second would not of itself operate as a substitute for the first, and release the defendant. If the law does not authorize two official bonds, covering the same period of time, and if the first covered the second term, the last, and not the first, would be invalid as an official bond. The argument would lead to the result that an officer who "succeeds himself" cannot demand a new bond from a deputy whom he may desire to continue in place. The legislature did not intend that the officer who is commanded to require of his deputy an official bond, and "to fix the amount thereof," should employ his discretion in that regard by reference to the possible employment of the deputy for an indefinite period beyond the expiration of his own present term. Experience has shown that he can hardly hope he will himself continue to be the recipient of popular favor for more than a single term.

In Virginia the term of office of the sheriff was one year. The condition of a bond given the sheriff by a deputy recited that he had undertaken the duties of deputy "for and during the term the sheriff may continue in office." It was a common-law undertaking, and not an official bond. CARR, J., said: "The contract of the sheriff and his deputy, being a private contract, not regulated as to its continuance by law, might be for more than one year,"—the sheriff having been reappointed, and the deputy continuing to act as such; and added: "The question is whether the parties intended to be bound for only one year." No opinion was rendered in Royster v. Leake, 2 Munf. 280, but it was apparently held that a bond reciting, "If, therefore, the said James Vaughn, [a deputy sheriff] shall truly and faithfully discharge," etc., "during the time of his continuance in office of deputy sheriff," etc., bound the obligors for acts done by the deputy during a second term of the sheriff. But the marginal epitome of the case is not well expressed. The bond was dated November 15, 1802, and conditioned for the faithful performance of his duty by the deputy "during his continuance in office until November court, 1804." See note to Munford v. Rice, 6 Munf. 81. And the same court, in the case just cited, held that a deputy sheriff's bond, conditioned for faithful performance, etc., "during his continuance in office," without specifying the length of time, was binding for the transactions of one year only. Munford v. Rice was followed in Tyler v. Nelson's Adm'x, 14 Grat. 214.

In North Carolina, where the sheriff's term was one year, a sheriff was reappointed, and continued to serve several successive years, retaining the same deputy. At the commencement of the first term the deputy gave bond for faithful conduct, etc., "during his continuance in office." The supreme court said: "A deputation of necessity expires with the office on which it depends," and held that the words "during," etc., should be restricted to the first year. Banner v. McMurray, 1 Dev. 218. The same thing was decided in Thomas v. Summey, 1 Jones, Law, 554.

In Curling v. Chalkeen, 3 Maule & S. 502, decided in 1815, it was held that a bond given by a collector appointed by the church wardens and parishioners of a certain parish covered any misconduct of the collector while he remained such. Lord ELLENBOROUGH said: "I find nothing to show that his appointment is to have an annual commencement, or is to terminate at the expiration of the year." And, LE BLANC, J., pointed out that the collector was not the deputy of any annual officer; and, further, that he did not derive his appointment from any annual officer.

In Leadly v. Evans, however, decided in 1824, it was adjudged that the bond of a collector appointed by the church wardens and overseers of a parish, pursuant to an order of the vestry, (the church wardens and overseers being annual officers,) which was conditioned for his producing to them "and their successors" a just and true account, did not make the sureties liable for any sum collected after the expiration of a year. 9 Moore, 102.

Hughes v. Miller, 5 Johns, 167, is worthy of much consideration, because the decision in that case has the sanction of the honored name of Chief Justice KENT. There the bond was given to the sheriff by a deputy, conditioned for the due execution of the office of deputy sheriff during his continuance in such office. The sheriff, having taken on himself the office on the 16th of September, 1801, pursuant to an appointment in August, was reappointed in March, 1803. The defendant pleaded that the sheriff had sustained no damages in consequence of any act of defendant previous to his taking upon himself the office under his reappointment in 1803. It was held the plea was no answer to the declaration. The court said the deputy was equally in office as such after as before the reappointment of the plaintiff; that the deputy had no concern with the renewal of the plaintiff's commission so long as there was an unbroken continuation of the plaintiff's authority. As we have seen, this view of the question does not accord with that taken by other courts. But it is enough to say that the bond was not an official bond, and the decision simply interprets a private contract, holding that the parties intended that the obligors should be bound during the time the deputy continuously acted as such.

In the case before us the bond is an official bond, and an official bond is given for and has reference to a particular official term. People v. Aikenhead, 5 Cal. 106; Brown v. Lattimore, 17 Cal. 93. Here there is a recital that the plaintiff "treasurer" has appointed Cassebohm deputy, and has required him to file a bond in a certain sum, which should be referred to the requirement commanded by section 985 of the Political Code. A treasurer cannot appoint a deputy to hold for a longer term than his own. If the treasurer shall be re-elected, and the deputy continue, the retention of the latter by the former may be construed, as against the treasurer, to be a reappointment, but the deputy holds his place by virtue of the implied reappointment, and not under his original appointment. The condition of the bond before us is, "if the above-bounden William Cassebohm shall well and truly execute the duties of chief deputy," etc., which naturally and necessarily refers to the appointment he had received.

Counsel for appellant places much stress upon the language used by the court of chancery of South Carolina in Commissioners v. Greenwood, 1 Desaus. Eq. 450. There a treasurer was reappointed, but gave no new bond. The court held that the bond given at the commencement of the first term did not cover his acts during his second administration. In the course of his opinion the chancellor said: "This cause is altogether different from that of the deputy postmaster. He was continued in office under the original appointment by the person who first appointed him." This reference to some cause, the title of which is not given, (but which had probably been mentioned by counsel in argument,) is not rendered more definite by the argument, for the argument of counsel is not reported. The South Carolina case was decided in 1795, and the case referred to by the court is probably an English case. If we were permitted an effort to identify the "Deputy Postmaster's Case," we should hazard the conjecture that it was Lord Arlington v. Merricke, temp. Car. II., which Patteson and Williams, in a note to the report of it, say has been considered a leading case on the subject ever since. 2 Saund. 414. Lord Arlington v. Merricke was brought upon the bond of a deputy postmaster, the condition of which recited. "Whereas, the above-named Henry Lord Arlington, postmaster general to the king's most excellent majesty, by his sufficient instrument or writing under his hand and seal, bearing date," etc., "has deputed the above-bounden Thomas Jenkins to be his deputy postmaster of the stage of Oxen above said, to execute the said office from the 24th day of June next coming for the term of six months following: Now, if the said Thomas Jenkins, his deputies, servants, and assigns, do and shall, for and during all the time he, the said Thomas Jenkins, shall continue deputy postmaster of said stage, well, truly, faithfully, and diligently do, execute, and perform all and every the duties belonging to the said office of deputy postmaster of the said stage, * * * then this obligation will be void," etc. "For the matter of law," HALE, C. J., said that "the condition shall refer to the recital only by which the defendant was bound only for six months, and not longer, and that for the reason above alleged by Saunders; and of such opinion was the court. And Twysden cited a case between Horton v. Day, which is entered in this court in Mich. 22 Car. 1 Rot, 468 or 408, [Style, 18,] where, in a condition of an obligation, it was recited that a sheriff had appointed the defendant bailiff of a hundred within his county, 'if, therefore, the defendant shall duly execute all warrants to him directed, that then,' etc., it was adjudged that the words 'all warrants' should be intended to be only all warrants which were directed to the defendant as bailiff of the said hundred, and not other warrants. And so here the words 'during all the time' shall be intended but only during the six months recited in the condition." "The reason above alleged by Saunders" is found on the preceding page, where it appears Saunders, as counsel for defendant, argued: "The defendant, by the intention of the condition, was not to be responsible for Jenkins for any longer time than for the said six months, although the words are that Jenkins, during all the time that he shall continue deputy postmaster, indefinitely, shall observe and perform, etc., yet this time, which is indefinite in itself, ought to be construed only for the said six months for which the condition recites that Jenkins was appointed to be deputy postmaster, and the rather because Jenkins cannot continue deputy postmaster for any longer time than for the said six months, unless he be appointed anew, and have a new deputation for a longer time. And he said that by the construction which the plaintiff's counsel would put upon it the defendant would be tricked; for it appears that the defendant intended to be bound for Jenkins for the due execution of the said office only for six months; but the plaintiff would have the defendant bound during the whole life of Jenkins, which is unreasonable to suppose." If Lord Arlington v. Merricke is the case referred to by the South Carolina chancellor, it certainly, as he remarked, differs from the case before him. It does not, however, sustain the position of appellant in the case at bar. The cases in which bonds given to individuals or private corporations have been construed are not authoritative adjudications with reference to the question before us. Such matters are subject of private contract, by which the parties may bind themselves in any manner or to any extent, not violative of public policy or positive statute.

The first and second counts do not state a cause of action, because they do not allege a defalcation or misappropriation by Cassebohm during the period for which alone the obligors, who executed the instrument sued on, became his sureties. The judgment of the superior court is reversed. The cause is remanded, with direction to the court below to set aside the order sustaining the defendant's demurrers, and to enter an order or orders overruling defendant's demurrer to the complaint as a whole, and overruling the demurrer to the third count of the complaint, and sustaining the demurrer to the first and second counts thereof.

SWITZER v. BAKER. (No. 14,732.)

GUARANTY.

In an action to recover on a contract for services it appeared that plaintiff wrote to defendant making inquiry regarding the financial standing of a person unknown to plaintiff, who wished to employ him, to which defendant replied, "You may rest assured that you will get your pay for all work done." Held, that this did not constitute a contract on which defendant was liable as guarantor.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; J. B. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Action by U. D. Switzer against A. F. Baker to recover on a contract for services. From a judgment in favor of defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

N. O. Bradley, for appellant. Geo. B. Graham, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This appeal is from a judgment upon demurrer, plaintiff declining to amend. The action is to recover value of services for harvesting a crop of grain, and it is averred that defendant owned the land upon which the grain was raised, and had leased it to one Traver, who cultivated and put in the grain; that defendant owned an interest in the crop. The complaint then proceeds as follows: "That on or about the 9th day of June, 1889, said A. Traver spoke to this plaintiff about heading said crop of grain, and plaintiff being unacquainted with said Traver, and not knowing anything about his financial standing, wrote to said defendant, in effect, that said Traver desired this plaintiff to head said crop of grain, and inquiring of defendant as to whether he, plaintiff, would be paid for his work if he cut said grain, and thereupon, in due course of mail, plaintiff received an answer from defendant, of which the following is a true copy: 'Fresno, Cal., June 17, 1889. Mr. Dan Switzer: Your letter received to-day. You may rest assured that you will get your pay for all work done. Yours, truly, A. F. BAKER.'" It is also charged that the labor was reasonably worth the sum of $900, $250 of which was paid by defendant, leaving still unpaid $650; that Traver was at the time and ever since has been wholly insolvent.

The demurrer is general, on the ground that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The plaintiff must base his claim solely upon the proposition that Baker's letter in reply to his inquiries amounted to a guaranty. Whether it does or not must depend upon the contents of the letter to which it was a response. That letter is not given, even in substance, but in effect is said to be that, uncertain of Traver's financial standing, he wrote informing defendant that Traver desired him to cut the grain, and inquiring "as to whether he, plaintiff, would be paid for his work if he cut said grain." The reply was simply a very positive assurance that he would get his pay. The suit assumes a contract on the part of defendant to pay,—to become responsible for Traver's liability. There is here, however, only an assurance that if he worked for Traver he would get his pay; and this in response to inquiries in regard to Traver's financial standing. Any one who had full confidence in the financial ability and the integrity of Traver would have answered in the same way. Even if the language used be capable of a different construction, still it does not exclude the inference above drawn, which is at least equally reasonable. We cannot infer an agreement to pay the debt of another from such doubtful language. It was incumbent upon the pleader to make out his case affirmatively, and we must assume that he has stated the facts as favorably as possible. We advise an affirmance of the judgment.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

WILLIAMSON v. CUMMINGS ROCK DRILL CO. (No. 14,524.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 18, 1892.)

OPENING DEFAULT—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT.

1. An order denying or granting a motion to set aside a default, on the ground of excusable neglect, rests in the discretion of the trial court, and will not be reversed on appeal, except in a plain case of abuse of discretion; and where the motion is based on the fact that, when defendant's attorney received the summons and copy of complaint from defendant, he indorsed thereon a wrong date for answering, an order refusing to set aside the default will not be disturbed.

2. Under Code Civil Proc. § 410, providing that summons may be served by the sheriff or by any other person over the age of 18 not a party to the action, the affidavit of service need not show that service was made by a white male citizen of the United States.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; W. T. WALLACE, Judge.

Action by one Williamson against the Cummings Rock Drill Company. From an order denying a motion to set aside a judgment by default, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Ash & Mathews, for appellant. W. Rigby, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The summons herein was served on the defendant April 9, 1891, and on April 21, 1891, the defendant having failed to appear and answer the complaint, judgment by default was entered against him by the clerk on motion of the plaintiff's attorney. Two days thereafter the defendant moved the court to set aside the default and judgment upon the ground of excusable neglect, and in support thereof presented an affidavit of merits, and also an affidavit of its attorney showing that there were several causes between the same parties, and that when he received the summons and copy of complaint herein from the defendant, he marked the papers, "Answer due April 23, 1891." Upon the hearing the court denied the motion, and the defendant has appealed. Applications of this nature are addressed to the sound legal discretion of the court below, and the order of that court, either in granting or denying the motion, will not be disturbed by this court, unless the appellant shall make it appear to have been so clearly erroneous as to amount to an abuse of discretion. Bailey v. Taaffe, 29 Cal. 422; Coleman v. Rankin, 37 Cal. 249; Watson v. Railroad Co., 41 Cal. 20; Garner v. Erlanger, 86 Cal. 62, 24 Pac. Rep. 805. In Reidy v. Scott, 53 Cal. 69, it was shown that, at the time of the service of summons upon him, the defendant was sick and unable to attend to business, and that as soon as he was able to be out he delivered the summons to his attorneys, and stated to them that he had received it on the 26th of April, as he then believed, whereas, in fact, the service was on the 25th of April. Judgment by default was entered against the defendant before 9 o'clock on the morning of May 7th, (the 6th being Sunday,) and shortly after 9 o'clock on the same day, without any knowledge or notice of such judgment, his answer setting up a meritorious defense was filed with the clerk, and upon this showing it was held that the court should have set aside the default. In the present case, however, it does not appear that there was any mistake on the part of the defendant as to the day when the summons was served upon it, or that the attorney was not properly informed of that day, nor did the attorney give any reason why he marked the papers, "Answer due April 23d;" and the only reason presented for his not having filed the answer is "his mistake in marking said papers as aforesaid, and owing to the fact that there were so many cases against said defendant." This cannot be regarded as excusable neglect. The contention of the appellant that the judgment cannot be sustained for the reason that the affidavit of service fails to show that the individual by whom the service was made was a white male citizen of the United States, or that he served a certified copy of the complaint, is sufficiently met by the terms of section 410, Code Civil Proc., which authorizes the service to be made by the sheriff, "or by any other person over the age of eighteen, and not a party to the action," and which does not require that the copy of the complaint shall be "certified."

DUNTON v. NILES. (No. 14,609.)

ACTION ON CONTRACT—PLEADING—CONSIDERATION.

1. A complaint stated that defendant, knowing the rights of plaintiff's assignors, purchased and excavated a lot adjoining and extending a few feet under a building occupied as tenants by plaintiff's assignors as a warehouse; that such excavating was so negligently done as to undermine the building, and cause the floor and goods therein to fall into the excavation, and damage the latter; that plaintiff's assignors notified defendant that the excavation would damage their goods, and defendant promised he would stop the work, but that he continued the same, and carried away the earth from under the warehouse; that plaintiff's assignors "demanded from defendant that he settle and pay the damage, which he promised to do as soon as the damage should be fully ascertained;" that afterwards plaintiff's assignors and defendant agreed on a compromise by which defendant was to take certain of the damaged goods at a price named, and sort over and return other goods, and pay the damage for such as were not returned; that plaintiff's assignors delivered and defendant received the goods defendant was to have for his own use, and also such goods as were to be sorted; that part of the latter had been returned by defendant, and part were so unskillfully sorted that plaintiff's assignors refused to receive them under the agreement; and defendant has failed to pay any part of said damages. Held, that the complaint stated a cause of action on the oral agreement of the defendant to pay the damages caused by the excavation, and it was not defective for uncertainty.

2. Nor did the complaint state several causes of action, but the several matters of damage were distinct items, for which payment was to be made under the agreement.

3. Defendant purchased a lot from the owner of a warehouse situated partly thereon, while the warehouse was occupied by plaintiff's assignors as tenants, and the owner authorized him to erect a party wall on the line so as to make it necessary to dig under the warehouse, and remove one of its walls. In excavating under the building the floor fell, damaging the goods in the warehouse, and defendant agreed to pay plaintiff's assignors the damages. Held, that there was sufficient consideration for defendant's promise.

4. In an action for damages caused by defendant's excavating under a warehouse occupied by plaintiff's assignors, there was evidence that defendant had promised plaintiff's assignors to so conduct the work of excavating as to save them from inconvenience; that, after the floor of the warehouse and goods therein had fallen into the excavation, he said he would make it all right and satisfactory, and would fix whatever the damage was. Held, that there was evidence to support a finding that defendant promised to settle and pay the damage.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; J. W. McKinley, Judge.

Action by Charles H. Dunton against William Niles to recover for breach of contract. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Modified.

Chapman & Hendrick, for appellant. Brousseau & Hatch and Waldo M. York, for respondent.

Temple, C. Plaintiff, as assignee of W. W. Montague & Co., sues to recover damages for the breach of an alleged contract whereby defendant agreed to settle and pay to W. W. Montague & Co. certain damages to their goods, wares, and merchandise, caused by an excavation made by defendant adjoining and under their warehouse at Los Angeles, and also for certain tin sold and delivered to defendant. The complaint is demurred to: (1) Generally for insufficient facts. (2) Uncertainty, in that it cannot be ascertained from it whether the action is brought to recover damages for the negligent excavation of the land adjoining the warehouse, or upon a contract to pay such damage, and a contract to pay for certain tin plate, or whether it is brought to recover the value of certain rivets, taken by the defendant and not returned. (3) Several causes of action are improperly united, to wit: A cause of action for damages for negligence and unskillfulness in excavating adjoining the property of W. W. Montague & Co. with an action upon a contract to pay such damage; and said two causes of action with an action upon a contract to pay for tin plate, and for labor in sorting and boxing rivets; and all of said causes of action, and each of them, are improperly united with an action for damages for failure to sort certain other rivets; and, further, that said several causes of action are not separately stated.

The complaint charges that on the 1st day of October, 1884, W. W. Montague & Co. rented from one Mills the premises known as "110 Upper Main Street," and lands adjoining thereto, for two years, with the privilege of an extension of two years. That Mills, in pursuance of the covenants of the lease, built a warehouse on the premises, which W. W. Montague & Co. took possession of, and where they stored a large amount of merchandise. The firm continued to occupy the premises until July, 1887. While W. W. Montague & Co. were so in the possession, defendant purchased the adjoining land from Mills, well knowing the rights of W. W. Montague & Co. While the lessees were so occupying the premises defendant commenced to excavate upon the adjoining lot purchased by him from Mills, and continued so to excavate up to May 28, 1887. May 25, 1887, W. W. Montague & Co. notified defendant that his excavation, if continued, would undermine their warehouse and damage their goods, and defendant then promised "that he would stop his said work of excavating and discontinue the same; but, notwithstanding his said promise so to discontinue said work, said defendant continued to excavate in a negligent, unskillful, and careless manner, and in so excavating took and carried away the earth and soil from said land so as aforesaid acquired by him (defendant) from said Mills and his grantees, and next and adjoining said property, * * * and negligently and unskillfully carried away the earth and soil from under said warehouse until the defendant had excavated to a depth of sixteen feet below the ancient surface of defendant's said land, and below and under said warehouse, and was so carelessly and negligently excavating on the 28th day of May, 1887, when by reason of said excavation so as aforesaid carelessly and negligently made by defendant under said warehouse, and on said lands adjoining thereto, the earth and soil under said warehouse gave way and fell into said excavation, and the floor of said warehouse fell through, and goods, wares, and merchandise of said firm of W. W. Montague & Co. then stored therein fell into said excavation, and were damaged thereby in the sum of one thousand dollars." On the 28th of May, thereafter, W. W. Montague & Co. demanded from defendant that he settle and pay the damage, which he promised to do as soon as the damages should be fully ascertained. Thereafter, about June 15, 1887, W. W. Montague & Co. and the defendant agreed upon a compromise of the said claim for damages, whereby defendant was to pay $100 for certain tin plate which defendant should take, and for certain labor in boxing it, and was to take away certain rivets, and sort the same, and return such as could be sorted and placed in as good condition as they were in before the damage occurred, and then was to pay all damage to the firm for the rivets which should not be so returned. That, previous to said agreement, the said firm delivered to defendant and defendant received the tin plate which he was to have for his own use, and also all the rivets which had been damaged, to be sorted. That some rivets were sorted by defendant and returned, but some were so unskillfully sorted that the said firm refused to receive and accept them under the agreement. That the residue have never been sorted or returned. That the rivets were so damaged as to be of no value as rivets whatever, and that before the damage they were worth $520. That defendant has not paid the $520 damage or the said $100 for said tin, or any part of either sum, and the whole is due and unpaid.

The contention that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action is principally upon the claim that the action is for damages resulting from excavating upon an adjoining lot, and appellant contends that, under the circumstances stated, defendant is not liable for injury to the building or goods of W. W. Montague & Co. It does not appear that the land, unburdened by the building, would have fallen in because of the excavation, and want of notice is not averred, but, on the other hand, knowledge of the excavation is shown; and, on the theory that the action is for the breach of an oral contract to pay the damage, it is contended there is no consideration for such promise. Both these propositions are sufficiently answered by the suggestion that there is a distinct charge in the complaint that defendant not only excavated on the adjoining lot, but also excavated and removed the earth from under the building, thereby causing it to fall. It is not a question, therefore, of liability for an excavation made by a coterminous owner upon an adjacent lot. The action is clearly for the breach of the oral agreement to take certain tin, and pay certain expenses and damages, and the previous recitals are simply matters of inducement. In this view the uncertainty specified does not exist, nor are there several causes of action united in the complaint. The agreement of compromise specifies several distinct items or payments to be made, but they do not constitute different causes of action. I think, therefore, the demurrer was properly overruled.

The court having found for the plaintiff, defendant applied for a new trial, which having been refused, he appeals from the judgment and order. It appears from the evidence that, prior to the commencement of the excavation, defendant notified W. W. Montague & Co. of the intended excavation, and of the agreement between defendant and Mills to erect a party wall which would render it necessary to remove one side of the warehouse, also that the building extended some eight inches upon defendant's lot. Plaintiff, who was then managing for W. W. Montague & Co., objected, and pointed out the danger to the building and goods. Defendant assured him that he would move the goods and do everything necessary to prevent injury and inconvenience to W. W. Montague & Co.; whereupon plaintiff, as agent, consented to the work being done. After the work had proceeded for some time plaintiff noticed that the excavation was deep, and extended under the building and called defendant's attention to the danger. Defendant then agreed to stop work at the point of danger, but did not, and in consequence the bank caved, and the building gave way, and the damage resulted. These facts I think take the case entirely out of the rule laid down in section 832, Civil Code. There was a consideration for the promise on the part of defendant, in that Mills, the owner of the building, authorized the erection of a wall on the line for a party wall, and that it was necessary to dig under the warehouse, and remove one of its walls. And then the agreement to cease work would of itself excuse plaintiff's assignors from shoring up their own building.

Appellant contends that the evidence does not justify the finding that defendant promised that he would settle and pay the damage. As to the tin plate, Dunton's testimony seems quite sufficient, and in fact hardly controverted by defendant, except as to the delivery of the tin to him. As the testimony on this point is conflicting, we must accept the evidence which sustains the finding. I think this, including Dunton's evidence in rebuttal, shows a delivery. As to the rivets, there is very little except the testimony of Dunton, and that is not as definite as it might be. This inquiry, however, must commence at the beginning. Niles, aware that he was attempting something which required the assent of plaintiff's assignors, had promised to so conduct the work as to save them from any inconvenience. As soon as he saw the condition after the cave, according to the witnesses Ford and Hanes, he said he would make it all right; that he would make it satisfactory; would fix it, whatever the damage was. Dunton seems to have been under the impression that Niles was to take the rivets and pay for them. Such is not the allegation in the complaint, nor the statement in the findings. Except the confident assumption of the witness, I find no evidence of any such arrangement. It appears from this testimony, as I think is substantially averred and found, that the agreement was that plaintiff would waive damages as to such rivets as would be sorted, and defendant would, after his attempt to sort them, pay whatever the damage to them might be. This did not make Niles the owner of the rivets, and, if they were worth anything in their damaged condition, Niles would not be charged with their full value. I understand plaintiff in his testimony to admit that they were worth $100. In that case the amount of damage found was excessive in just that amount. The other specifications of insufficiency need not be discussed. They are either practically answered by what has already been said or are immaterial. I think there is evidence which tends to prove that, notwithstanding the contract with Mendoza, defendant still continued to manage and control the work of excavation; and, further, that under the peculiar circumstances of this case, defendant would remain liable for damage resulting from the excavation. I think the judgment should be reversed, unless plaintiff, within 20 days after filing the remittitur, shall stipulate to a reduction of $100 on the judgment, in which case the judgment, so modified, should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the cause is remanded, with instruction to the court below to modify the judgment by allowing to the plaintiff the sum of $520 instead of $620, with interest thereon from December 12, 1887, with costs of suit, if the plaintiff shall within 20 days after filing the remittitur stipulate that such reduction be made; but, if he does not so stipulate, the court is directed to set aside the judgment, and order a new trial.

BLANC v. PAYMASTER MINING CO. (No. 14,599.)

FOREIGN CORPORATION — FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCE—ACTION TO SET ASIDE — PARTIES — ATTACHMENT.

1. Where a creditor of a corporation seeks to subject to his claim property fraudulently conveyed by it to an officer, and by him to a third person, who is made defendant, neither the corporation grantor nor the officer is a necessary party defendant.

2. Where findings are waived, and there are none in the record, the lower court will be presumed to have found all the facts necessary to support its judgment; and, if the evidence is insufficient to justify the finding of a necessary fact, such implied finding may be excepted to in the same manner and with the same effect as if it were an express one.

3. A clerk in a store belonging to a mining corporation, who has charge of certain funds, keeps the pay roll, and pays the miners, is not an "agent" of the corporation, within the meaning of Code Civil Proc. § 542, subd. 5, providing that personal property, not capable of manual delivery, must be attached by leaving with the person having such property in his possession, or with his agent, a copy of the writ, and a notice that the property in his possession belonging to the defendant is attached.

4. Where an action against a nonresident corporation is begun by an attachment of its property, a money judgment general in its terms will uphold a sale of the attached property, and, in an action on such judgment, the attachment, if it does not appear from the judgment, may be otherwise shown.

5. Where the officers and stockholders of one corporation form another, and convey all the property of the former to it in fraud of creditors, the latter corporation will be regarded as a continuation of the former, and a court of equity will hold the assets of the latter liable for a debt of the former, though there has been no recovery of judgment for the debt, and return of execution unsatisfied, as required by Civil Code, § 3441, which declares that "a creditor can avoid the act or obligation of his debtor for fraud only when the fraud obstructs the enforcement by legal process of his rights to take the property affected by the transfer or obligation."

6. Where a complaint alleges the formation of such new corporation, and conveyance of property to it by a former corporation, and that the latter is in possession of all the property of the former without having paid anything therefor, that the latter was formed to take the property of the former as part of a scheme to defraud plaintiff and others, and that before the transfer the former corporation became indebted to plaintiff, as against a general demurrer and after judgment, the complaint may be regarded as sufficiently averring that such indebtedness to plaintiff is still unpaid.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; W. L. PIERCE, Judge.

Action by one Blanc against the Paymaster Mining Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Harris & Gregg, for appellant. Hunsaker, Britt & Goodrich and J. E. Wadham, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. The complaint in this action alleges, in substance, among other matters, that the Esperanza Company, a foreign corporation doing business in Arizona, became in February, 1884, indebted to plaintiff upon two promissory notes, one for the sum of $1,000, payable on demand, and the other for the sum of $5,000, payable February 12, 1885; that thereafter the said Esperanza Company became indebted to its various stockholders, and a pretended assignment was made of all its property to its "acting managing officer and agent," one Blaisdell, for the alleged purpose of paying the debts of such corporation, and the said Blaisdell made a pretended sale of such property at public auction, at which sale "he claims to have become the purchaser of the tools, machinery, stamp mills, engines, and boilers belonging to the said Esperanza Company, all of the value of $75,000, at a purely nominal sum, to wit, the sum of $50," and thereupon said Blaisdell, "together with the principal officers, agents, and stockholders of the said Esperanza Company, proceeded to organize the defendant," and turned over to it all of the said property, for the purpose of cheating and defrauding plaintiff and other creditors of the Esperanza Company; and in this connection the complaint further charges "that the said the Paymaster Mining Company, defendant, was so organized by the said Blaisdell, the officers and agents and stockholders of the said Esperanza Company, with the view of taking and receiving said property, as a part of said plan for defrauding the creditors of the Esperanza Company, and particularly the plaintiff," and that said defendant never paid any consideration whatever for said property. It is also alleged that, the Esperanza Company having failed and refused "to pay the just demands of this plaintiff," he instituted a suit against said company in one of the superior courts of this state "for the collection of the said sum of $6,000" and interest, and a writ of attachment was issued therein, and the property before referred to was attached, etc., and judgment was duly given in his favor and against said Esperanza Company, for the sum of $7,784.74 and costs, and that nothing whatever has been paid on said judgment. The prayer of the complaint is "that the pretended sales of the said Blaisdell to the defendant be declared void," and "that it be adjudged * * * that the said defendant holds the said property charged with the payment of the plaintiff's claim of $7,784.74, with interest and costs," and that the same be sold to satisfy the same, and for general relief. To this complaint the defendant interposed a demurrer, upon the general ground of insufficiency of the alleged facts to constitute a cause of action, and upon the further ground that there is a defect of parties defendant, because of the failure to make the Esperanza Company and Blaisdell defendants. The demurrer was overruled. Upon the trial findings were waived, and a judgment rendered in favor of plaintiff in accordance with the prayer of the complaint. The defendant appeals.

It is argued by the appellant here that the court erred in its ruling upon the demurrer to the complaint, and also that certain implied findings are not justified by the evidence.

1. The demurrer to the complaint was properly overruled. The complaint states a cause of action, and the Esperanza Company and Blaisdell were not necessary parties to the action. Upon the facts alleged in the complaint, neither of them has any interest, either legal or equitable, in the property, and neither could be prejudiced by the judgment which the plaintiff seeks to obtain; and the omission to make them defendants did not in any manner preclude the defendant from interposing any defense which it may have had to the matters alleged in the complaint, and therefore the defendant cannot complain that they were not made parties defendant. Fox v. Moyer, 54 N.Y. 130; Potter v. Phillips, 44 Iowa, 353; Coffey v. Norwood, 81 Ala. 512, 8 South. Rep. 199. In Potter v. Phillips, supra, the court, in answer to the objection that the fraudulent grantor was not made a party defendant in an action to subject to the lien of plaintiff's judgment the property alleged to have been fraudulently conveyed, say: "While a proper party, we do not see wherein he can be regarded as a necessary party. Whether the conveyances were fraudulent or in good faith, the property has irrevocably passed beyond his control. In no way can he be prejudiced, in a legal sense, by a determination which subjects the property to the payment of his debts." And in Coffey v. Norwood, supra, the supreme court of Alabama reach the same conclusion, saying: "Neither the debtor, if living, nor, if he be dead, his personal representatives, can enjoy any of the fruits of a successful prosecution of the suit to set aside the fraudulent conveyance: for, after the complaining creditor's demand is satisfied, the remainder of the fund goes to the fraudulent grantee. The debtor, therefore, has no interest, legal or beneficial, either in the property sought to be subjected, or in the litigation having reference to it, except remotely or indirectly. Nor can the grantee be prejudiced in any manner by omitting to join the grantor, or his personal representative, as he can make any defense to the complainant's demand which the grantor or personal representative could do if he were a party to the suit."

2. The appellant contends that the evidence does not justify the implied finding of the court that in the action of the plaintiff against the Esperanza Company, mentioned in the complaint, an attachment was levied upon the property sought to be reached by this action, and that the evidence is also insufficient to justify the further implied finding that in the action referred to a judgment was rendered in favor of this plaintiff, and against the Esperanza Company, for the sum of $7,784.70. It is claimed by respondent that inasmuch as findings were waived, and none are to be found in the record, there are no findings to which exception can be taken, and nothing to which appellant's specifications of insufficiency of evidence can relate. We do not think this is a correct view of the law upon this point. There are no express findings in the record, but it is the presumption of law that the court found all the matters of fact in issue, and necessary to support its judgment in favor of the successful party. Such findings are implied, and, if the evidence is insufficient to justify the court in finding any material or necessary fact, such implied finding of fact may be excepted to in the same manner and with the same effect as if it were an express finding. The practice pursued by appellant in this respect is proper.

3. The Esperanza Company is a foreign corporation, and had no managing agent or other officer in this state upon whom service of summons was or may have been made in the action which plaintiff brought against it to recover the amount due upon the notes referred to in the complaint. This being so, the only valid judgment which could have been rendered in that action was one in the nature of a judgment in rem, against such property as could have been seized under a writ of attachment therein. Anderson v. Goff, 72 Cal. 65, 13 Pac. Rep. 73; Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 714; Cooper v. Reynolds, 10 Wall. 308. The judgment as rendered in that action was general in its terms, for the recovery of money only, and made no reference to the fact that any property had been attached therein; but it was not for this reason void, if in fact such attachment was made. In such case the judgment would be held to have the effect of perpetuating the attachment lien, and would be regarded as "so far in the nature of a proceeding in rem as to uphold a sale of the attached property, and considered for that purpose and to that extent is not void." Anderson v. Goff, supra; Cooper v. Reynolds, supra. It follows necessarily, from this view of the law, that in considering whether the court below was justified in finding that plaintiff recovered against the Esperanza Company the judgment alleged in the complaint, it must be first determined whether the evidence is sufficient to sustain its other implied finding, that the property in controversy here was attached in that action. If such property was not attached in that action, then, under the law as above stated, the court was without jurisdiction to pronounce any judgment therein which can be enforced against such property. It is shown that the writ of attachment was issued in the action referred to, and it further appears, from the return of the officer in whose hands it was placed for service, that he attached "all moneys, goods, effects, * * * or any other personal property belonging to the (Esperanza Company) defendant named therein, in the possession and under the control of the Paymaster Mining Company, by delivering to and leaving with Cyrus Wheeler, the acting managing agent of said Paymaster Mining Company, personally," a copy of said attachment, etc. This return is not conclusive in this action, and we are of opinion that the evidence shows that the property in controversy was not in fact attached. The Paymaster Mining Company was in possession of this property, and, assuming that it was not capable of being taken into manual possession, then, under subdivision 5 of section 542[1] of the Code of Civil Procedure, in order to effect its attachment it was necessary to serve a copy of the writ of attachment, and a notice that the property was attached in pursuance thereof, upon the president or other head of that corporation, or its secretary, cashier, or other managing agent thereof. Kennedy v. Savings & Loan Soc., 38 Cal. 151. It is not claimed that Wheeler, upon whom the writ of attachment was served in plaintiff's action against the Esperanza Company, was the president or secretary of the Paymaster Mining Company, and the evidence does not show that he was a managing agent thereof. On the contrary, it appears that he was only employed by that corporation in the capacity of a clerk in a store belonging to it, and although he had the custody of money belonging to the corporation, and it was a part of his duty to keep the accounts of the men employed in the mine from data furnished him by the superintendent, and to pay them, this did not constitute him the "cashier" of the corporation, as that word is employed in section 542 of the Code of Civil Procedure, or a managing agent of such corporation. The word "cashier" in that section refers to an executive officer of a corporation,—as the cashier of a bank,—and not to a simple employe, who is not a managing agent of the corporation. Upon the evidence, we think it must be held that in the action referred to there never was any valid attachment of the property of the Esperanza Company, and, as it was not personally served with summons in this state, the judgment alleged in this complaint to have been recovered by plaintiff against that corporation was void. The implied finding of the court, therefore, that such judgment is valid and is a lien upon the property in controversy, is not sustained by the evidence.

4. The remaining question to be considered is whether, in view of the other allegations of the complaint, and found by the court to be true, the plaintiff is entitled to the relief which he asks, notwithstanding his failure to obtain a valid judgment against the Esperanza Company for the amount of the claim which he holds against that corporation. The general rule (to which, however, there are some exceptions) is that a creditor must first have recovered judgment against his debtor, and execution thereon be returned unsatisfied, before he is entitled to resort to an equitable action to reach property fraudulently transferred by his debtor. 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1415; Bump, Fraud. Conv. p. 522. And this general rule is embodied in section 3441 of the Civil Code, which declares: "A creditor can avoid the act or obligation of his debtor for fraud only when the fraud obstructs the enforcement by legal process of his rights to take the property affected by the transfer or obligation." It is claimed by the appellant that the present case falls within this rule, and that, as plaintiff has never recovered a valid judgment against the Esperanza Company, the foundation of his right to maintain this action is gone. But we are unable to agree to this proposition. As already stated, the complaint charges that the Esperanza Company is wholly insolvent, and that defendant is now in possession of all its property, without having paid any consideration therefor, claiming to own the same by virtue of the fraudulent transfers before mentioned, and that the defendant was organized by the officers and stockholders of the Esperanza Company for the purpose of taking and holding the property of the Esperanza Company, and as part of a scheme to defraud and cheat the plaintiff and other stockholders of the former corporation. These facts are all clearly alleged, and, we think, as against a general demurrer and after judgment, the complaint may also be regarded as sufficiently averring that the notes executed to plaintiff by the Esperanza Company, as evidence of its indebtedness to him, are still unpaid. These are all material allegations, and upon this record, express findings having been waived, it must be presumed that they were all found to be true by the court below. We think, upon this state of facts, a court of equity will regard the defendant as a mere continuation of the former corporation under a different name, and will hold it liable for the indebtedness of the Esperanza Company, at least to the extent of the value of the property which it received from it without consideration, and under the circumstances stated. Nominally, the two corporations may be different, but, as viewed in equity, they are the same, and the plaintiff is not prevented from asserting such identity in fact. This was so substantially held in the case of Hibernia Ins. Co. v. St. Louis & N. O. Transp. Co., 13 Fed. Rep. 516. In that case, upon a state of facts similar to that disclosed by this record, McCRARY, circuit judge, after referring to the fact that it was doubtful whether any service of process could be made upon the old company, so as to secure a judgment at law against it, proceeded to say: "A distinction with respect to transactions of this character exists between a corporation and a natural person. A natural person may sell all his property for a fair consideration, if the transaction is bona fide, and the buyer will not be required to take care that the seller provides for and pays all his debts. A corporation, unlike a natural person, by disposing of all its property, may not only deprive itself of the means of paying its debts, but may deprive itself of corporate existence, and place itself beyond the reach of process of law. At all events, equity cannot permit the owners of one corporation to organize another, and transfer from the former to the latter all the corporate property, without paying all the corporate debts." TREAT, district judge, in a concurring opinion in that case, said: "A mere change of name cannot avoid obligations. The new corporation took all the property of the old; went forward with its business; had the same stockholders, except a few formal ones; was, in short, the old corporation; and now seeks to escape the obligations of the old, rescuing the property of the latter from the demands the former was bound to meet. Can this be so? The old corporation and its property were liable to the demands of the plaintiff. The new corporation must respond to the extent of the property acquired, and possibly to the full extent; that is, if property sufficient therefor is in its possession. This is a proceeding in equity, wherein mere colorable pretenses are to be disregarded. Shiftings of corporate names cannot defeat positive rights, any more than the change of the name of a natural person can absolve him from his personal obligations." The principle of this decision, which we regard as eminently just, was also approved by the supreme court of Pennsylvania in Web Co. v. Dienelt, 19 Atl. Rep. 428. It follows from these views that plaintiff is entitled to satisfy the demand against the Esperanza Company out of its property now held by the defendant, and that, too, without first recovering a nominal judgment against the Esperanza company. The complaint does not allege the rate of interest the notes there referred to bear, but the court recites in its judgment that such rate is 8 per cent. per annum. But the judgment does not declare that the amount unpaid on such notes is a lien upon the property in controversy, but that the judgment referred to in the complaint constitutes such a lien, and directs a sale of the property to satisfy the same. The amount of this judgment, including, as it does, costs of the former action, and interest upon the interest which had accrued upon said notes at the date of its rendition, exceeds the amount of the principal and interest of said notes, and is therefore erroneous. The court should ascertain the amount due upon the notes, and direct a sale of so much of the property in controversy as may be necessary to pay the same, and costs of the action and of making the sale. Judgment and order reversed, with directions to the superior court to find the amount due the plaintiff from the Esperanza Company upon the notes referred to in the complaint, and thereupon to render judgment in accordance with this opinion.

[1] Code Civil Proc. § 542, subd. 5, provides that "personal property, not capable of manual delivery, must be attached by leaving with the person * * * having in his possession or under his control such * * * personal property, or with his agent, a copy of the writ, and a notice that * * * the credits or other personal property in his possession or under his control belonging to the defendant are attached in pursuance of such writ.

BARROWS et al. v. FOX et al. (No. 14,643.)

WATER RIGHTS—WASTE.

1. Under Civil Code, § 1411, providing that an appropriation of running water, to give a right to its use, must be for some useful or beneficial purpose, and that when the appropriator ceases to use it for such a purpose the right ceases, where it is adjudged that plaintiffs are entitled to a certain amount of water from a stream, and that defendants are entitled to the balance, and it appears that plaintiffs have always used the water by means of a defective flume, the court may direct them to carry the water to which they are entitled by flume and pipe, so that the balance may not be wasted.

2. Where, in an action to establish right to water in a stream, a court of equity finds, on sufficient evidence, that the parties have each certain rights in the stream, it may secure enjoyment of those rights by proper regulation of the use of the water.

3. Where, in an action to establish a water right in a stream, defendants, claiming as appropriators, ask for an injunction to restrain plaintiffs from taking any water from the stream, it is permissible for defendants to show the effect on their lands, as to value, of a deprivation of water as asked by defendants, and that there is no other available water supply, since this might be necessary to entitle them to the relief asked.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Ventura county; B. T. WILLIAMS, Judge.

Action by Thomas Barrows and others against Lewis C. Fox and others. From a judgment adjusting the rights of the parties, and an order refusing a new trial, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Blackstock & Shepherd, (Chapman & Hendrick, of counsel,) for appellants. H. L. Poplin, for respondents.

FOOTE, C. The plaintiffs claim to be the owners and tenants in common, and entitled to the possession, of a certain "water ditch, conduit, flume, and water way," by means of which certain waters flowing from a spring in what is called "Brunson Canyon" are conducted, together with the right of way for the same, over certain lands of which description is given. They also claim, in connection with the right to this water way, that as tenants in common they own, as prior appropriators for use for "stock, domestic, and irrigating and other useful purposes," all the water flowing from the spring in question, to the extent of 200 inches of water, under a 4-inch pressure. They assert that they have thus used these waters, for about 13 years, adversely to the whole world. That the defendants about the 15th of July, 1890, took and appropriated all the waters of the natural stream which came from the spring above the plaintiffs' ditch, and prevented the plaintiffs from enjoying the use of the waters they had appropriated, and that the defendants threaten to continue to deprive the plaintiffs of their rights in the premises, and will do so if not restrained by injunction. Damages are asked for in the sum of $2,000; that the court will decree that the plaintiffs are the owners of the water right claimed, and entitled to the right of way set up for the water ditch, etc.; and that the defendants be restrained from all wrongful acts, etc.

The defendants deny the claim of the plaintiffs to the water right set up in the complaint, and allege that the defendants are entitled to the use of the waters of the spring flowing by a natural water course through their lands, which waters are less in quantity than 50 inches, measured under a 4-inch pressure, and that they, claiming themselves to be the owners of the waters in dispute, did appropriate them for necessary beneficial purposes of irrigation and domestic use. The court found in the first finding, in effect, that the plaintiffs were entitled to use their ditch, flume, etc., to convey the waters necessary for the useful purposes for which the plaintiffs had appropriated them, and to the right of way for the ditch, etc.; but in the third finding found that the appropriation for beneficial use by plaintiffs was not 200 inches of water as alleged in the complaint, but that, as owners and tenants in common of the right to use the waters of the stream in controversy for irrigation upon their lands, they were the owners and entitled to the use of the waters for that purpose "during the months of June, July, August, September, October, and November of each year, such months being the season for irrigation in that locality, for the period of fifteen successive days only of each of said months, from the first to the fifteenth days thereof, both inclusive, to the amount of one hundred and sixty thousand two hundred and ten United States gallons per day, equal to eleven inches, measured under a four-inch pressure." And that they were the owners and entitled to the use of the waters in controversy for domestic and stock purposes only "to the amount of water that will flow through a pipe three quarters of an inch in diameter, under a four-inch pressure, laid from the place of diversion on said stream to the land aforesaid of plaintiffs, continuously each day, or so much thereof as is reasonably necessary on said land for such purposes." But that they were not the owners of any greater water rights in the waters flowing from the spring and in the natural water course in question. The court in finding 4 further found that the defendants first, by closing up the plaintiffs' ditch, wrongfully deprived them of these water rights; but in finding 7 it found that one of the defendants, Mr. Fox, had, as a subsequent appropriator to plaintiffs, perfected his appropriation of 50 inches of the waters in controversy, which rights he held, of course, subject to that of plaintiffs; and in the eighth finding that the lands of defendants Fox and Crouch are those of riparian proprietors, and that they are entitled, as subsequent appropriators to the plaintiffs, to the use of the waters of the stream flowing in its natural course through such lands for purposes of irrigation and domestic use, subject only to the right of plaintiffs as above defined; that Fox is entitled to thirteen sixteenths of this restricted water right; that the waters are necessary alike for the beneficial uses of both parties to the action, their lands being agricultural, and that no damage has resulted to either party. The conclusions of law follow, based upon these findings, and the judgment is given and made in substantial accord therewith.

The main contention of the plaintiffs for a reversal of the judgment and order refusing a new trial is that the judgment is not sustained by the findings, in respect that the court has undertaken to direct them, contrary to principles of equity pertinent to the facts of the case, to substitute a pipe for a ditch or flume in which to carry the waters necessary for the purposes of the beneficial use to which they have applied the waters. They say that, as they have used these waters by ditch or flume for 13 years, they have the right still to use them in that way, even if these conduits leak and waste all the water over and above that necessary for their beneficial use; that inasmuch as they have thus used the water, and had the right of way for the same by ditch or flume, the court can place no restriction on these uses which will prevent them from wasting all the water by a leaking flume or ditch, over and above what the findings show they have appropriated for beneficial uses.

We do not perceive that the court has required the plaintiffs to use a pipe in place of the flume or ditch. It has only required that, whichever the means shall be that they employ to conduct the water, whether "flume or pipe, as plaintiffs may elect," they shall divert no more than the findings show that they have appropriated to a beneficial use, and that such use shall be at the times set out in the findings and decree. It would be no hardship on the plaintiffs to allow them to use a pipe in place of a flume which they had used; and it cannot be successfully contended, if the findings show that a ditch or flume owned by the plaintiffs, and for which they have the right of way, is in such condition that a large part of the waters of the stream is wasted on their lands before it reaches that of the lower riparian proprietor and subsequent appropriator, that then the court has not a right to order the prior appropriators so to conduct and use the water they have appropriated, either in a flume as originally carried, or a pipe, as they may elect, that the balance of the water shall not be wasted by leakage, and shall go down the stream to those having the right to it. To say otherwise would be to nullify the provisions of section 1411 of the Civil Code, which reads thus: "The appropriation must be for some useful or beneficial purpose, and, when the appropriator or his successor in interest ceases to use it for such a purpose, the right ceases."

The evidence was sufficient, as we think, to show that the court was justified in finding the extent of the plaintiffs' appropriation for beneficial uses; and that the defendants had acquired certain water rights for beneficial uses also subject to those acquired by plaintiffs. This being so, it was the province of a court of equity to secure each of the contending parties in the enjoyment of their rights acquired under the provisions of the law governing such a case. Frey v. Lowden, 70 Cal. 550, 11 Pac. Rep. 838. We conclude that the judgment is supported by the findings, and that the evidence is sufficient to support them.

It is further claimed as error that evidence was permitted, on the part of defendants, as to the effect upon their lands, as to value, by a deprivation of water, and that there was no other water supply for them. In this case it seems that the defendants had, upon the facts set up by them, claiming as appropriators, asked in their answer for an injunction against the plaintiffs to prevent them from taking water, to which the defendants made claim for the beneficial use of the same on their lands. Unless the defendants could show that the waste of water by plaintiffs would be hurtful to their rights as subsequent appropriators, it might be that they could not get the relief they asked. So it would seem there was no prejudicial error committed in the ruling. Upon consideration of all the points made we perceive no prejudicial error, and advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

Churchill v. Baumann et al. (No. 14,443.)

Diversion of Water—Estoppel—Pleading.

1. In an action for the diversion of water by the building and maintenance of a dam by defendants, where it appears that plaintiff assisted in maintaining the dam and diverting the water, he cannot recover.

2. Such participation in the diversion of the water need not be specially pleaded, but may be proved under an issue raised by defendants' denial that plaintiff was injured by the diversion of the water. De Haven, J., dissenting.

3. Where there is nothing in the record to show that plaintiff withdrew such consent to the diversion of the water before the commencement of the action, an averment in the complaint that defendants threaten and intend to continue the acts complained of is not to be construed as meaning that they intend to do so without plaintiff's consent, and he is not entitled to an injunction to restrain such diversion.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Modoc county; G. F. Harris, Judge.

Action by Jerome Churchill against H. Baumann and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Spencer & Raker and C. A. Raker, for appellant. F. D. Goodwin and Jenks & Claflin, for respondents.

Vanclief, C. This action was commenced on the 1st day of April, 1889, to recover $8,800 damages from the defendants—seven in number—for the alleged diversion of water from a natural stream,—Pine creek,—in Modoc county, during the years 1887 and 1888, to the injury of plaintiff's riparian and appropriated water rights, below the point of diversion; and also to enjoin such diversion pendente lite, and, upon the hearing, perpetually. Judgment passed for defendants, and plaintiff appeals from the judgment roll, and without a bill of exceptions.

The court found that in the early part of spring the stream affords 3,000 inches of water under a four-inch pressure, but in the dryest part of the year only 1,000 inches. That in June, 1882 the defendants and one J. Thad. Jones constructed a dam across the creek above plaintiff's riparian lands, and above all the points from which plaintiff diverted water, by which they divert from the creek 550 inches of water into a ditch, constructed by them, through which they conducted that amount of water to certain lateral ditches connected therewith, through which the water in the main ditch was distributed among the owners in proportion to the quantity of land to be irrigated thereby, viz., 50 inches of water to 160 acres of land. None of the land irrigated by this water was riparian to the stream. J. Thad. Jones owned 160 acres of land, and was entitled to use, and did use, 50 inches of water from the main ditch, to irrigate his land, until October, 1885, when he conveyed his land and water right to the plaintiff. "That after said J. Thad. Jones conveyed said land to the plaintiff, and particularly during the years 1886 and 1887, plaintiff participated with and assisted the defendants in maintaining said dam, and in keeping said dam and ditch in repair, and acted in connection with them in diverting said amount of 550 inches of water from said stream by means thereof. And plaintiff, during the irrigating seasons of said years 1886 and 1887, did use the water so diverted from Pine creek by means of said dam and ditch for irrigation upon said land [purchased from Jones] to the extent and amount theretofore claimed and used upon said land by his said grantor, J. Thad. Jones." It was further found that plaintiff was in possession of all his riparian lands prior to 1882, and has been ever since; and that he had full notice of the construction of said dam, and of the diversion of 550 inches of water by the defendants and their grantors in June, 1882, and thence until October, 1885, when he purchased the interest of Jones, and during all that time had notice that defendants diverted the water under a claim of right; yet it does not appear that he ever objected to the construction of said dam, or the diversion of the water, until he did so by the commencement of this action.

As conclusions of law, the court found, among other things, that plaintiff is a tenant in common with the defendants in the dam, ditch, and water right; and that, by his participation and assistance in maintaining the dam and diverting the water, he is estopped from maintaining this action.

Counsel for appellant make the point that no estoppel was pleaded by defendants, and therefore the findings of facts from which the conclusion of an estoppel is drawn are outside of the issues. Conceding that there was no issue as to estoppel, it does not neccessarily follow that the findings of fact from which the court drew the conclusion that plaintiff was estopped were not within other material issues; nor does it follow that those findings do not warrant the general conclusion of law that plaintiff was not entitled to recover in this action. The facts found necessarily imply that, from and after October, 1885, until after all the alleged injurious acts of the defendants had been done, the plaintiff consented to those acts, and consequently was not injured thereby,—volenti non fit injuria. In commenting upon this maxim, Mr. Broom says: "It is a general rule of the English law that no one can maintain an action for a wrong where he has consented to the act which occasions his loss," (Broom, Leg. Max. side p. 265;) and section 3515 of our Civil Code is to the same effect,—"he who consents to an act is not wronged by it." Says Judge Cooley: "Consent is generally a full and perfect shield when that is complained of as a civil injury which was consented to. A man cannot complain of a nuisance, the erection of which he concurred in or countenanced He is not injured by a negligence which is partly chargeable to his own fault. A man may not even complain of the adultery of his wife which he connived at or assented to. * * * But in case of a breach of the peace it is different. The state is wronged by this, and forbids it on public grounds." Cooley, Torts, (2d Ed.) p. 187; Corwin v. Railroad Co., 13 N.Y. 49; Lyon v. Tallmadge, 1 Johns. Ch. 187. It is alleged in the complaint that defendants forcibly and wrongfully diverted all the water from the creek during certain specified months in the years of 1887 and 1888, to the damage of the plaintiff in the sum of $8,800. The defendants denied that they ever diverted more than 550 inches of water, and on this issue the court found in their favor. They further denied that by the diversion of 550 inches the plaintiff was injured or damaged at all. Upon this issue they were entitled to prove the facts found, viz., that the plaintiff was interested with them in the dam and ditch and, for his own purposes, co-operated with and assisted them in repairing and maintaining the same, and in diverting water from the creek, since he thereby necessarily consented to all the acts complained of. This was not such new matter as is required to be specially pleaded, since neither its purpose nor effect was to discharge or avoid a cause of action theretofore existing, but to prove that the alleged cause of action never did exist, by showing that the material allegation of injury and damage to plaintiff was not true. Bliss, Code Pl. § 352 et seq. and authorities cited. An affirmative finding of facts inconsistent with an averment, and from which it necessarily follows that the averment is not true, is a sufficient finding that the averment is not true, (Coveny v. Hale, 49 Cal. 552; Water Co. v. Richardson, 72 Cal. 598, 14 Pac. Rep. 379; Miller v. Luco, 80 Cal. 257, 22 Pac. Rep. 195;) and it is well settled that an affirmative allegation may be traversed in pleading by an affirmative averment inconsistent with it, (Miller v. Brigham, 50 Cal. 615.) In the case at bar, however, the averment of injury to plaintiff was specifically denied, and the facts found, being wholy inconsistent with the averment, are equivalent to a direct negative thereof, and are sufficient to support the judgment.

As there is nothing in the record tending to show that plaintiff withdrew his consent before the commencement of this action, the averment in the complaint, that defendants threaten and intend to continue the acts complained of, should not be construed to mean that they intend so to continue without his consent; but only that they intended to do as they had done theretofore, as found by the court. Therefore, conceding that plaintiff might have been entitled to an injunction on the ground of mere threats, without any actual infringement of his rights, (as to which I express no opinion,) there is no averment or finding that defendants have threatened or intend to divert water otherwise than they had done, viz., by plaintiff's assistance and consent. The finding of the court is "that the defendants threaten and intend to continue to divert and use the waters of said stream to the extent and in the manner hereinbefore found." And it is thereinbefore found only that the diversions complained of were made to the extent of 550 inches, and with the active co-operation and assistance of the plaintiff and partly for his benefit. This finding, therefore, does not mean that the defendants threatened or intended to divert more than 550 inches, nor any quantity, without plaintiff's consent, and consequently does not show a threatened injury. It is contended, however, that the finding that plaintiff assisted in repairing and maintaining the dam and ditch, and in diverting the water, etc., is inconsistent with another finding, (24,) to the effect that "defendants and their associates" erected and maintained the dam and ditch and diverted their several portions of water upon their respective tracts of land ever since the month of June, 1882. But viewed in connection with the finding that J. Thad. Jones was one of the "associates" of defendants from June, 1882, until October, 1885, and that plaintiff succeeded Jones as an associate in October, 1885, the alleged inconsistency does not appear. If the foregoing views of the case are correct, all other points urged by appellant are immaterial. As to what may be the rights of the parties independently of plaintiffs' consent to the acts complained of, it is not necessary nor intended to express or intimate an opinion. I think the judgment is justified by the finding that the acts complained of were done with plaintiff's consent, and that it should be affirmed on that ground.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

De Haven, J., (concurring.) I concur in the judgment. The finding of the court below, that plaintiff participated with defendants in the maintenance of the dam and diversion of the water of which he complains, is a defense to the action. I do not, however, concur in so much of the foregoing opinion as holds that evidence tending to prove such defense was properly admitted under the denial that plaintiff sustained damage by reason of the matters alleged in his complaint. I think that such defense should have been specially set out in the answer. But this appeal is upon the judgment roll without any bill of exceptions, and upon this record the presumption is that the evidence by which this defense was established was received without objection, and that the case was tried by consent of the parties, as if such defense had been specially alleged. This being so, appellant should not be permitted to urge here for the first time that no such issue was made in the court below. Horton v. Dominguez, 68 Cal. 642, 10 Pac. Rep. 186. The court below ought to have directed an amendment of the answer so as to conform to the proofs, but the judgment ought not to be reversed because such formal amendment was not made. I do not understand that the case of Ortega v. Cordero, 88 Cal. 221, 26 Pac. Rep. 80, is necessarily opposed to these views. In that case the question was, what effect should be given to a finding which was inconsistent with a fact admitted by the pleadings, and it was in relation to this that the court said that there could be no presumption that the parties consented to treat admitted facts as in issue; that a judgment which was in conflict with a fact admitted upon the record could not be sustained; and that upon such a record there was no presumption that a party waived the benefit of an admitted fact. The question here is different. The finding which is claimed to be outside of the issues does not contradict any fact admitted upon the record, but simply avoids what would otherwise be the effect of matters alleged in the complaint and found by the court to be true. If the plaintiff made no objection to trying such an issue, the court committed no error in admitting the evidence to prove it. If, upon the other hand, such issue was tried and evidence admitted against the objection of appellant, the fact should have been made to appear by a bill of exceptions. Error cannot be presumed for the purpose of reversing a judgment.

C. C. Hamilton and Houghton, Silent & Campbell, for appellants. Ray Billingsley and Jas. G. Scarborough, for respondents.

Paterson, J. On July 14, 1888, the defendants executed and delivered to the Santa Ana, Fair View & Pacific Railroad Company their nonnegotiable note for the sum of $5,000, payable four months after date, which was assigned to the Fair View Development Company, and by the last-named company assigned to these appellants. The court found that the note was given for 50 shares of the capital stock of the company first above named, but that it was made and delivered "upon the sole consideration and inducement of the promise and assurance of said company that it would complete its railroad from Fair View to the Pacific ocean before the maturity of said promise in writing, to wit, within 60 or 90 days from said date; that the said company failed to complete its railroad, or any part thereof, * * * within the said time, * * * and that no part of said railroad between said last-named points has at any time been commenced and constructed or completed; that by reason of such failure the consideration of defendants' agreement to take said stock, and of their promise in writing set out in the complaint, has wholly failed;" but that the note "was not delivered upon the express condition that the railroad * * * would be completed * * * within sixty or ninety days from its date, nor upon condition that if said road was not so completed defendants would not have to pay said instrument, or any part thereof. The court further found that the defendants notified the company of their failure to complete the road within the time specified, demanded the return of their note, and afterwards on answering herein brought the certificate of stock into court, and deposited it with the clerk for the plaintiffs. The defendant R. E. Hewitt testified that on July 10, 1888, Dr. Bailey stated to him that he was a stockholder, secretary, and director in the railroad company, and that there was a limited amount of the capital stock not sold, "less than $15,000 of the original $60,000 issue, and that he was authorized to dispose of part of this to his friends;" that the company was going to increase the stock to $200,000 or $300,000, and place it on the market at once; "that the railroad was going right on from Fair View to the beach within sixty or ninety days at the furthest, and that he would take the stock if he could; that he held now a large amount of stock in the company;" that on the 13th the doctor came to his house, and said that "the engine and rolling stock of the company was paid for, but that the road was not doing much more now than paying expenses, but that it would be on a good, paying basis as soon as it was extended to the beach, and that everything was ready to do this;" that on the 14th the doctor said he could rely implicitly upon his statements as a friend; that he would not make them unless they were true; and from his position in the company he knew that if defendants did not take the stock they would regret it; that the doctor insisted upon his taking 50 shares or more; that witness said to him he did not have the faith in this enterprise that the doctor had, and unless the road was completed to the beach he would not have the stock as a gift.

The findings of the court show that the statements of Dr. Bailey, testified to by the defendant, were made without any fraudulent purpose; that the defendants were prevented from making any investigation by reason of the statement of the doctor that he was the secretary and director of the company, and owned a large amount of stock therein, and from his position in the company he knew his statements were true, and that defendants could rely upon them; that the defendants believed the statements made by Bailey, and, relying upon them, were induced to make the note, and agree to take 50 shares of the capital stock of the company. We do not think that the facts shown by the record and found by the court constitute any defense to the action. The rule is well settled that statements concerning the happening of a future event cannot be relied upon to avoid subscriptions obtained by an agent of a corporation. Relating, as they do, to the probability or improbability of the happening of a future event, they must necessarily be matters of opinion merely. Morawetz states the proposition thus: "A statement made by an agent obtaining subscriptions for shares in a railroad company, to the effect that the proposed road would be built upon a certain route, or within a certain period of time, would not render a subscription made upon the faith of it voidable, though the statement be made with the intention to deceive, and the road be not built upon the route, or within the time, indicated." 1 Mor. Priv. Corp. § 98. And a large number of cases are cited in support of the text. See, also, Thomp. Liab. Stockh. §121. It is unnecessary for us to indorse the rule thus stated to its full extent, because, as we have seen, the court expressly found that the representations of Dr. Bailey were not fraudulent. The construction of the road to the ocean was no part of the consideration of the note; the findings negative the averment of the answer that the note was given "upon the express condition" that the railroad should be completed within 90 days. The matters relied upon, to be available as a defense, must be shown to have been a condition agreed upon by the parties. There is nothing in the cases cited by respondents inconsistent with the views we have expressed. The fair import of the testimony is that the representations referred to were the mere confident expression of opinion of one member of the board of directors that the road would be completed within 90 days, and that the defendants, placing confidence in that opinion, executed the note in suit. The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial.

We concur. HARRISON, J.; GAROUTTE, J.

BEALL v. FISHER. (No. 14,776.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 9, 1892.)

EVIDENCE—CONTRADICTING DEEDS.

Under Civil Code, § 1625, providing that the execution of a contract in writing supersedes all the oral negotiations or stipulations concerning its matter which preceded or accompanied the execution of the instrument, and Code Civil Proc. § 1856, providing that, when the terms of an agreement have been reduced to writing by the parties, it is to be considered as containing all those terms, and that the term "agreement" includes deeds as well as contracts between parties, evidence of oral agreements made during negotiations leading up to the execution and delivery of deeds in exchange of land, and contradictory of such deeds, is incompetent.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. HARRIS, Judge.

Action by J. W. Beall against S. C. Fisher for breach of an oral contract. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Oregon Sanders and Church & Cory, for appellant. H. H. Welsh, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. On May 12, 1890, plaintiff was the owner of 320 acres of land situated in the county of Fresno, subject to a mortgage to secure his debt to the mortgagee, then amounting, principal and interest, to about $5,700. At the same time defendant owned 1,010 acres of land situated in Tulare county, subject to a mortgage to secure his debt for the principal sum of $6,060, on which had then accrued about $118 interest. On that day verbal negotiations were commenced between plaintiff and defendant for an exchange of their lands, and proceeded so far that they supposed they understood each other as to the terms upon which the exchange was to be made. About 10 days thereafter (May 22d) they met at the office of Mr. L. L. Cory, an attorney at law and notary public, for the purpose of executing the deeds and other writings necessary to effect the exchange. Nothing of their previous negotiations had been reduced to writing. Mr. Cory drew the deeds and other papers, which were then executed, consisting of a deed from plaintiff to defendant of the land in Fresno county, subject to the mortgage above mentioned, which mortgage the defendant by the terms of the deed assumed and agreed to pay; also a deed from defendant to plaintiff of defendant's land in Tulare county, which deed contained the following: "This grant is made, subject to a mortgage for $6,060, to the California Savings & Loan Society, which the grantee assumes and agrees to pay;" and also a promissory note of defendant to plaintiff for $3,000, to secure which defendant executed to plaintiff a mortgage on the land in Fresno county which had been conveyed to him by the plaintiff. This action is founded upon what is alleged to have been the verbal agreement on May 12, 1890. Plaintiff alleges that the verbal agreement was to the effect that the defendant was to pay the interest upon his mortgage on the Tulare county land up to the date when the deeds should be executed, and also "to pay said plaintiff upon the day when said conveyance and exchange should be made, as one of the considerations for said exchange, the sum of $360, the difference between $5,700, amount of mortgage upon plaintiff's land, and $6,060, amount of mortgage upon said defendant's land." Plaintiff also claims that defendant is indebted to him in the sum of $20, for interest on the note and mortgage for $3,000, above mentioned. It is alleged that defendant has refused to pay any of these several sums. The defendant denies the alleged verbal agreements, and alleges, in substance, that all verbal negotiations for the exchange of lands were merged in the above-mentioned deeds, note, and mortgage. The court found for plaintiff on all the issues, and rendered judgment in his favor for the amount of the several sums claimed. Defendant appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

1. Appellant contends that all prior oral negotiations and agreements between the parties were merged in the deeds, mortgage, and promissory note drawn by Cory, and executed by the parties on May 22, 1890; and that the court erred in admitting in evidence, against defendant's objections, such prior negotiations; and this point seems to be well taken. Section 1625 of the Civil Code provides that "the execution of a contract in writing, whether the law requires it to be written or not, supersedes all the oral negotiations or stipulations concerning its matter which preceded or accompanied the execution of the instrument." And it is provided by section 1856 of the Code of Civil Procedure: "When the terms of an agreement have been reduced to writing by the parties, it is to be considered as containing all those terms;" that, as between the parties, there can be no other evidence of the terms of the agreement, except in certain cases, of which this is not one; and further declares that "the term 'agreement' [used in this section] includes deeds or wills, as well as contracts between parties." Nicholson v. Tarpey, 89 Cal. 617, 26 Pac. Rep. 1101; Whart. Ev. §§ 1014, 1054.

In this case the plaintiff was permitted to testify, not only to prior negotiations, but also to alleged prior agreements flatly contradictory of the terms of the deed which he accepted from the defendant; not for the purpose of disputing, correcting, or construing the deed, but for the purpose of compelling the defendant to pay money which, by the plain terms of the deed, he (plaintiff) had assumed and agreed to pay. That the negotiations were continued up to and during the time the deeds were being drawn by Mr. Cory, and that plaintiff accepted the defendant's deed with full knowledge of its contents and meaning, is made clear by his own testimony, as follows: "When the papers were drawn up, Mr. Fisher, G. Frank Abbott, Mr. Cory, and myself were present. I told Mr. Fisher at that time that there was a difference of over $300 due me. I had spoken to him several times of the difference in the mortgages in my favor. Mr. Fisher said that he was not to pay that, that he would not pay it, or something. Don't know exactly what he did say. He expressed himself as not desiring to pay it. Question. Didn't he say that that was not the agreement; that it was all understood, and that was not the agreement; and that he was to give you a mortgage for $3,000? Answer. Just what he said I couldn't tell you. Q. Was not that the substance? A. He said he was not to pay that; was not going to pay it. This took place before the papers passed. After that I took the deed, and accepted the $3,000 mortgage. I could as a matter of fact have refused to have gone on with the trade then. I thought of doing it, but did not. Mr. Fisher had refused to pay me this money. I didn't know that he positively refused to pay it. He said that was not his understanding. He never agreed at any time after that to pay it. At the time the trade was made and the deed and papers passed he didn't agree to it. At that time I told him, I said there was a difference there which was due me. Mr. Fisher said he didn't understand he was to pay it. I didn't say, 'All right, let's go ahead.' After this the papers passed, my deed to Mr. Fisher and his deed to me."

2. As to the count for $20 interest on the mortgage for $3,000, the evidence was not subject to the objection above considered, and, though conflicting, was sufficient to justify the finding upon that count. I think the judgment and order should be reversed, and a new trial granted.

We concur: Belcher, C.; Temple, C.

Per Curiam. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed, and a new trial granted.

PHELPS v. BROWN et al. (No. 13,277.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 9, 1892.)

Sale of Real Estate—Abandonment—Recovery of Payment—Agent—Action against.

1. Where a purchaser of real estate defaults before the execution of a deed, and the vendor abandons the contract of sale by reason of such default, the purchaser may recover back the part of the purchase money paid on the land; and this, though it was stipulated that it should be forfeited if the contract should not be performed. Drew v. Pedlar, 25 Pac. Rep. 749, 87 Cal. 443, followed.

2. Where a real-estate agent, employed by the vendor in a sale of land, holds the receipt given the purchaser by his principal for money paid thereon, and afterwards the sale is abandoned by the vendor, and the money returned to the agent, who delivers up the receipt, he is so far acting as the agent of the purchaser in the receipt of the money that the latter may maintain an action against him to recover it.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; John Reynolds, Judge.

Action by one Phelps against Brown &

Ensign to recover back money paid on the purchase price of land. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

T. H. Laine and Laine & Hatch, for appellant. Crandall & Biddle, for respondents.

Beatty, C. J. This is an action by the vendee in a contract for the purchase and sale of lands to recover back the sum of $500, paid at the date of the contract as a forfeit. The decision of the superior court was against the plaintiff, and she appeals from the judgment on the judgment roll. The following are the material facts disclosed by the record: "In June, 1887, one Norton and wife owned a tract of land in Santa Clara county, which was incumbered by a mortgage for $9,000, and the plaintiff, a married woman, owned a house and lot in the city of San Jose. The Nortons wished to exchange their land for the lot of plaintiff, and to negotiate the exchange they employed the defendants, who were real-estate agents doing business in San Jose, as partners under the firm name of Brown & Ensign, and orally agreed to pay them $500, as a commission, if the exchange should be made. The proposition of the Nortons was that they would convey their land to the plaintiff for $20,000, and that in payment thereof she should assume and pay the mortgage on the land, and should convey her lot to them for $6,500, and pay to them the balance of $4,500 in cash, when the deeds should be executed. This proposition was put in writing and given to the defendants, and they delivered it to the plaintiff. She was willing to accept the proposition and make the trade if she could realize $6,750 for her lot, and not otherwise. The defendants then agreed to pay her $250 out of their commissions when the trade should be consummated. This arrangement was satisfactory, and she thereupon drew her check upon a local bank for $500, payable to the Nortons, and handed the same to the defendants, as a deposit or first payment. The defendants on the same day gave the check to the Nortons, who executed a receipt therefor, closing with the words, 'trade to be finished within two weeks from date, or this deposit to be forfeited without recourse. Title to prove good or no sale, and this deposit to be returned.' A few days later the defendants handed back to the plaintiff her check, and she thereupon gave to them, in place of the check, $500 in money, which they at once paid over to the Nortons. Subsequently it appeared from the abstract of title furnished by the plaintiff, that an attachment, issued in an action against her husband, had been levied on her property; and on learning this the Nortons refused to accept her deed, or to carry out the proposed exchange, unless she would have the attachment removed. She offered to give them a warranty deed, but refused to procure the discharge of the attachment. The Nortons were ready and willing to complete the trade, and tendered a deed of their property to plaintiff, but she never offered to convey to them an unincumbered title to her property, and never tendered or offered to pay the balance of the purchase money. Thereupon the Nortons abandoned the trade, and without the knowledge of plaintiff, and without any directions as to the disposition to be made of the money, returned the $500 to the defendants, and the latter returned to them their receipt, with an indorsement thereon as follows: 'Money returned and their receipt is canceled. Brown & Ensign. July 25, 1887. We agree to release the signers of this receipt from any expense, legal or otherwise. Brown & Ensign.'"

Upon these facts two questions arise: First. Was the plaintiff entitled to receive her money back when the Nortons abandoned the trade? Second. If so, can she recover it back from these defendants?

It is assumed throughout the argument, and we shall so assume without deciding, that the failure or refusal of plaintiff to clear her land of an attachment levied upon it in a suit against her husband was a failure or refusal to do something which her contract bound her to do, and that she thereby placed herself in default exactly as if she had refused to pay an installment of the purchase price when due. But assuming this to be so, and that the Nortons were not in default when they abandoned the trade and put an end to the contract, the plaintiff nevertheless immediately became entitled to receive back the $500 which she had paid, less the actual damage caused by the breach of her contract. This proposition is fully sustained by two recent decisions of this court: Cleary v. Folger, 84 Cal. 316, 24 Pac. Rep. 280, and Drew v. Pedlar, 87 Cal. 443, 25 Pac. Rep. 749. Respondents, however, insist that these decisions are in conflict with later as well as earlier decisions of this court; citing Englander v. Rogers, 41 Cal. 420; Scott v. Glenn, 87 Cal. 221, 25 Pac. Rep. 405; Dennis v. Strassburger, 89 Cal. 583, 26 Pac. Rep. 1070; Easton v. Montgomery, 90 Cal. 307, 27 Pac. Rep. 280; Newton v. Hull, 90 Cal. 487, 27 Pac. Rep. 429; Anderson v. Strassburger, 92 Cal. 38, 27 Pac. Rep. 1095.

It is true that in the case of Cleary v. Folger, which was decided in department, and never brought under review of the court by petition for hearing in bank, it was held, contrary to the earlier and later decisions, that, in case of mutual and dependent stipulations to be concurrently performed, both parties are in default if the time of performance passes without tender of performance on either side, and that the contract is at an end. As to this proposition, that case has been expressly overruled in Newton v. Hull, 90 Cal. 492, 27 Pac. Rep. 429, and the correct rule of the earlier cases restored; but the further proposition involved and decided in that case, and in Drew v. Pedlar, viz., that, when a contract of sale and purchase of lands is abandoned or rescinded by the parties, the vendee, though in default, may recover back installments paid of the purchase money, less the actual damage to the vendor occasioned by his breach of contract, has never been reversed or modified. In Drew v. Pedlar the parties expressly stipulated that $1,000, paid at the date the contract, should be retained by the vendor as liquidated damages in case of failure by the vendee to complete the purchase, and this stipulation was held void under the statute. In Cleary v. Folger it was held, and we think correctly, that a stipulation to forfeit the first payment in case of failure by the vendee to complete the purchase was, in effect, a stipulation for liqudiated damages, and void. In both cases it was held that the vendee could recover subject to the right of the vendor to recoup his actual damage. In this case the plaintiff's right to recover does not depend on the proposition erroneously decided in Cleary v. Folger, for the contract with the Nortons was ended by their voluntary abandonment of it in consequence of her failure to clear the title to the property which she was to convey in the exchange. The contract was at an end, and the Nortons were left with plaintiff's money in their hands. There is no claim in the pleadings or finding by the court that they were actually damaged by the failure of plaintiff to complete the tranastcion; they could not retain the $500 as liquidated damages; and therefore it became their duty to pay it back. There is not the slightest conflict in the decisions of this court as to these points. In each of the several cases cited and relied on by respondents, in which the vendee of land was defeated in an action to recover purchase money, the decision went upon the ground that the vendee was not only not in default, but the contract was still in force. Scott v. Glenn, 87 Cal. 221, 25 Pac. Rep. 405; Dennis v. Strassburger, 89 Cal. 583, 26 Pac. Rep. 1070; Easton v. Montgomery, 90 Cal. 307, 27 Pac. Rep. 280; Anderson v. Strassburger, 92 Cal. 38, 27 Pac. Rep. 1095. The respondents endeavor to distinguish Drew v. Pedlar from this case, upon the ground that there it appeared that the vendee long after he was in default, and the vendor had elected to treat the contract as abandoned and rescinded, had made a tardy offer of performance. But, while the fact was as the respondents claim, the decision did not proceed upon that distinction, but upon the broad ground above stated, as to which this case is practically the same. We are entirely satisfied with the correctness of the decision in Drew v. Pedlar, and upon that authority hold that when the Nortons abandoned their contract the plaintiff was entitled to receive her $500 back.

As to the second question above stated, the respondents claim that there can be no recovery against the defendants, even if the Nortons were liable to refund the purchase money paid, and they rely upon the decision in Bogart v. Crosby, 80 Cal. 195, 22 Pac. Rep. 84. But this case is very different from that. There the defendants were agents for the vendors exclusively, and they claimed the money as their own against both parties to the contract. They did not receive it under any agreement, express or implied, to pay it over to the vendee or to assume the liability of the vendor. Here the facts found by the superior court fully justified its conclusion "that the defendants on receiving the $500 from the Nortons took their place as to the money and assumed all liabilities as to the plaintiff that the Nortons had incurred." But, more than this, the findings show clearly that the defendants received the money as plaintiff's agent and for her use. They held the receipt of the Nortons as her agents, and when they gave it up they canceled it as her agents. Unless they were her agents for that purpose they had no right to deliver up and cancel that receipt on return of the money, and having assumed to represent her for one purpose they cannot be heard to say they did not represent her for the other. The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the superior court to enter a judgment for the plaintiff on the findings.

CORPORATIONS—ACTION AGAINST STOCKHOLDERS—RETURN OF EXECUTION—RES JUDICATA.

1. A judgment creditor who has had an execution returned unsatisfied against a street railway corporation may maintain an action against its stockholders to recover, for the benefit of all creditors who may desire to be made parties, the amount due upon unpaid subscriptions for stock. 27 Pac. Rep. 674, affirmed.

2. The liability of the stockholders is several, and it is not necessary to make them all defendants. Hatch v. Dana, 101 U. S. 205, followed. 27 Pac. Rep. 674, affirmed.

3. Proof that a creditor has exhausted his legal remedy against the corporation is shown by the judgment and an execution thereon returned unsatisfied. 27 Pac. Rep. 674, affirmed.

4. Evidence that the company owns a large amount of personal property besides its road and franchise is inadmissible. 27 Pac. Rep. 674, affirmed.

5. The judgment is conclusive against the company and its stockholders, and they cannot show that the indebtedness for which the judgment was recovered arose upon a contract which was ultra vires. 27 Pac. Rep. 674, affirmed.

6. One to whom stock is issued, and in whose name it appears on the books of the corporation, is liable to the creditors of the corporation for the unpaid subscriptions, although he is not the owner of such stock. 27 Pac. Rep. 674, affirmed.

2. Civil Code, § 322, giving to a corporate creditor a right to sue one or more stockholders for a proportionate part of his claim, does not exclude the creditor's equitable right to collect his claim from unpaid stock subscriptions, and this right is not dependent on the statutory remedy being inadequate, owing to insolvency or absence from the state of some of the stockholders.

J. E. Deakin, (A. Brunson, of counsel,) for appellant. A. E. Cochran and Byron Waters, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. Many of the questions discussed by counsel were considered in Baines v. Babcock, 30 Pac. Rep. 776, (No. 14,224,) this day filed, and upon the authority of that case must be determined adversely to the contentions of appellant herein. In this case the corporation was not made a party. No objection on the ground of nonjoinder of the corporation as a party defendant was made in the court below by demurrer or by answer. The defect was therefore waived. Section 434, Code Civil Proc. Doubtless the corporation should always be made a party to the suit; but it is not an indispensable party, unless the object of the action is to secure an adjudication of the rights and liabilities of all the parties, and a final settlement of the affairs of the company. When the purpose of the suit is to compel payment of a debt out of the unpaid subscription of a single stockholder, the corporation, if not made a party, cannot be prejudiced by a judgment against the stockholder, and, if he sees fit to go to trial and judgment without objecting to the nonjoinder of the corporation, he will not thereafter be heard to complain. It is not claimed in this case, as it was in Baines v. Babcock, that all the stockholders were necessary parties defendant. It is contended by appellant that the Santa Rosa Land & Improvement Company is similar in its nature to the South Mountain Consolidated Mining Company, the mining corporation considered by Judge SAWYER in 8 Sawy. 366. It is a sufficient answer to this contention to state the purposes for which the corporation under consideration was organized, viz., "for the purpose of acquiring real property by purchase or otherwise in the county of San Diego, state of California, buying and selling the same, building hotels, street railroads, and otherwise developing lands." It stands upon the same basis as the "banking, railroad, insurance, and like commercial corporations, having a subscribed capital stock," referred to by Judge SAWYER. It is claimed that there is another distinction between this case and the case of Baines v. Babcock. It is said that the complaint in the latter case showed that some of the stockholders of the corporation were either insolvent or absent from the state, and that no such claim is made in this case; that there is no necessity shown, therefore, for invoking the powers of a court of equity, plaintiff having a complete and adequate legal remedy, under section 322 of the Civil Code; that the decisions cited by respondent "were all rendered at places or in times when there was no legal remedy available to the creditor except one against the corporation itself;" and that there is no authority for holding that "an equitable remedy can be pursued by a creditor before he has exhausted his legal remedies, both against the corporation and the stockholders," unless by reason of the insolvency or absence from the state of some of the stockholders, as in the case of Baines v. Babcock, the legal remedy afforded by the statute would not be adequate. We do not think there is any materiality in the distinction pointed out, or any merit in the contention made thereon. It is true in Baines v. Babcock the complaint alleged that some of the stockholders were "nonresidents or insolvent persons," which allegation was denied, but the court treated the issue as an immaterial one, and found that the stockholders referred to were not necessary parties to the action, and this view was sustained here. In Morawetz on Private Corporations it is said that a judgment creditor, after the return of his execution nulla bona may maintain an action "to compel the shareholders to contribute so much of the capital subscribed by them as will be sufficient to satisfy the claims of the plaintiff and other creditors who may come in for payment. Such a proceeding may be maintained, although the creditors have a statutory right to proceed against the shareholders directly at law." Section 866. The error of the appellant arises from his failure to consider the unpaid subscriptions as a corporate asset, which a creditor has the undoubted right in equity to follow wherever the same may be found, when his remedy at law against the corporation has been exhausted. The corporation and the stockholder are as distinct and separate debtors, with different undertakings, as if they had never had any business relations with each other, and we know of no rule which requires a creditor to exhaust his legal remedies against all his debtors before he can in equity pursue the assets of one of them against whom he has exhausted his legal remedy. Mr. Thompson, in his chapter on "The Forum: Law or Equity," says: "The elemental rule of equity jurisprudence, that a court of this character will deny its aid to a suitor who has an adequate remedy at law, except in cases of concurrent jurisdiction, applies to this subject only so far as that these courts withhold their aid to a judgment creditor of a corporation in respect of the liabilities of shareholders, when there are legal assets of the corporation within reach of his execution. The general rule is that, although a creditor has a concurrent remedy against a shareholder at law, this does not oust the jurisdiction of the courts of equity." Thomp. Stocks, § 265. Gwin v. Sweetser et al. (No. 14,857.)

Sale of Land—Description.

Where a contract is made to sell a certain ranch, and the deed executed in pursuance thereof conveys all the land that the vendor has pointed out to the vendee as constituting the ranch, or has proposed to sell to him, and all that the vendee understood to be included in the agreement at the time it was executed, the vendee cannot afterwards claim that an adjoining tract belonging to the vendor, and of which another person had possession under a contract of sale, should have been conveyed to him under the agreement as part of the ranch.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Solano county; A. J. Buckles, Judge.

Action by S. R. Gwin against A. I. Sweetser and others for specific performance. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Horace Hawes, for appellant. Geo. A. Lamont and J. M. Gregory, for respondents.

Vanclief, C. On February 11, 1888, a written agreement was executed between the plaintiff and defendants, whereby the defendants, among other things, agreed to convey to plaintiff, on or before March 15, 1888, a clear title to "the Andrew Sweetser ranch, in Solano county, Cal., said ranch being situated about one mile northwest of Cordelia, said ranch consisting of about eight hundred and twenty (820) acres, the same being the ranch on which the said Andrew Sweetser now resides." On February 28, 1888, the defendant Andrew I. Sweetser conveyed and delivered to plaintiff the ranch in Solano county on which he resided, consisting of 810 acres, and known as the "Andrew Sweetser Ranch." After residing upon that ranch about a year, the plaintiff claimed to discover, for the first time, that Sweetser had not conveyed to him all the land described in the agreement, but had intentionally omitted an adjoining tract of 69 acres, which, he claims, was a part of the Andrew Sweetser ranch, at the dates of the agreement and the deed of conveyance. The object of this action is to enforce specific complete performance of the agreement on the part of the defendants by a decree of the court requiring Sweetser to convey to plaintiff the adjoining tract of 69 acres. The trial was by the court, and judgment passed for the defendants. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The principal ground upon which appellant asks a reversal of the judgment is that the evidence was insufficient to justify the findings of fact. Upon a careful reading of the evidence, which occupies 73 pages of the transcript, I think it so plainly and satisfactorily sufficient that no detailed statement of it here is necessary. Plaintiff's testimony shows that he examined the ranch, with the view of purchasing it, before the agreement was executed, when the boundaries thereof, as described in the deed, were shown him by Sweetser; and that the only reason he had for claiming the additional 69 acres was that, upon examination of the county records, about a year after the execution of the deed, he discovered that the record title of the 69 acres stood in the name of Andrew Sweetser, and hence he inferred that it must have been a part of the Andrew Sweetser ranch, named in the agreement, although it had not been pointed out to him as such by Sweetser before the execution of that agreement; and he admits that the deed executed to him by Sweetser describes all the land that Sweetser pointed out or proposed to sell, and all that plaintiff understood to be described in the agreement at the time it was executed. Furthermore, the undisputed evidence on the part of the defendants shows that Sweetser contracted to sell the 69 acres in dispute to one E. W. Hitchins in 1885, and then gave Hitchins possession of the land and a bond for a deed thereof on payment of the purchase money, on or before January 1, 1890, which bond was duly recorded in 1885; and that Hitchins resided upon, improved, and cultivated that tract continuously from 1885 until after February, 1888. It was also proved, and plaintiff admitted, that he had proposed to purchase that tract from Hitchins after the execution of the deed from Sweetser. Finally, the effect of the whole evidence is to prove clearly and satisfactorily that defendants fully performed their part of the written agreement according to its true meaning as understood and intended by both parties. There is nothing in appellant's objections to the admission of evidence offered by respondents requiring special consideration. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

Reclamation District No. 124 v. Gray.

(No. 14,725.)

Reclamation Districts — Legislative Recognition.

In an action for an assessment levied on defendant's land by the commissioners of a reclamation district, evidence of legislative recognition of the district is conclusive proof that the district existed from the time of such recognition, and it cannot be contended that the assessment, made after such legislative recognition, was invalid, on the ground that the district was not legally organized.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Colusa county; E. A. Bridgford, Judge.

Action by Reclamation District No. 124 against R. A. Gray. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

H. M. Albery, for appellant. Adams & Adams, for respondent. W. G. Dyas, amicus curiæ.

Foote, C. This action was brought to recover an assessment levied upon the land of Mr. Gray by the commissioners of assessment of an alleged reclamation district in the county of Calaveras. The complaint was demurred to on the grounds that the plaintiff had no authority to sue, because it had never been legally formed or organized by the board of supervisors, to whom the petition for said formation had been presented, in that the said board, in approving the petition, found that certain lands embraced in the proposed district had been improperly included therein, and that therefore such approval was void. The second ground of demurrer is that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, because it appears from the face of the complaint that the reclamation district was never legally formed or organized, for the reason that, upon the petition presented to the board of supervisors, that body found that certain of the lands embraced in the petition for the formation of the district were improperly included, and because of such finding of improper inclusion the approval of the petition by the board "in the manner and in the terms set forth in said complaint was without authority of law, illegal, and void;" that an act of the legislature purporting to legalize and validate the reclamation district only validated, if at all, the district as of the date of the approval of the act, and validated no act of the board of supervisors or of the board of trustees of the district done anterior to the passage of that act, and particularly the acts of the trustees with reference to making by-laws, employing engineers to survey, plan, locate, and estimate the cost of the works necessary for reclamation, and in reporting such estimates to the board of supervisors, and asking for the appointment of commissioners of assessment, and also that the order of the board of supervisors in appointing such commissioners was illegal and void, etc.; that the assessment sought in this action to be enforced was based upon the plans and estimates of the board of trustees presented to the board of supervisors, and upon an order of that board appointing commissioners of assessment anterior to the approval of the creation or validating act of the legislature set out in the plaintiff's complaint. This demurrer was overruled, and the defendant declining further to answer, judgment as prayed for was given and made for the plaintiff, from which this appeal is taken. The appellant contends that the board of supervisors had no right to approve the petition as they did, that the statute did not authorize such an approval, that the action of the board amounted to no approval at all, and that such approval was jurisdictional in its nature, and that hence there was no corporate existence de jure or de facto as to the reclamation district; that if there was no jurisdiction in the board of supervisors to organize the district, then the legislature did not validate its organization by the act passed, approved March 30, 1874; that, assuming such act of the legislature did validate the organization of the reclamation district as of the date of the passage of the curative act, such act could not validate the prior proceedings of the board of trustees and commissioners relative to the assessment on the lands of the reclamation district.

It may be conceded here, but not decided, that the action of the board of supervisors was illegal in approving the petition as they did, and yet it would not necessarily follow that the defendant here could impeach the validity of the organization of the reclamation district, or the acts of the board of trustees and commissioners as to the assessment of the lands in the district now under consideration. To do that is in the nature of a collateral attack on the organization of this district, and the acts of the trustees and commissioners. The question to be decided then is, was this reclamation district in existence as a public corporation de jure or de facto when the assessment was made, and was the assessment valid? The district certainly was a public corporation from the date of the legislative act, for it was said in People v. Reclamation Dist. 108, 53 Cal. 348, in relation to a matter similar to that raised here: "A corporation of this character is, as already stated, a public corporation. Such a corporation can be created, not only by the means and in the manner provided by the general law, but also by special act or by implication of law. Legislative recognition of a corporation is, in many cases, sufficient proof of its existence." It is clear, at least, that, by the passage of the act of March 30, 1874, the reclamation district in question has received the recognition of the legislature as such; and in such a proceeding as this such action must be conclusive proof, not to be gainsaid, that the corporation existed from the time of such recognition. The assessment which it is sought here to enforce was made after that date, and seems to have been made in accordance with the statute having reference to the organization of such district. If the board of trustees and commissioners used data furnished by surveys, estimates, and reports made before that time, this was in the nature of evidence considered by them, but does not invalidate their acts, otherwise legal, in levying the assessment. The cases cited by appellant to the effect that, if it appear from the complaint that no reclamation district de jure or de facto is shown to have existed when the assessment was made, a demurrer such as here involved should be sustained, are not in point, as we think. For these reasons we advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur VANCLIEF, C., BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

BALL v. KEHL. (No. 14,696.)

WATER RIGHTS—ADVERSE USER—FINDINGS OF COURT.

1. In an action to enjoin defendant from closing a waste gate in his canal, it appeared that for 12 years plaintiff had used, for irrigation and domestic purposes, "all water discharged through such waste gate at a certain point above defendant's mill, "whenever said mill was not being run or operated;" that at times when the mill was not running defendant permitted plaintiff to so use it, and at other times plaintiff had taken and used the water without express permission; that after so using it for six years plaintiff posted a notice on said waste gate, claiming "all the waste water flowing from the mill race," and the right to divert and use it as "heretofore done." The evidence did not show that defendant or his grantors ever saw such notice, or knew that plaintiff claimed the right to so divert and use the water without permission, or that plaintiff had so taken and used it for a continuous period of five years. Held, that plaintiff acquired no prescriptive right to such water by adverse user.

2. As the record in such case contained written findings of fact and law, and there was no finding on the issue as to adverse user, a waiver of such finding must affirmatively appear, and will not be presumed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; JOHN L. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Action by Johanna Ball, as administratrix of the estate of N. H. Ball, deceased, against Peter Kehl, for an injunction. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Willis, Cole & Craig, (R. E. Houghton, of counsel,) for appellant. H. C. Rolfe and Rowell & Rowell, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. The object of this action is perpetually to enjoin the defendant from closing a certain waste gate in his canal during all such times as he may not be using the water flowing in the canal for the purpose of propelling his gristmill; the plaintiff claiming a prescriptive right to divert the water from the canal through the waste gate, for the purpose of irrigating his land, whenever the water is not being used by defendant for the purpose of propelling his mill. It is alleged in the complaint that, about 30 years before the commencement of this action, the grantors of the defendant constructed a canal about one mile in length, through which they diverted water from Warm creek, and conducted the same to their gristmill, in the county of San Bernardino, for the purpose of propelling the machinery of said mill, but, until within a few days before the commencement of this action, never claimed or used the water for any other purpose; that, subject to the right of defendant to use the water for all purposes of running said mill, the plaintiff, during 12 years before the commencement of this action, appropriated, claimed, and used adversely to defendant, for irrigating his land, all the water discharged from said ditch through said waste gate, at a point about 100 yards above said mill, "whenever the said mill was not being run or operated;" and also alleged that plaintiff "is the owner of the right to the use and flow of water from said canal for irrigation, agricultural and domestic purposes, as aforesaid, whenever the same is not needed for running said mill as aforesaid, and of the right to turn said water from said canal at the place of diversion, as hereinbefore stated." The complaint then proceeds as follows: "That heretofore, to wit, on or about the 10th day of August, 1888, the defendant, without right, and while said mill was not being operated, nor the water of said canal needed or used for operating or running the same, closed the said gates in the side of said canal, and caused the said water to flow down said canal, and away from plaintiff's said premises, and deprived plaintiff of the use thereof; and defendant has ever since said last-named date caused said gates to be closed, and deprived plaintiff of the use of any of said water, notwithstanding a great portion of the time the said water has not been used or needed to run said mill, and said mill has not been run or operated, and defendant threatens to continue so to deprive plaintiff of the use of any of said water at all times, even when said mill is not being run or operated, nor said water needed for running or operating the same." After further alleging irreparable injury as the consequence of being deprived of the use of said water, the plaintiff prays "that defendant be perpetually enjoined from closing said gate, and from depriving plaintiff of the use or flow of the water of said canal through said opening, except at such times as said water may be needed and actually used for running and operating said mill." The answer of defendant specifically denies each allegation of the complaint, except that defendant's grantors constructed and owned the canal and mill, and specifically denies any adverse appropriation or user of the water by the plaintiff or his grantors. Upon certain issues of fact the court found for the plaintiff; and, as a conclusion of law, found that plaintiff is the owner of the right to use water "from said canal through the first waste gate on the west side of said canal, about one hundred yards above the defendant's gristmill, at such times as the accustomed flow of the water in said canal is not used for the propulsion and operation of said gristmill, or for purposes incidental to or necessary for the propulsion and operation of said gristmill;" and thereupon awarded the perpetual injunction prayed for. Defendant's motion for new trial, made on a statement of the case, was denied, and he has appealed from the judgment and from the order denying his motion.

1. Appellant contends that the court erred in denying his motion for nonsuit, made at the close of plaintiff's evidence in chief, on the ground that such evidence did not tend to prove any appropriation or user of the water in question adverse to the defendant or his grantors. The cause of action stated in the complaint, if any, is based upon plaintiff's alleged right to take water from defendant's canal without defendant's permission and against his will; and the burden of proving such right was upon the plaintiff, since, so far as alleged in the complaint, such right was denied. It is admitted in the complaint that the vendors of the defendant constructed the canal and appropriated the water of Warm creek to run their mill, and it is not claimed and does not appear that the capacity of the canal is greater than necessary for that purpose while the mill is running. But it is claimed by plaintiff that the mill has not run all the time, and that, while it was not running, the defendant and his grantors had generally turned the water from the canal through a waste gate about 100 yards above the mill, and thence returned it to the creek through a ditch dug by themselves for that purpose, and all this appears to be true. But there was no evidence introduced by either party, before or after the motion for nonsuit, tending to prove that the plaintiff or his grantors ever, to the knowledge of defendant or his grantors, raised the waste gate, or took a drop of water from the canal without permission of the owner of the mill. It appears, however, that on some occasions, when the mill was not running, the owners permitted plaintiff and others to raise the waste gate and take water from the canal; and plaintiff's intestate—N. H. Ball—testified that on some occasions when the mill was not running, and when he could not find any one of the owners at or near the mill, he had raised the waste gate and taken water from the canal. He said: "I have never been conceded the right to lift the waste gate and turn the water away from the mill when the mill used it, by the previous owners or occupants of that mill. I had raised the gate for years before when the mill was not running. I suppose that was conceded to me as a right. I never asked for permission, and they never gave it. I never asked any one to permit me to do it. I was not forbidden to do it on different occasions, for I never did it when they wanted it at the mill. I would know, because I would ask. I would frequently ask Mr. Davies when he wanted to grind or use the water, and, if he did, I didn't meddle with it. * * * I admit, whenever they are working the mill or working about the premises of the mill, they have a right to use this water, and I claim the right to use it when it is not necessary to run the mill. I suppose that necessity is determined by the owners of the mill; they know when they want to use it. * * * I never constructed any ditch from the waste gate to my premises. I think the water flowed down, whenever they chose to permit it, through the sluice way to the head of the ditch that I now claim, or my reservoir. * * * During the time he (defendant) has been owner there (about four years) I don't know that I ever lifted that gate to let the water down, or lifted it at all. * * * I never asked his permission. I might have told my man to go and see if he wanted to grind, and if he didn't to let the water come down. As I told you before, I didn't want the water when the mill wanted it. * * * I never knew the mill to run on Sunday, and Sunday is all the water I want. If they chose to run on Sunday, I wouldn't expect it. If the population here should increase, and the demand for the products of the mill increase so that it was compelled to run night and day to oblige customers, I would expect no water. I said that I have raised that gate from fifty to a hundred times,—I don't know how many times. It is not the case that on all these occasions I first obtained the permission and informed the parties operating the mill before doing so. I stated I often went to the mill to find out whether they needed the water prior to raising the gate. I often went there to see. I went up there to see if they wanted to use it. It was times when the mill was not running, and Mr. Davies would let the water seep through, to keep the holes from drying up. I went up to see him, and if he didn't want to grind I would use it. If he wasn't there and wasn't grinding I would use it. I didn't claim to take it away from the mill when they wanted it, or claim any right to interfere with the mill."

According to Mr. Ball's testimony, he never claimed the right to take any water from the canal adversely to defendant or his grantors until about 17 days before the commencement of this action. While he admits their right to use the water as they deemed necessary, and also to determine when its use by them was necessary, he does not state that they had notice that he ever took water from the canal without their consent, but only that he sometimes took it when he could not find any of the owners on or about the premises. He always sought the owners, and when he could find them asked them whether they had any use for the water before he took the liberty to raise their waste gate. His own version of the circumstances under which he raised the waste gate when the owners were present unmistakably indicates that he did so only by their consent. His inquiry as to whether they desired to use the water was evidently intended by him, and understood by them, to be a request on his part for permission to use it. Construing his testimony as liberally as possible in his favor, there is nothing in it tending to prove that the defendant or his grantors ever had notice that he claimed the right to take water from their canal without their consent. Mr. Ball further testified that, after having used the waste water more than six years, he posted a written notice on the waste gate, stating that he claimed "all the waste water flowing from the mill race," and claiming the right to divert said water at a point "at the waste gate of said mill race, * * * and to conduct the same through a ditch and ditches to reservoirs, and to and upon said lands, [plaintiff's lands,] as has been heretofore done by me. * * *" This notice was posted March 5, 1883, and Mr. Ball testified: "I do not know what became of that paper. * * * I should judge that it remained there a few months, until the weather took it away, as far as I know." After posting this notice, plaintiff took and used the water as he had done during six years before, and not differently; and he always diverted the water from defendant's "mill race," at a point more than 300 feet below the waste gate. There is no evidence that defendant's grantors ever saw the notice, except the fact that it was posted; and, according to Mr. Ball's testimony, it was destroyed before defendant purchased the property. But, conceding that defendant and his grantors saw it, they were thereby notified only that plaintiff claimed "the waste water from the 'mill race,' to be diverted and used as it had been diverted and used by plaintiff during six years before." The "mill race" mentioned in the notice is the ditch dug by defendant's grantors to conduct the waste water from their waste gate to the creek. Possibly the notice might have had the effect of giving plaintiff a right to all water discharged through the waste gate, and there abandoned by the defendant as waste water; but it contained nothing indicating that plaintiff claimed a right, under any circumstances, to divert water from defendant's canal without his permission. Plaintiff acquired no right to open defendant's canal and take water from it, without defendant's consent, in consequence of the mere fact that defendant was not using the water at the time plaintiff took it. Such an opening of and taking water from defendant's canal was a trespass ab initio, until after it had been openly and notoriously repeated and continued during a period of five years, and, indeed, this seems to be the theory of the complaint. The motion for nonsuit raised the question whether or not the evidence substantially tends to prove that the trespass had been so committed and continued for a period of five years; and, as above shown, it would be a heavy strain upon the evidence to say that it substantially tends to prove that plaintiff was ever guilty of taking water from the canal, to the knowledge of defendant or his grantors, without their express or implied permission. However this may be, surely the evidence does not tend to prove that plaintiff continued so to take the water, even while it was not being used to run the mill, during a continuous period of five years. The burden of proving uninterrupted user, with knowledge of the owner, is on the party claiming by prescription. American Co. v. Bradford, 27 Cal. 361. Interruption of adverse user, however slight, prevents acquisition of title by prescription. Cave v. Crafts, 53 Cal. 135; Water Co. v. Hancock, 85 Cal. 219, 24 Pac. Rep. 645. The use of water by permission of the owner is not adverse. Feliz v. City of Los Angeles, 58 Cal. 74. The plaintiff, having failed to prove any right by prescription, can only have such right as he or his grantors acquired by appropriation of such waste water as defendant may elect to discharge through his waste gate, which right does not include the right to take water from defendant's canal without his consent. Brown v. Mullin, 65 Cal. 89, 3 Pac. Rep. 99. In this connection it is to be observed that there is a plain and substantial distinction between the wrongful taking of water from the ditch or reservoir of another, and the wrongful diversion of it from a natural stream before it enters the ditch or reservoir, (Heyneman v. Blake, 19 Cal. 579; Parks Canal & M. Co. v. Hoyt, 57 Cal. 44,) corresponding with the common-law distinction between trespass vi et armis or de bonis asportatis and trespass on the case. For the purpose of diverting water from Warm creek, it would not have been necessary to break defendant's canal, nor in any mode to take from it the water therein contained, which, being in defendant's possession and under his control, had become his personal property. Had the plaintiff claimed the right to divert water from Warm creek, instead of the right to divert the water from defendant's canal, probably the relative rights of the parties might have been determined by the rules announced in the cases of Ortman v. Dixon, 13 Cal. 34, and Smith v. O'Hara, 43 Cal. 371. But those cases are only partially applicable to the facts of this case. The plaintiff claims no right to take water from Warm creek, and it is clear that he could have acquired no right to the water in defendant's canal by the mere diversion or appropriation thereof, involving, as it would, a trespass upon defendant's property. The only alleged right of the plaintiff is the right to divert water from defendant's canal, without his consent and against his will, at all times when it is not necessarily used by defendant to run his mill; and, if acquired at all, this right could have been acquired only by uninterrupted adverse user during a period of five years. And conceding, for the sake of the argument only, that there was an adverse user during a part of the period of five years, this fact alone would not sufficiently tend to prove an adverse user during that whole period to entitle the plaintiff to recover.

2. But there is no finding upon the issue as to adverse user, and counsel for appellant contend that for this reason the decision is against law. The only answer to this point by respondent's counsel is that, inasmuch as the record does not show that findings were not waived, it must be presumed that they were waived. But where, as in this case, the record contains written findings of fact and law, the presumption contended for has never been indulged. In this case the judgment roll contains what purports to be findings of fact and law, under the following recitals:

"This case having been heretofore tried and submitted upon the pleadings, evidence, and briefs of counsel, the court finds the following facts." Following this are four paragraphs of findings of fact, and under the heading "Conclusions of Law," all four paragraphs of conclusions of law. Under these circumstances, I think there is no presumption that a finding on the issue as to adverse user was waived. I think the judgment and order should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

SOUTHERN PAC. R. CO. v. DUFOUR. (No. 19,067.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 13, 1892.)

PERCOLATING WATERS—APPROPRIATION — DIVERSION — EVASIVE FINDING — FAILURE TO MAKE FINDING.

1. Civil Code, § 1410, provides that the right to the use of "running water flowing in a river or stream, or down a canon or ravine," may be acquired by appropriation. Held, that percolating water which seeped into a spring from a swamp, or wet land surrounding the same, was not subject to appropriation.

2. The fact that a person has appropriated water from a stream fed by a spring on another's land cannot prevent the owner of the land from digging trenches for a useful purpose, and thereby diverting the percolating waters which supply the spring.

3. A finding by the court, in the exact language of the complaint, that plaintiff did not on a certain day appropriate "the waters flowing into and from a certain spring, * * * to the extent of five inches measured under a four-inch pressure," as alleged, is evasive, and does not pass on the ultimate issue as to whether or not there was an appropriation, the date and amount of appropriation being immaterial.

4. In an action to enjoin defendant from digging a ditch and diverting certain waters from a spring, plaintiff claimed that it had lawfully appropriated the waters. The court found that the spring was fed by percolating waters not subject to appropriation, and that the digging of the ditch by defendant was for useful purposes on his own land, and above the spring. Held, that failure to make a finding on the issue as to whether or not there was an appropriation was immaterial, since percolating waters cannot be appropriated. McFarland, J., dissenting.

5. Where defendant at the close of his case withdraws a special defense which has been set up by him in addition to a general denial, and which is relied on by plaintiff to cure a defect in his complaint, an objection or exception must be taken in order that the withdrawal may be reviewed on appeal.

In bank. Appeal from superior court Kern county; A. R. CONKLIN, Judge.

Action by the Southern Pacific Railroad Company against Frank Dufour for an injunction. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

A. B. Hotchkiss and C. H. Wilson, (Jos. D. Redding and J. E. Foulds, of counsel,) for appellant. Mahon & Laird and J. E. Haralson, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. This is an action to restrain respondent from unlawfully diverting certain waters claimed to have been appropriated by appellant under the provisions of the Civil Code. Judgment went for defendant, and this appeal is prosecuted from the judgment and order denying the motion for a new trial. The findings of the court are not attacked, and the facts of the case may be briefly stated as follows: In the year 1888 Dufour acquired title to section 36 of a certain township and range situated in Kern county. Prior to this event said realty was the property of the state. Upon this tract of land was a small tract of marsh or swamp land, in which the water came to the surface of the ground. As early as the year 1880 plaintiff made an excavation or reservoir some five feet in diameter in this marsh, in which the water collected, and from thence it was transferred in a small underground pipe a mile or more distant to the railroad station of Cameron, where it was applied to the various uses of plaintiff. In the year 1886 plaintiff, in pursuance of section 1410[1] et seq. of the Civil Code, posted a notice at the said reservoir claiming five inches of said waters measured under a four-inch pressure, and it is upon these acts and the foregoing provisions of the Code that plaintiff's rights are based. Prior to the commencement of this action defendant made a tunnel into an adjoining hill, and dug a ditch in connection therewith, (said acts being done upon his own land,) for the purpose of procuring water for irrigation and for his sheep. The action of defendant resulted in plaintiff's reservoir becoming dry, and the water collecting in defendant's ditch, and this litigation followed. The court found "that said spring (reservoir) in the complaint described was on the 7th day of October, 1886, and for a long period of time prior to that date, and ever since such date, has been and now is fed solely by percolating waters which seep into said spring from the swamp or wet land surrounding the same, and such spring is not and never has been fed by any running stream of water." The finding is amply supported by the evidence, which clearly indicates that no stream of water runs into or from the bog or spring other than is conveyed away through plaintiff's pipe line. In the face of these facts it is entirely immaterial whether the steps taken by plaintiff under the statute law of the state were strictly within the provisions of that law or not. There was no water at the spot to which plaintiff could acquire the right of use either by statutory appropriation or adverse user, and this principle is supported by unquestioned authority. In Trustees of Delhi v. Youmans, 50 Barb. 316, the matter is exhaustively discussed, and Justice BOARDMAN there said: "The law controlling the rights to subterranean waters is very different from that affecting the rights of surface streams. In the former case the water belongs to the soil, is part of it, is owned and possessed as the earth is, and may be used, removed, and controlled to the same extent by the owner." After citing many authorities, the opinion continues: "These and other cases establish the principle that no action will lie for injuries caused by cutting off subterranean channels percolating the soil or running through unknown channels, and without a distinct or defined course." The facts of this case place it entirely without any recognized exceptions to the foregoing rule, and bring it directly in line, in all essential particulars, with Hanson v. McCue, 42 Cal. 303, where the principles declared in the case of Trustees of Delhi v. Youmans are fully adopted; and this court went to the extent of saying that, in the absence of any proof that the spring was supplied by any well-defined flowing stream, it would be presumed to be formed by the ordinary percolation of water in the soil. In this case, the court having found that the alleged spring or reservoir was fed by percolating waters alone, and the evidence disclosing that no stream of water whatever flowed naturally from the marsh or spring, it is apparent that title to the land carried title to the water, and plaintiff's acts of attempted appropriation created no right or easement, for no water was present which could be the subject of appropriation.

[1] Civil Code, § 1410, provides that the right to the use of running water flowing in a river or stream, or down a canon or ravine, may be acquired by appropriation.

In addition to a specific denial of the allegations of the complaint, by way of a special defense defendant set out that the water flowing from said spring formed a natural water course through defendant's land, and that he was entitled to the use of said water as a riparian owner. At the close of defendant's case he withdrew his special defense, and this action of counsel is assigned as error. Upon an examination of the record, we find no objection or exception taken to the withdrawal of this special defense from the answer, and hence do not perceive how it can be a proper subject for review. If plaintiff, relying on the allegations of the defense to cure a defective complaint, was surprised and misled by such action of counsel, upon a proper showing he would have been entitled to a continuance in order that he might amend his complaint or procure additional evidence, but there is nothing to indicate that he applied for such relief.

The complaint states that on the 7th day of October, 1886, the plaintiff appropriated the waters flowing into and from a certain spring (then follows the location of the spring) to the extent of five inches, measured under a four inch pressure. The answer contains a specific denial of this allegation, and the court found as a fact, and in the exact words of the complaint, that plaintiff did not on the 7th day of October, 1886, appropriate the waters flowing into and from a certain spring (then follows the location of the spring) to the extent of five inches measured under a four-inch pressure. If the denial in the answer had been couched in the language of the finding, it would have fallen before objection, and the finding must likewise fall. It is evasive, and passes upon no material facts involved in the case. The pleadings presented the issue whether or not there was an appropriation of water. That was the ultimate fact, the heart of the case, and in response to that issue the court found that there was no appropriation of water upon the 7th day of October, 1886, to the extent of five inches measured under a four-inch pressure. The date of the appropriation and the amount of water appropriated were immaterial, and we are thus left without a finding as to the ultimate fact. Can this judgment stand in the absence of a finding upon the question of appropriation? It was held in Windhaus v. Bootz, 92 Cal. 623, 28 Pac. Rep. 557, that where the finding of a certain fact necessarily controlled the judgment, the omission of the court to find upon other issues would not constitute reversible error, for findings upon such issues might be placed to the credit of the appellant, and still the judgment stand. Upon this principle of law, respondent contends that, the court having found that the spring was sustained by percolating waters only, other findings became unnecessary, for under the authority of Hanson v. McCue, supra, such fact controlled the judgment in favor of respondent. Considered alone, this finding is not sufficient to accomplish such results, for it is not inconsistent with the fact that a natural stream of water flowed from the spring which might be the subject of appropriation. But the finding that the spring was fed by percolating waters, taken in connection with the additional finding that the digging of the trench or ditch by defendant was for useful purposes, upon his own land and above the spring, inflexibly directs the course of the judgment to the respondent. Conceding that a natural stream of water flowed from the spring, which under Ely v. Ferguson, 91 Cal. 187, 27 Pac. Rep. 587, could be the subject of appropriation, still that fact did not create any barrier which would prevent respondent from digging trenches upon his own land, even though the digging of such trenches resulted in the destruction of the spring as a source of water supply. If respondent's alleged diversion had been located by appellant at a point below the spring, and upon a natural stream flowing therefrom, then the principle of law involved would have been entirely different from that now presented. The land where respondent made his excavation was his own land, and the spring was situated thereon, although that fact is immaterial; for as Justice Crockett said in Hanson v. McCue, supra: "If the plaintiff was the owner of the Dixon spring, with a consequent right to the use of all of its waters, the defendant would have the clear right to dig upon his adjoining land for any useful purpose, notwithstanding he might thereby divert the percolations, and thus destroy the spring." The digging of respondent was upon his own land; he interfered with no natural stream of water, either surface or subterranean; the waters were percolating waters,—a part of the soil itself,—and of which the owner had the free and absolute use. Under such circumstances, the owner of the land cannot be disturbed. This principle is settled law. Hanson v. McCue, 42 Cal. 305; Mosier v. Caldwell, 7 Nev. 363; Trustees of Delhi v. Youmans, 50 Barb. 316; Angel, Water Courses, § 112. It follows that the findings are sufficient to support the judgment. Let the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: BEATTY, C. J.; HARRISON, J.; DE HAVEN, J.

PATERSON, J. I concur. No order was made striking out the cross complaint, but the court finds it was withdrawn. Assuming, however, that it is still a part of the record, and that the court erred in admitting evidence to contradict the defendant's allegation that the water flowing from the spring formed a natural water course, there are no specifications of error. The appellant's contention, therefore, cannot be considered. The findings support the judgment, and there is no specification as to the insufficiency of the evidence to support any of the findings. The failure of the court to find on all the issues is not assigned as ground for a new trial,—it is not alleged that the decision is against law. As the facts found support the judgment, the failure of the court to find on any issue not necessary to support the judgment cannot be considered on the appeal from the judgment. Winslow v. Gohransen, 88 Cal. 450, 26 Pac. Rep. 504.

MCFARLAND, J., (dissenting.) I am not able to concur in the judgment of affirmance. It is true that the pleadings, the objections and exceptions, (and the want of them,) the findings, and certain occurrences at the trial, present such an uncertain, disjointed, and unsatisfactory record that it was difficult to see what was or was not decided in the court below. But I think there should be a new trial, so that, under amended pleadings and proper findings, it may be discovered what the real facts of the case are, and what principle of law is applicable to the rights asserted by the parties; and I think that the deficiencies of the findings are grounds for reversal. In the complaint it is averred, in substance, that "on the 7th day of October, A. D. 1886, the plaintiff appropriated the waters flowing into and from a certain spring, [describing its location,] to the extent of five (5) inches, measured under a four-inch pressure; that it conveyed the said water to Cameron station on its railroad, and used it for supplying its locomotives and employes with water; and that it continued to so use it until the ——— day of February, 1889, when defendant wrongfully diverted it from the pipes and tanks of plaintiff." The answer denies that plaintiff ever appropriated any of said waters at any time, or that defendant wrongfully diverted the same; and avers that since July 31, 1888, defendant has been the owner in fee of certain described land; that the spring is on said land; that "the water flowing from said spring forms a natural water course flowing through defendant's said land," and that defendant, as a riparian owner, uses and has the right to use "said spring and water course" for domestic purposes, watering stock, etc., and that plaintiff, since said July 31, 1888, has, by means of a pipe, tapped "said spring, and the waters flowing therefrom," and diverted them away from defendant's land. It is clear, therefore, from the pleadings, that there is a "water course" having its source at the spring. It is said that defendant "withdrew" that part of his answer which admitted and averred this water course. In my judgment, it certainly was not withdrawn. The part of the answer which contains this averment is called by the parties a "cross complaint." What happened was simply this: After defendant had rested, plaintiff's counsel—for some reason—chose to say that he desired to introduce the so-called "cross complaint" in evidence; whereupon defendant's counsel made the remark, "I desire to say we dismiss the cross complaint." This remark amounted to nothing more than any other expressed desire for something never obtained,—even if any meaning could be attached to the word "dismiss," as therein used. The status of the answer was not changed in the least by the remark, and it would not have been changed if counsel had used the word "withdraw." He could not have withdrawn the answer by taking physical possession of the paper on which it was written, and putting it in his pocket, which would have been a much more palpable thing than the mere expression of a desire to withdraw it. The record could not have been changed to suit counsel's desire without an order of court.

The main issue in the case, therefore, was whether plaintiff had appropriated any part of this water course, and the only findings on this issue were that "the plaintiff did not, on the 7th day of October, 1886, appropriate the waters flowing into and from a certain spring, * * * to the extent of five inches, measured under a four-inch pressure;" and "that plaintiff did, from the 7th day of April, 1866, up to the ——— day of February, 1889, enjoy the uninterrupted use of some water taken by it from said spring," but that the amount was less than five inches. Of course, these findings are utterly irresponsive to the said issue; and there were other findings fully as defective as these.

It is said, however, that defective findings on all other issues are immaterial, because the court found (in findings 6 and 7) that the spring was "fed solely by percolating waters," and not by "any running stream of water, and that the water was taken away from the spring and water course by a trench which defendant dug on his own land near the spring, "with a view of securing water for his sheep and stock." I think that finding 7 is entirely too vague and uncertain to form a basis for the application of certain alleged doctrines about percolating waters. I have not been able to find any case in which it has been held that a spring and water course originating in it can be lawfully undermined and destroyed by a trench or tunnel run for that express purpose, to the injury of a vested right in the water course. And the evidence in the case at bar tends strongly to show that defendant's tunnel and trench were run for the express purpose of destroying the spring and water course; and that the main effect was, not to prevent percolating waters from flowing into the spring, but to compel the waters of the spring and water course to flow out, and down into the trench. I think, therefore, that the findings should have been more specific on this point, and should have stated the facts clearly and fully. It may be remarked that a water course is none the less a water course, because it has its source in a spring fed by "percolating" waters. The case relied on by respondent is Hanson v. McCue, 42 Cal. 303. There were two opinions delivered in that case, one of which was based mainly on Wheatley v. Baugh, 25 Pa. St. 528, (the citation in the opinion being incorrectly given as 23 Pa. St.,) and the other upon Trustees of Delhi v. Youmans, 50 Barb. 316. In the Pennsylvania case the facts were that "a mining corporation, in the course of necessary operations in mining minerals from their own land, interrupted the percolations which supplied a spring on an adjoining tract;" and, of course, the court held that where a miner, working his mine in the usual way, interrupts percolating underground water, the result is incidental to the lawful use of his land, and, if it causes loss to an adjoining proprietor, such loss is damnum absque injuria. In the case from 50 Barb. the facts do not so clearly appear, but the court say that "if the defendant's excavation or ditch drew the water from the plaintiff's spring, instead of stopping the flow of water from defendant's land to such spring, then the defendant would be liable in this action." In Hanson v. McCue itself the facts were materially different from those in the case at bar. In that case, if there had been a natural water course running from the spring, which Hanson had appropriated years before McCue or his grantors had acquired any estate in the land, and McCue had afterwards diverted any of the water to the injury of Hanson's prior right, then the facts would have been similar to those claimed by plaintiff in the present case. But the facts in that case were that McCue's grantor owned the land on which the spring was as early as 1844, in which year he constructed an artificial ditch, by which he carried the water several hundred yards to a vineyard. This ditch crossed a piece of "unoccupied and unclaimed" land, which Hanson did not acquire until a dozen years afterwards. When McCue undertook to change the course of the water, thus leaving the old ditch dry, Hanson claimed that he had acquired a right by prescription to have the water continue to flow in the old ditch; but the court held that there was no such prescriptive right, because McCue would have no right to complain that the water in the artificial channel, after leaving the spring, was used below by Hanson, and therefore there was no "presumption of the grant of an easement." Therefore, as Hanson had no right to the flow of the water through the artificial ditch, it made no difference what McCue did with it; and that consideration was determinative of the case. But in the case at bar plaintiff claims that it appropriated the waters of the spring and water-course to a useful and most necessary purpose, while the land on which they were situated was public land, and years before the defendant had any interest therein. Nearly all the cases in which the disturbance of percolating water has been held harmless have been cases where the party charged has dug a well, or worked a mine, or made some other excavation, in the lawful enjoyment of the ordinary use of his land, and where the loss to the complaining party was merely incidental to such use, and not the result of a direct intent to cause such loss. Two very instructive and exhaustive opinions upon the subject are to be found in Pixley v. Clark, 35 N. Y. 520, and Dickinson v. Canal Co., 7 Exch. 282. I fear that the affirmance of the judgment of the case at bar, as it now stands, will make a precedent that will be misleading as to some interesting and important phases of the law of water rights. I think that the case should be retried under proper pleadings, and that there should be findings upon all the material issues setting forth clearly and fully the pivotal facts of the case.

GUIDERY v. GREEN. (No. 14,474.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 15, 1892.)

PLEADING—AMENDMENT DURING TRIAL—PAROL EVIDENCE.

1. Where, on the trial, objection is made to material evidence offered by defendant on the ground that it is not responsive to any issues made by the pleadings, it is error to refuse to permit defendant to file amendments obviating the objection, when the amendments present no new defense.

2. In an action on a written contract, the defense was that it had been superseded and annulled by a subsequent written agreement, which was silent on the question of consideration. Held, that oral evidence was admissible to show that the consideration was that the former contract should be canceled, and claims thereunder waived.

3. Where a written contract relates to services to be rendered by one of the parties, but is silent as to the compensation to be paid therefor, oral evidence is admissible to show the compensation agreed upon, as such evidence does not tend to vary the terms of the written contract, but to establish an independent collateral agreement, not inconsistent therewith.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Butte county; JOHN W. ARMSTRONG, Judge.

H. V. Reardan, for appellant. John Gale, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiff's intestate, one Frost, brought this action to obtain certain specific relief for an alleged violation of a written agreement entered into between him and the defendant, January 12, 1885. The defendant set up as one of his defenses to the action that the agreement set out in the complaint had been superseded and annulled by a subsequent written agreement, executed in March, 1885, by the plaintiff and one Threlfall on the one part, and the defendant on the other. Upon the trial of the cause the defendant, aft er having proved the execution of the subsequent written agreement, sought to show that it had been executed upon the consideration and agreement between the parties thereto, that the agreement of January 12, 1885, should be canceled and all claims of the plaintiff against the defendant thereunder waived. The plaintiff objected to this testimony on the ground that it was an attempt by parol evidence to vary and contradict the terms of a written instrument, and also that it was not responsive to any issues made by the pleadings. The court having sustained this objection, the defendant then presented certain amendments to his answer in order to obviate the objection that the evidence was not within the issues, which he asked leave to file. To this the plaintiff objected upon the ground "that it is too late; that it is unconscionable; that it is taking us by surprise; and that it shows gross negligence on their part in not asking to amend before,"—which objections were sustained by the court. If the defendant could establish the facts presented by these amendments to his answer, they would constitute a defense to the plaintiff's demand, (Bank v. Stover, 60 Cal. 387;) and for that reason, if for no other, the court should have allowed the amendments, (Stringer v. Davis, 30 Cal. 321.) If by reason of such amendments the court was satisfied that the plaintiff was taken by surprise, and required further time in which to make suitable preparations for meeting such defense, it could have continued the case or postponed the further hearing until the plaintiff should have reasonable time to make such preparation, and at the same time would impose upon the defendant such terms as would compensate the plaintiff for the expense and delay caused thereby. It can very rarely happen that a court will be justified in refusing a party leave to amend his pleading so that he may properly present his case, and obviate any objection that the facts which constitute his cause of action or his defense are not embraced within the issues, or properly presented by his pleading. This rule is especially cogent when the objection to testimony is not that it is then for the first time brought to the notice of the adversary, but that by reason of the language of the pleading it is not within the terms of the issue. The fact sought to be shown by the testimony offered on the part of the defendant was not a defense, then, for the first time presented in the case. The defendant had attempted to set it up as a defense in his original answer, but, by reason of certain phraseology used therein, the court held, upon the objection of the plaintiff, that it did not present an issue that would render the testimony admissible, and, when the defendant asked leave to amend his answer so as to obviate this ruling, the court should have granted his motion. The evidence offered did not purport to vary or contradict the terms of the written instrument set forth in the complaint, nor did it have the effect to add any new term to that agreement. Its purpose was to show that that agreement had been canceled by mutual consent, and had no longer any operative effect. Such evidence is as admissible as is oral testimony that the terms of a written agreement have been fully performed by the parties, or that the instrument evidencing such agreement has itself been canceled and destroyed by the concurrent act of both parties. In either case the object and effect of such evidence is not to change any of the terms of the contract, but to show that the contract has no longer any existence, and therefore cannot be made the basis of an action. The objection that the written agreement could be altered only by an agreement in writing, or by an executed oral agreement, (Civil Code, § 1698,) has no application to the facts offered to be shown. The offer was to show that the subsequent written agreement had been substituted for the original agreement, and the oral agreement, of which proof was offered, was the agreement to make this substitution. It was not an offer to prove an executory oral agreement, but an oral agreement that had been fully executed by the substitution. This, in effect, was an offer to prove a novation. Bank v. Stover, supra Neither did this testimony tend to vary or contradict the terms of the subsequent written agreement, but was merely for the purpose of showing the consideration upon which it was executed. The instrument itself was silent upon the subject of its consideration, and any evidence in reference thereto would not affect its terms or impair their validity. After the defendant had proved the execution of the second written agreement, the witness Threlfall was asked concerning the compensation he and Frost were to receive from the defendant in case they should make the sale therein provided for, and, upon the objection that this testimony would vary or contradict the terms of the written instrument, the court excluded it. The written agreement, however, made no reference to the compensation they were to receive, and the evidence sought was concerning a separate collateral agreement entered into between the parties, and was entirely independent of any of the terms of the written agreement, and the court should have allowed the question to be answered. Proof is always admissible of any collateral parol agreement, or of any independent fact which is not inconsistent with or does not qualify any of the terms of the written contract, even though it may relate to the same subject-matter.

The order is reversed.

DE PEDRORENA v. HOTCHKISS et al. (No. 14,831.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 15, 1892.)

APPEAL — NOTICE — RECORD — MINUTE ORDERS—JUDGMENT BY DEFAULT — ACTION TO CANCEL DEED—PLEADING.

1. Objection that it does not appear that notice of appeal was served, will be disregarded when it is not made and notified to appellant in writing 10 days before the hearing, as required by rule of court.

2. The statute (Code Civil Proc. § 670) does not make "minute orders" part of the judgment roll, and, although printed in the transcript, questions raised thereon cannot be considered on appeal, in the absence of a bill of exceptions.

3. Where an answer is found in the judgment roll, and a minute order in the transcript shows that defendants were permitted to answer, but the decree recites that judgment was taken by default, the judgment will be presumed to be regular.

4. Where, in an action to cancel a deed, the complaint states that the deed was made without consideration, and procured by undue influence, but further shows that there was sufficient consideration, which had failed, and states no facts in regard to the exercise of undue influence, it is sufficient to support a decree for plaintiff, when advantage of its defects is not taken by special demurrer.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; John R. Aitkin, Judge.

Action by Nellie Burton de Pedrorena against A. B. Hotchkiss and H. T. Christian. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant Hotchkiss appeals. Affirmed.

A. B. Hotchkiss, pro se. J. E. Deakin, for respondent.

Temple, C. This appeal is from the judgment, without a bill of exceptions, and practically by defendant Hotchkiss alone, for, although the notice of appeal is signed by Hotchkiss, as attorney for the defendants, the other defendant filed a disclaimer in the lower court, and no point is made here in his behalf.

Objection is made by respondent to the jurisdiction of the court to entertain the appeal, on the ground that it does not appear that the notice of appeal was served. The rules of this court provide that "exceptions or objections to the transcript, statement, the bond or undertaking on appeal, the notice of appeal, or to its service, or any technical objection or exception to the record in civil cases, affecting the right of the appellant to be heard on the points of error assigned, which can be cured on suggestion of diminution of the record, must be taken and notified to the appellant in writing, at least ten days before the hearing, or they will not be regarded." This was not done in this case, and it is quite evident that the objection is one which may be avoided in the mode pointed out. Respondent's attorney states in his brief that he has filed an affidavit in this court which shows that the defect cannot be cured by a suggestion of diminution of the record. No such affidavit is found here in the record, and I know of no warrant for such practice, nor can I see how any such affidavit could be made which might not be controverted. The consequence of failing to give the notice required by the rule cannot be avoided by making the affidavit.

The judgment is by default entered upon defendant's failure to appear and answer. He therefore had no attorney of record, or, if he had, perhaps the proof of service of the notice of appeal might show due substitution of attorneys, if we conceded that such substitution was necessary to sustain the notice of appeal. Notwithstanding the default, an answer on the part of defendant Hotchkiss is found in the judgment roll, yet it is recited in the decree that judgment was taken against the defendant Hotchkiss upon his default, which had been duly entered. There are two minute orders printed in the transcript, from one of which it appears that the default was set aside and defendant allowed to answer upon certain stated conditions, and from the other that the answer filed was stricken out, because defendant had failed to comply with the conditions upon which the default was set aside, and he was permitted to answer. The statute does not make these minute orders part of the judgment roll. Section 670, Code Civil Proc. They are therefore improperly in the record,—there being no bill of exceptions,—and we cannot notice the points attempted to be made in regard to them. Orders striking out pleadings do not constitute part of the judgment roll. Douglas v. Hutchinson, 46 Cal. 49. We must presume, therefore, in favor of the regularity of the judgment. In this case, however, although there is an answer on file, it appears to have been filed after Hotchkiss had made default, and his default had been duly entered.

It only remains to inquire, therefore, whether the complaint is sufficient to support the decree. The complaint shows that plaintiff's ancestor conveyed to appellant's wife certain real estate for the expressed consideration of legal services to be rendered by appellant; that, contemporaneously with the grant, appellant and wife executed an agreement in writing, in which it was recited that the grantor owned certain lots of land (the same conveyed) the title to which was clouded. Appellant agreed to examine the title to all the properties conveyed, to clear the title to such as the grantor owned at his own cost and expense, and then to reconvey one half thereof to the grantor. The grant and agreement were made in 1880; the suit was brought in 1888. It is averred that appellant has not performed or attempted to perform his agreement; that the title to the property is still clouded; and that the conveyance and agreement were without sufficient consideration, and were procured solely by the undue influence of appellant. It is further alleged in the complaint that the appellant has not only made no attempt to perform the agreement which constituted the sole consideration for the conveyance, but, in violation of the trust created by the transaction, has sold a portion of the property, appropriating the proceeds to himself, and repudiating the obligations of the agreement and the trust, and claims to be the absolute owner of the property. The complaint could not be sustained as against a special demurrer. It is inconsistent, illogical, and insufficiently states the facts. It avers that the conveyance was made without consideration, but shows that there was sufficient consideration for the conveyance, which, however, has wholly failed. It avers that the conveyance was procured by the undue influence of appellant, but states no facts or circumstances in regard to the exercise of such influence. If it be conceded that the facts and circumstances ought to have been specifically detailed, yet it is but the case of an insufficient statement, and not the lack of an essential fact. Counsel quotes section 1566 of the Civil Code, and claims that the conveyance was not wholly void, and that plaintiff ought to have proceeded to rescind, as prescribed in the Code. This suit is practically for that purpose. As appellant, according to the allegations of the complaint, had done nothing in the way of performance, and had parted with nothing, but wholly repudiated the contract and the trust relation, nothing was required of plaintiff in the way of placing him in statu quo ante. I therefore advise an affirmance of the judgment.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

CHURCH v. SHANKLIN et al. (No. 14,713.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 15, 1892.)

CONTRACTS—PERFORMANCE.

Where a mortgage is given to secure notes made payable whenever plaintiff shall perfect a certain title to the satisfaction of attorneys named in the notes, the mortgage cannot be foreclosed if the attorneys named, in good faith and from no improper motive, withhold their approval of the title, though the title may be good, in the opinion of the court.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. HARRIS, Judge.

Action by one Church against one Shanklin and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Church & Cory, for appellants. F. Church and R. P. Davidson, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This is an action to foreclose a mortgage given to secure the payment of two promissory notes, for the sum of $5,000 each, payable by defendants to plaintiff "whenever he perfects the title to lots 14, 15, and 16, in block 85, of Fresno, to the satisfaction of Church & Cory, attorneys. * * * Neither principal nor interest to be due and payable until said title is perfected as aforesaid, nor until one year." The record fails to show that Church & Cory refused to express satisfaction with the plaintiff's title through any fraudulent or improper motive. The learned judge of the court below, in determining the issues between the parties, stated he would assume that the attorneys acted in the best of faith, but held that, if the title was in fact good, the defendants could not refuse to pay the note because their attorneys were not satisfied with the title. In this we think the court erred. The case at bar differs in two very material respects from the cases cited by respondent, namely, there was conceded to be a defect in the title at the time the notes were executed and delivered, requiring action on the part of the plaintiff to cure, and the arbitrators selected were not parties to the contract, but were disinterested persons, chosen for the express purpose of passing upon the title. It was doubtless the object of the parties to avoid disputes and expensive litigation; certainly some effect must be given to the stipulation contained in the agreement. To hold that the opinion of the court, as to the validity of the title, can be substituted for that of the arbitrators, would defeat the intention of the parties, and, in effect, make a new contract for them. This the court has no right to do. The parties saw fit to make Church & Cory the umpires between them, and if the latter exercised their best judgment in good faith, and with an honest intention of determining the question as to the validity of the title, their conclusion is final and binding It cannot be subjected to the revisory power of the courts without doing violence to the plain words of the contract. Suppose that Church & Cory had certified that the title was perfect, could it be maintained that the defendants could defeat a recovery on their notes by showing that in fact the title was no better than when the contract was made? We think not. In Butler v. Tucker, 24 Wend. 449, the court said: "The defendant does not set up that part of the covenant which requires the work to be done to his satisfaction, and in omitting to do so he has acted very properly. As to that, it would probably be enough for the plaintiff to aver that the work was in all other respects completed in pursuance of the contract; for if the defendant was not satisfied with such a performance, it would be his own fault, and, as a general rule, a party cannot insist on a condition precedent when he has himself defeated a strict performance. But when parties fix on an umpire and agree to abide by his decision, neither of them, without the consent of the other, can withdraw the question of performance from the common arbiter for the purpose of referring it to the decision of a jury." In Wallace v. Curtiss, 36 Ill. 158, the court said: "No fraud of the inspector is suggested, and if he was deficient in judgment, not being able properly to discriminate the different classes of lumber, it is the misfortune of the defendants in choosing him. By choosing him they relied on his judgment, and must be concluded by it in the absence of all fraud." See, also, Kihlberg v. U. S., 97 U. S. 401; Doll v. Noble, 116 N. Y. 232, 22 N. E. Rep. 406; Whiteman v. Mayor, 21 Hun, 120; Baasen v. Baehr, 7 Wis. 520; McCarren v. McNulty, 7 Gray, 141; Duplex Safety Boiler Co. v. Garden, 54 Amer. Rep. 711, note; Worsley v. Wood, 6 Term R. 722. The appellant offered to show at the trial that other reputable attorneys did not consider the title perfect, or what is known as a "merchantable title," but on objection of the plaintiff the offer was excluded. It cannot be claimed, therefore, that, in rejecting the title, Church & Cory acted capriciously, which, if alleged and proved, might be taken as a badge of bad faith. As there was no allegation in the complaint that the action of the arbitrators chosen by the parties was controlled by fraud or collusion between them and the defendants, or by undue influence of any kind, we think the demurrer ought to have been sustained. The notes, according to their terms, cannot mature, and no action therein can be maintained, until Church & Cory, acting in good faith, state that in their opinion the title has been perfected, or some sufficient reason is shown why they have not done so. The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause is remanded, with directions to the court below to sustain the demurrer to the complaint.

Austin v. Gagan et al. (No. 14,639.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 16, 1892.)

Appeal—Review—Presumption.

1. On appeal from an order granting a new trial, where the motion was made on several grounds, including insufficiency of the evidence, and it does not appear on what ground it was granted, it will be presumed, in support of the order, where there was a conflict of evidence on a material point, that it was granted because of insufficiency of the evidence, and the order will not be reversed.

2. An order granting a new trial, when the evidence is conflicting, will not be reversed because the judge who made the order was not the one who presided at the trial.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Nevada county; John Caldwell, Judge.

Action by one Austin against one Gagan and others. From an order granting a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

F. T. Nilon and Chas. W. Kitts, for appellants. Thos. S. Ford, for respondent.

De Haven, J. The defendants appeal from an order of the superior court granting the plaintiff a new trial. The motion for a new trial was based upon alleged errors of law occurring during the trial, and upon the further ground that the evidence was insufficient to justify the decision of the court. The motion was heard upon a bill of exceptions, and the order of the court granting it does not specify the particular ground upon which the order was made.

1. Upon such a record the rule is firmly established here that the order will not be disturbed if the court was justified in granting the motion upon any of the grounds specified in the notice of motion for new trial. Weddle v. Stark, 10 Cal. 302; Oullahan v. Starbuck, 21 Cal. 414; Altschul v. Doyle, 48 Cal. 535; Pierce v. Schaden, 55 Cal. 407; People v. McAuslan, 43 Cal. 55. If there was a substantial conflict in the evidence, and the order is general in its terms, it will be presumed in support of the ruling of the court below that the order was based upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence, where that was one of the grounds of the motion. The action in this case was one in form to determine an adverse claim to real property, under section 738 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and the title of plaintiff is an entry of the land in controversy as a homestead under the laws of the United States. This entry or homestead filing was made on April 17, 1886, and it was a material question in the case whether at that date the land was known as "mineral land," within the meaning of the laws of the United States, and so not subject to entry as a homestead. The evidence upon this point was conflicting in a substantial degree, and, this being so, we cannot disturb the order of the court setting aside its findings and granting a new trial.

2. Nor is the rule that this court will not reverse an order granting a new trial, where the evidence is conflicting, changed by the fact, appearing in this case, that the judge who granted the motion was not the one who presided at the trial. Altschul v. Doyle, 48 Cal. 535; Wilson v. Railroad Co., 94 Cal. 166, 29 Pac. Rep. 861. It is unnecessary to pass upon the other questions discussed in the briefs of counsel. Order affirmed.

Sirkus v. Central R. Co. (No. 14,482.)

Record on Appeal.

Where, on appeal from a refusal to grant a motion for a new trial on the ground of newly-discovered evidence, the record does not show the evidence given on the trial of the cause, so that it may be determined whether or not the newly-discovered evidence is merely cumulative, it will be presumed that the lower court found that it was cumulative, and that the order refusing a new trial was correct.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Sirkus against the Central Railroad Company. From a refusal to grant a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

H. B. M. Miller, for appellant. Frank Shay, for respondent.

Per Curiam. After a verdict and judgment thereon in favor of the defendant in an action for damages resulting from personal injuries charged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendant, the plaintiff moved for a new trial upon the ground of newly-discovered evidence, and in support thereof presented certain affidavits which he claimed would have produced a different result had the evidence therein disclosed been before the jury. The court denied the motion, and the plaintiff has appealed. The record does not contain any of the evidence which was before the court or considered by the jury at the trial of the cause, and we are unable to determine whether or not the matter contained in the affidavits is cumulative, or whether it so overcomes that evidence that the court below would have been justified in granting a new trial. A motion for a new trial upon this ground is addressed very largely to the discretion of the trial court, and as it is always incumbent upon the appellant to show that error has been committed, so upon an appeal from this order it was the duty of the appellant to make it appear from the record that the court did not properly exercise its discretion. Byrne v. Reed, 75 Cal. 277, 17 Pac. Rep. 201. In the absence of any information respecting the former testimony, we must assume that the judge in passing upon the motion was of the opinion that the matter set forth in the affidavits was cumulative, and would not have changed the result. He was familiar with the testimony that had been given at the trial, and was able to compare the newly-discovered evidence with that testimony, and his action must be assumed by us to have been correct.

People v. Choynski. (No. 20,756.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 17, 1892.)

Blackmail—Instructions.

1. In a prosecution under Pen. Code, § 523, providing for the punishment of one who, for the purposes of extortion, sends a letter "expressing or implying, or adapted to imply, any threat such as is specified in section 519," an instruction that defendant is guilty if the letter on which the charge is based was adapted to imply "any threat," is erroneous, as only threats such as are specified in section 519 are to be considered.

2. In such a prosecution, where the letter threatens to make a charge against the person to whom it is sent, the truth or falsity of the charge is immaterial.

3. In such a prosecution, when the letter does not on its face express or imply a threat, the question whether it is "adapted to imply any threat" is for the jury, and an instruction which assumes that it is so adapted is erroneous.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; J. McM. Shafter, Judge.

I. N. Choynski was convicted of blackmail, and appeals. Reversed.

J. D. Sullivan, for appellant. J. D. Page, for respondent.

Garoutte, J. The appellant was convicted of a felony, to wit, sending a threatening letter with intent to extort money, and now prosecutes an appeal to this court from the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial. The prosecution is based upon section 523 of the Penal Code, which reads as follows: "Every person who, with intent to extort any money or other property from another, sends or delivers to any person any letter or other writing, whether subscribed or not, expressing or implying, or adapted to imply, any threat such as is specified in section 519, is punishable," etc. The letter sent by appellant, and upon which this prosecution was founded, reads: "Office Public Opinion. I. N. Choynski, editor, 137 Taylor street. San Francisco, 20, 2, 1890. O. Livermore, Esq.—Dear Sir: You will please take the matter I have written for and in your behalf, and relieve me of any further responsibility. Respectfully, etc., I. N. Choynski. Will go to press to-morrow, Friday." The demurrer to the information was properly overruled. It is not necessary that a threat should be apparent from the face of the letter, nor even necessary that it should be implied therefrom. The statute says if the language used is adapted to imply a threat, then the writing is sufficient. Parties guilty of the offense here alleged seldom possess the hardihood to speak out boldly and plainly, but deal in mysterious and ambiguous phrases. Mysterious and ambiguous to the world at large, but, read in the light of surrounding circumstances by the party for whom intended, they have no uncertain meaning. In addition to matters of innuendo stated in the information, it is charged in the language of the statute that the writing was "adapted to imply threats," and circumstances showing its adaptation to such purpose were entirely matters of evidence. We pass to a consideration of the instructions of the court.

After reading the section of the Code to the jury, heretofore quoted, the court said: "You will see, gentlemen, that the intent of the statute is to cover every supposable case. It does not require the character of the charge of threatening to be made against the person to be set out. It is not necessary to specify the offense imputed to the person to whom the letter is sent; but if it does express or imply, or is adapted to imply, any threat, the offense is committed." The instruction is too broad, as it tells the jury that, if the letter "is adapted to imply any threat, the offense is committed." The letter must be adapted to imply one or more of those threats specially mentioned in section 519, or the offense is not committed. There was evidence introduced by the prosecution as to the falsity of the charge which was threatened to be made against the prosecuting witness, and the court instructed the jury upon such matters. As the cause must be returned to the lower court for a new trial, we would suggest that, in the character of action here pending, the truth or falsity of the charge is immaterial. It was said in Morrill v. Nightingale, 93 Cal. 456, 28 Pac. Rep. 1068: "Under that kind of menace which consists in a threat of injury to the character of a person, it is entirely immaterial whether such person is guilty or innocent of the crime to be charged. It certainly would be no defense to the accusation of extortion that the charges or publications threatened to be made by the defendant, and by which he obtained valuable property, were true. The truth or falsity of those matters forms no element in establishing the guilt or innocence of a defendant charged with such extortion." The court gave the jury the following instruction: "But if this man is shown guilty of sending this letter, with the motive imputed, he is guilty of this offense, and should be found guilty, no matter as to the consequences, whatever they may be." This instruction is clearly erroneous, for, as we have seen, the letter which forms the foundation of the prosecution does not upon its face either convey a threat or imply a threat; and, in addition to the elements of the offense included in this charge to the jury, as sufficient to justify a conviction, the court should have added that it was not only necessary for the accused to have sent the letter and have had the intent to extort, but the letter must have been such a writing as was adapted to imply a threat. That was a question of fact to be found in the affirmative by the jury before a verdict of guilty could be rendered by them under the law. The charge, taken as a whole, is argumentative; consisting to a great extent of a resume of the evidence, and in many respects encroaching upon the rights of the jury by passing upon matters of fact. We had occasion to refer to this subject in People v. Gordon, 88 Cal 422, 26 Pac. Rep. 502, and there quoted with approval, as we again, do, the following language from People v. Williams, 17 Cal. 147: "The experience of every lawyer shows the readiness with which a jury frequently catch at intimations of the court, and the great deference which jurors pay to opinions and suggestions of the presiding judge, especially in a closely balanced case, when they can thus shift the responsibility of a decision of the issue from themselves to the court; a word, a look, or a tone may sometimes in such cases be of great or even of controlling influence. A judge cannot be too cautious in a criminal trial in avoiding all interference with the conclusions of the jury upon the facts." Let the judgment and order be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

FREEMAN v HENSLEY, Sheriff. (No. 14,741.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 17, 1892.)

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES — CHANGE OF POSSESSION—EVIDENCE.

1. In an action of claim and delivery against a sheriff for seven horses taken on attachment against plaintiff's vendor, it appeared that the sale to plaintiff was bona fide, and that there was an "immediate delivery." The evidence showed that soon after the delivery plaintiff employed a man who had been in the service of his vendor, and put him in charge of the horses; that with six of them in a team he and said vendor, with a like team, did a large amount of plowing for a third person; that while doing the plowing one of the horses of plaintiff's team was exchanged, for convenience in working, for one of the horses of his vendor's team. Held, that the evidence supported the finding that there was an "actual and continued change of possession" following the sale of the property to plaintiff.

2. In such case, evidence as to whom credit was given for the plowing done by plaintiff's team is immaterial, in the absence of an offer to show that the credit was given by his direction.

3. In such case, a witness having testified in chief that he never heard the vendor, during a certain time, make any statement as to the ownership of the property, it was proper to ask him, on cross-examination, if the vendor did not, in a particular conversation during that time, tell him the horses belonged to plaintiff.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. Harris, Judge.

Action by John Freeman against John M. Hensley, as sheriff, to recover possession of personal property. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Church & Cory, for appellant. Van Meter & Warlow, for respondent.

Haynes, C. This action. claim and delivery, was brought by respondent to recover certain horses. The horses in question formerly belonged to one Porter, and were purchased from him by Freeman, October 12, 1889, and were afterwards, on October 24, 1889, attached by defendant, as sheriff, as the property of Porter, in an an action brought by Patterson against Porter and Schell. It is conceded by appellant that there was no actual fraud in the sale of the horses by Porter to Freeman, but he contends that there was no immediate delivery of the property to Freeman, and that the sale was not followed by an actual and continued change of possession, as required by section 3440 of the Civil Code. The cause was tried by the court, and findings and judgment went for plaintiff, and, defendant's motion for a new trial having been denied, he appeals from the order denying it.

What constitutes an "immediate delivery" and an "actual and continued change of possession" is held to be a question of fact to be determined by the court upon the evidence presented in each particular case. Godchaux v. Mulford, 26 Cal. 322; Claudius v. Aguirre, 89 Cal. at page 503, 26 Pac. Rep. 1078. In the latter case it was said: "The circumstances connected with a transfer of personal property are so varied that it would be impossible to frame a rule applicable to each case, or to determine in advance what acts would be sufficient to meet the requirements of the statute." The obvious correctness of this statement precludes any very material assistance either to the trial court or this court from adjudicated cases. There was no conflict in the testimony relied upon to show an immediate delivery of the property by Porter to Freeman. The bargain was made in the evening, the consideration being partly an indebtedness of Porter to Freeman, and the remainder was paid in cash by Freeman. The property consisted of seven horses, harness, and wagon. The next morning Porter took Freeman to the corral, and said to him, "There are your horses; there they are." Freeman and one Strimbeck, who was then boarding with him, took charge of the horses, fed and watered and harnessed them, and Porter executed a bill of sale of the property to Freeman. After this Porter informed Freeman that he had promised one Fletcher to furnish two teams, of six horses each, and a man to drive one of the teams, to do certain plowing for Fletcher, and that Fletcher was to pay $69 per month for the team and a man, and asked Freeman if he would let the team go to do that work. Freeman replied that he wanted the team to work, and that if he could get Strimbeck to drive it he would send the team. Freeman thereupon hired Strimbeck, at $30 per month, to drive the team, and put him in charge of it. Porter also got a man and took another team of six horses, and both teams went to Fletcher's. Fletcher not being ready to commence plowing, the teams were put in pasture at Fletcher's for some days, after which plowing commenced, when Strimbeck took charge of and drove Freeman's team. Some testimony on the part of appellant tended to show that, after plowing commenced, changes were made of horses from one team to the other, so that they became mixed, some of Porter's horses being in Strimbeck's team, and some of Strimbeck's in Porter's. It was testified by respondent's witnesses that one of Strimbeck's horses was too slow for his mate, and one of the horses in the other team was too fast for his mate, and these two were changed for the purpose of making them work better, and this change continued until Porter's team was attached, when they were changed back, and respondent's horses continued in Strimbeck's charge for some days, when they were also attached as the property of Porter. For some time after the two teams went to Fletcher's, he (Fletcher) did not know of any change of ownership, but later, and before the property in question was attached, respondent personally informed him of his ownership, and that Strimbeck was in his employ, and in response to a question as to whether the foreman might discharge Strimbeck respondent said, "No; when the man I put in charge don't suit, send stock and all in."

The principal conflict in the evidence as to the manner in which the teams were used at Fletcher's was in regard to changing horses from one team to another. There was no conflict in the evidence touching the employment of Strimbeck by respondent, nor that he was put in charge of respondent's horses, nor that Porter did not ask or receive any compensation from Fletcher for the services of Strimbeck or the team driven by him. Little weight should be attached to the fact that prior to this transaction Strimbeck had worked for Porter, and had driven horses owned by Porter and Schell, including the horses in controversy. He had, however, been out of Porter's employment for some weeks, and during that time was boarding with respondent. The team did not remain at Porter's, nor was Strimbeck under the control or direction of Porter, but was under the immediate control and direction of Mr. White, the foreman of Mr. Fletcher. I think there was nothing in the temporary change of horses from one team to another, for reasons which probably made each more effective, which should be held to destroy the continuity of the change of possession, especially where it is conceded that the sale was not fraudulent, and where the immediate delivery of the property to respondent was satisfactorily shown; for while it may be true that the burden of showing the actual and continued change of possession was on the plaintiff, and that showing such immediate delivery does not prove the continuance of the change of possession, it nevertheless reflects a light in which the after treatment of the property may properly be viewed by the court. The court did not err in sustaining plaintiff's objection to the question put by defendant to his witness Fletcher, viz., "To whom did you give credit for the $69?" Obviously Fletcher's act could not affect the possession of Freeman or of Porter as a question of fact, nor be evidence of possession in the one or the other, unless made by their direction, and there was no offer to prove such direction. The question put to the witness White by plaintiff upon cross-examination was proper. The witness had testified in chief that he never heard Porter make any statement with regard to the ownership of the property while he was out there. The question on cross-examination called the witness' attention to a particular conversation, when it was asked if Porter did not tell him the team belonged to Freeman. After a careful examination of the evidence, I am of opinion that the court did not abuse its discretion in denying the motion for new trial; and advise that the order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the order is affirmed.

FRASER v. OTT. (No. 14,785.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 19, 1892.)

DEED—DESCRIPTION.

The owner of a block of land conveyed to plaintiff a portion thereof, "being the north 2 acres of block No. 13 of the W. Company's 4-acre blocks," together with a right of way across "the south half of said block." The block was bounded on the west and south by streets 60 feet wide, and, if the block were measured to the center of these streets, it contained 4.65 acres, but, excluding the streets, it contained only 4 acres. Held, that as under Civil Code, § 1112, the title passed by a deed of property abutting on a highway extends to the center thereof, plaintiff's title extended to the center line of the street on the west, but that it was not intended that the two acres conveyed to him should be measured to that line, but that they should be measured exclusive of the street, so as to vest in plaintiff the north half of a block of the same size as the others in that locality.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Orange county; J. W. TOWNER, Judge.

Action by Thomas Fraser against D. A. Ott. From an order granting a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

E. E. Keech, for appellant. F. O. Daniel, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an action to quiet the plaintiff's title to a parcel of land, and the material facts, shown by the record, are as follows: On July 29, 1889, one George B. Lyon was the owner of a block of land, situate in the town of Santa Ana East, in the county of Orange, and on that day conveyed to the plaintiff, by a bargain and sale deed, a portion thereof, described as follows: "The same being the north two acres of block No. thirteen (13) of the Western Development Company's four (4) acre blocks in the town of Santa Ana East, as per map of said Santa Ana East recorded in Book 10, pages 43 and 44, of the Miscellaneous Records of Los Angeles county, California; also the right of way, for street purposes only, over 20 feet of land off the east end of the south half of said block 13 in said town of Santa Ana East, aforesaid." Immediately after executing the aforesaid deed, Lyon executed and delivered to defendant, D. A. Ott, a contract by which he bound himself to sell and convey to Ott the balance of the said block upon certain terms and conditions. The block in question is one of 15 adjoining blocks, laid out by the Western Development Company, and is bounded on the west and south by streets 60 feet wide. Measuring to the center of these streets, it contains 4.65 acres, but excluding the streets, it contains 4.04 acres only. Lyon died before this action was commenced, but his contract with Ott remained in full force, and was binding upon his legal representatives and heirs when the case was tried. In his complaint the plaintiff alleged that he was the owner and in possession of the north half of the said block, together with the right of way for street purposes over 20 feet of land off the east end of the south half thereof; that the defendants, D. A. Ott and the executors and heirs of Lyon, and each of them, claimed an estate or interest in the said premises adverse to the plaintiff, but that they had no estate or interest therein, and their said claims were without any right whatever. By his answer the defendant Ott denied that the plaintiff was in possession of, or had any title to, or any estate or interest in, the land and premises described in his complaint, and further denied that defendant's claim to the said land was without right. And for a further and separate answer the said defendant then set up his contract with Lyon, and alleged that under and by virtue of said contract he claimed an interest in all of the said block of land, except the north two acres thereof, and that he claimed no interest or estate of any kind in or to the said north two acres, and no interest adverse to the plaintiff to the right of way for street purposes, while used as such, over twenty feet off the east end of the south half of said block. The other defendants answered, but their answers need not be considered. The case was tried, and the court found as follows: "(1) That the plaintiff, at the time of the bringing of this action and for some time prior thereto, was and still is the owner in fee of that certain parcel of land situate in the county of Orange, state of California, and described as follows, to wit: The north two acres of block thirteen in Santa Ana East, which north two acres do not include any portion of the street adjoining said block on the west side thereof, but containing two acres exclusive of said street. (2) That the defendants, and each of them, claim an estate and interest to a strip on and along the south side of said two acres nineteen feet wide, which claim and interest are adverse to that of the plaintiff. (3) That the claim of the said defendants, and each of them, to the said strip on and along the south side of said two acres, is without any right whatever," etc. In accordance with these findings, judgment was duly given and entered in favor of the plaintiff. The defendant Ott then moved for a new trial upon a statement of the case. Attached to the statement were specifications, in substance, that findings 1 and 2 were not justified by the evidence, because, as shown by the evidence, the plaintiff's north two acres of the block should be measured by extending the same to the center of the adjacent street on the west; that finding 2 was not justified, because there was no evidence upon which it could be based; and that certain errors in law were committed by the court in its rulings upon the admission of evidence. The court granted the motion, but upon what ground does not appear, and from this order the plaintiff has appealed.

The principal question discussed by counsel is as to the location of the west boundary line of appellant's two acres; and while the attorney for respondent claims that, under the pleadings, the trial court had no authority to decree appellant anything more than the north two acres of the block, without any allusion to streets, still he says: "If this court should hold that the pleadings are so framed as to authorize the court to decide the question appellant contends for, i. e., whether or not appellant must go to the center of the street on the west to get his two acres, I will be glad to have this court settle it." At the trial the appellant offered in evidence his deed from Lyon, and the map referred to therein, and then rested his case. This map showed that along the sides of some of the blocks laid out thereon streets were marked out, and that along the sides of others no streets were marked. The respondent introduced in evidence his contract with Lyon, and then called the county surveyor as a witness. The witness testified in substance that he had measured block 13, as shown on the map, and that it contained the number of acres and fractions of an acre above stated, and also that, in order to make this block the same size as the other blocks around which no streets were marked, it was necessary to measure to the center of the adjoining streets. The foregoing was all the material evidence in the case, and upon it the court made its findings and rendered its judgment. Looking, then, at the evidence, the findings, the specifications attached to the statement, and the briefs of counsel, it seems apparent that the real and only controversy at the trial was as to the true location of the appellant's south line, and that this depended upon the location of his west line. Under these circumstances, we think the court was authorized to determine the question contested by the parties, and that the respondent cannot now be heard to object that it was not sufficiently raised by the pleadings. The question, then, is as to the construction to be given to appellant's deed. It is true, as claimed by respondent, that an owner of land bounded by a road or street is presumed to own to the center of the way, (Civil Code, § 831;) and when one conveys land bounded by a highway he passes his title to the center of the highway, unless a different intent appears from the grant, (Civil Code, § 1112.) And it has been held that a deed describing land as bounded "by," "upon," or "along" a street or highway should be construed, if practicable, upon grounds of public policy, as including the land to the center of the street or highway. Moody v. Palmer, 50 Cal. 31. It may be conceded, therefore, that when Lyon conveyed the north two acres of block 13 to appellant, he owned, and, subject to the public easement, passed, the title to the east half of the adjoining street. This being so, respondent contends that, as there are no words in the deed limiting the grant to the east side of the street, the two acres must be measured by going to the center thereof. We do not think this conclusion follows. As we understand it, the tract of land laid out by the Western Development Company was intended to be made an addition to the city of Santa Ana, and the blocks were to be sold and used for residence or business purposes. The subdivisions were all of the same size, and doubtless it was intended that the blocks to be built upon should also be of the same size after the streets, necessary to make them accessible, should be laid out and established. Some of the necessary streets were not marked out on the map, but this we do not consider of any importance. The deed speaks of the blocks as four-acre blocks, and that is shown to be practically the size of the block in question, exclusive of the adjoining streets. Ordinarily no two surveyors exactly agree in their measurements of land, and the variance of four-hundredths of an acre may easily be accounted for in that way. The deed then, by describing the land to be conveyed as the north two acres of the block, in effect described the north half thereof; and that such was the intention of the parties is further shown by the description of the right of way conveyed over the east end of the south half of the same block. One of the definitions of the word "block," given by Webster, is, "A square, or portion of a city inclosed by streets, whether occupied by buildings or composed of vacant lots;" and this, in our opinion, was the meaning of the word as used in the deed to appellant. The court, therefore, rightly found that appellant was the owner of the north two acres of block 13, exclusive of the street, and that respondent claimed an interest therein adverse to him. We see no error in the rulings of the court complained of. The testimony objected to and excluded was irrelevant and immaterial. It results, in our opinion, that the court erred in granting the motion for new trial, and that the order should be reversed.

SELLICK v. DE CARLOW et al. (No. 14,702.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 17, 1892.)

TIME OF FILING BILL OF COSTS.

Under Code Civil Proc. § 1033, which provides that a cost bill must be filed within five days after the notice of the decision of the court, a cost bill filed four days before the judgment is unauthorized, and should be stricken out.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Lassen county; W. F. MASTEN, Judge.

Action by James Sellick against C. W. De Carlow and others. From an order denying defendants' motion to strike out the bill of costs, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Spencer & Raher, for appellants. Goodwin & Goodwin, for respondent.

MCFARLAND, J. This is an appeal from an order made after final judgment denying defendants' motion to strike out plaintiff's cost bill and its amount from the judgment. The action was for an injunction restraining defendants from diverting certain water, and for damages. Judgment was rendered for plaintiff restraining defendants as prayed for, and for $20 damages. The decision—that is, the findings —and the judgment were filed and entered March 20, 1891; and the cost bill in question was filed March 16th, four days before the decision. Section 1033 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that a cost bill must be filed "within five days after the verdict or notice of the decision of the court or referee," and it seems quite clear that the cost bill was filed in this case before the time authorized by law, and that the court erred in denying the motion to strike it out. The cost bill involved here amounts to only $113.85, but respondent does not make the point that this court has no jurisdiction of the appeal because the amount is less than $300. Indeed, respondent has no points or brief on file; and, as this court has two or three times entertained similar appeals where the point of jurisdiction was not raised, we do not feel disposed in this case to raise that point, and definitely determine it on our own motion. We deem it proper to say, however, for future guidance, that the question whether or not this court has jurisdiction of an appeal from a separate, independent order made after final judgment, involving money only, and in an amount less than $300, must be considered as, at least, an open question. It is settled, no doubt, that on an appeal from a judgment in an action to recover money alone, the jurisdiction is determined by the ad damnum clause in the complaint. Solomon v. Reese, 34 Cal. 28; Dashiell v. Slingerland, 60 Cal. 653. But we do not at present recollect any case in which it has been definitely held that this court has jurisdiction of an appeal from an order made after final judgment, where there was no appeal from the judgment, and where the amount of money which the order put "in controversy" was less than the sum mentioned in the constitution; although, as before stated, such appeals have been entertained in a few instances where the question of jurisdiction was not raised. On the other hand, it was held in department, in Langan v. Langan, 83 Cal. 618, 23 Pac. Rep. 1084, that an appeal from an order allowing $150 to counsel, in a divorce suit, must be dismissed because the amount involved was "too small to give the court jurisdiction:" and in Oullahan v. Morrissey, 73 Cal. 297,[1] the court in bank held that, where the plaintiff dismissed his action, he could not appeal, even from a judgment for costs, because the demand for costs, "being less than three hundred dollars, does not give this court jurisdiction." And we think that a thorough examination of all the decided cases would probably leave as res integra the question of the meaning of the constitutional words "demand * * * in controversy," when applied to appeals from motions involving less than $300 made after final judgments. The question is an important one, because, if this court has no jurisdiction of such appeals, its time should not be occupied with them, to the disadvantage of other litigants, whose cases are legitimately before it. The order appealed from is reversed, with directions to the superior court to grant the motion which it denied.

People v. Ah Sing. (No. 20,893.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 19, 1892.)

Robbery—Sufficiency of Information—Instructions.

1. An information which charges that defendant did "steal, take, and carry away from the person of" the prosecuting witness his personal property, by force and against his will, is sufficient, in the absence of a demurrer thereto, to support a conviction for "robbery," which is defined by Pen. Code, § 211, to be the "felonious taking of personal property in the possession of another from his person or immediate presence."

2. It is not error to instruct the jury that, if they believe that any witness has sworn falsely as to "any fact" in the case, they are at liberty to entirely disregard his testimony.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; J. W. McKinley, Judge.

Information for robbery against Ah Sing. From a judgment of conviction, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

C. C. Stephens, F. B. Guthrie, H. H. Appel, and Mr. Willis, for appellant. James McLachlan, Dist. Atty., and Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

Garoutte, J. Appellant was convicted of the crime of robbery, and now asks this court for a reversal of the judgment and a new trial. It is insisted that the information does not state facts sufficient to constitute the crime of robbery, in that it is charged that the defendant did "steal, take, and carry away from the person of one Tom She Bin," etc. "Robbery" is defined[1] to be the "felonious taking of personal property in the possession of another from his person or immediate presence." No demurrer was interposed to the information, and, in the absence of a demurrer, it is sufficient. The information alleges that the property was taken by force from the person of Tom She Bin, and against his will, and was his personal property. These facts fairly show a possession of the property in the prosecuting witness. In framing an information the statute should be carefully followed, and such would have been the better practice in this instance, but we think the present defect more technical than substantial; more apparent than real. This court said in People v. Rozelle, 78 Cal. 84, 20 Pac. Rep. 36: "Under the provisions of the Penal Code, the particularity of averment necessary at common law is not required. It is only necessary that the substantial facts constituting the crime shall be alleged with sufficient certainty to enable the court to pronounce a proper judgment, and the party to defend against the charge. * * * Any defect of form not tending to the prejudice of a substantial right of the defendant must be disregarded." The evidence is amply sufficient to support the verdict. The definition of "robbery" given by the court in its charge to the jury was too favorable to the appellant, and he has no cause for complaint.

It is insisted that the following instruction is erroneous: "If you believe that any witness has sworn falsely as to any fact in this case, then you are at liberty to entirely disregard the testimony of such witness." The instruction is substantially in the language of the Code, and has been approved in many cases. See People v. Treadwell, 69 Cal. 226, 10 Pac. Rep. 502. Even if appellant's contention be true, that the false evidence must be as to material matters, then the instruction still comes within such rule, for it refers to "any fact" in the case. The assignments of error based upon the evidence of impeachment of the defendant, and also upon the matter of alibi, are not well taken; neither can we say from the record that the motion for a new trial was improperly denied. There appears to be no merit in the appeal. Let the judgment and order be affirmed.

Under Code Civil Proc. § 1715, providing that an appeal in a probate proceeding must be taken "within 60 days after the order, decree, or judgment is entered," an appeal from a judgment refusing to probate a will, taken a year after the judgment was entered, must be dismissed.

Sharpstein, J. Appellants, who style themselves "proponents of the last will and testament of James H. Backus, deceased," appeal from a judgment entered May 29, 1890, refusing probate to said will. The notice of appeal is dated May 25, 1891, and on that day was served. Section 1715, Code Civil Proc., provides that the appeal in such a case must be taken within 60 days after the order, decree, or judgment is entered.[2] This appeal was not taken until nearly a year afterwards, and counsel for respondent claim in their points and authorities that it should be dismissed. The question has been repeatedly before this court, and it has uniformly been held that such appeals must be taken within the time prescribed by section 1715, Code Civil Proc. People v. Ah Sing. (No. 20,904.)

Criminal Law—Information—Time of Filing—Perjury—Evidence.

1. A defendant in a criminal case is not entitled to discharge on the ground that the information was not filed against him within 30 days after he was held to answer, where the depositions and commitment upon which the information is based have not been returned by the committing magistrate.

2. Evidence of false testimony as to facts not shown to be material to the issue on trial in the case in which the false testimony is alleged to have been given will not support a conviction of perjury.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; B. N. Smith, Judge.

Information against Ah Sing for perjury. From a judgment of conviction, defendant appeals. Reversed.

A. A. Montano, for appellant. James McLachlan, Dist. Atty., and Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

Garoutte, J. The appellant, Ah Sing, was convicted of perjury, and now asks this court to review the judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial. The demurrer to the information was properly overruled, and we cannot say that the motion to discharge the defendant, by reason of the fact that the information was not filed within 30 days after the defendant was held to answer, should have been granted. An information filed by the district attorney against an accused is based upon the depositions and commitment thereon returned by the committing magistrate to the clerk of the superior court. It appears that at the time this motion was made these papers had not been returned to the court by the committing magistrate, and the trial court denied the motion upon that state of facts. It does not appear that such ruling was not made under a proper exercise of judicial discretion. The charge of perjury upon which the appellant was convicted is alleged to have been committed at the preliminary examination of one Ah Wai, who was being examined before a justice of the peace upon a complaint also charging perjury. The complaint against Ah Wai alleged that he committed perjury in swearing to a complaint falsely charging one Kio Kiang with having committed the crime of petit larceny. The false testimony upon which the present charge of perjury is based is set out in the information, but as to the major portion of it the record does not disclose sufficient evidence to support it as a fact, and, if proven, it is quite apparent that under no circumstances could it be material to the issue under examination in the trial of Ah Wai. The only specification of perjury set out in the information which demands our consideration is the following: "That on the 16th day of April, 1891, he, the said Ah Sing, saw one Kio Kiang, a Chinese woman, take a bracelet belonging to one Ah Wai from the house of one Ah Sing, in the city of Pomona, in the county of Los Angeles." Conceding that the record discloses the complete falsity of the foregoing testimony of the accused given at the trial of Ah Wai, still, in order to constitute the offense of perjury, another and additional element is necessary, and that is, it must appear that such testimony was material to the issue on trial. It is an elementary principle that testimony given as to matters collateral to the question at issue cannot furnish the foundation for a charge of perjury, and this principle of law was recognized here by the district attorney in framing the information, and by the court throughout its charge to the jury. Its materiality is not only a necessary element of the information, but it is a fact which must be established by the evidence of the prosecution as fully and completely as any other fact in the case. We find no evidence in the record to indicate that the foregoing testimony of the accused was material to the issue upon trial at that time. We know that Ah Wai was being examined upon an accusation of perjury, in having sworn to a complaint falsely charging one Kio Kiang with petit larceny, and that is the extent of our knowledge upon the subject. As to what property Kio Kiang was charged by Ah Wai with having stolen, there is a total absence of proof. If the charge made against Kio Kiang was for stealing money, then, at the examination of Ah Wai, upon a complaint for perjury in making such false charge, this testimony of the defendant was entirely immaterial, and no conviction for perjury could stand against him for a moment. It is only upon the theory or presumption that the perjury charge against Ah Wai was based upon a false accusation against Kio Kiang in stealing a bracelet, the property of Ah Wai, that the testimony was material at the preliminary examination. But, as already suggested, the burden was upon the people to establish such matter as a fact, and the jury were not entitled to speculate upon theories, or indulge in presumptions and inferences, against the defendant upon a question so important. The evidence in this particular fails to support the judgment. The charge of the court to the jury is full and complete, and we find no just grounds of exception thereto. For the foregoing reasons let the judgment and order be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

CORCORAN v. CITY OF BENICIA. (No. 14,830.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 20, 1892.)

SURFACE WATER—NUISANCE—LIABILITY OF MUNICIPAL CORPORATION.

A city is not liable in an action to abate a nuisance and for damages arising from the prevention of the flow of surface water from its own lot by raising the grade of a street in accordance with lawful authority.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Solano county.

Action by Elizabeth Corcoran, by her guardian, Jeremiah O'Donnell, against the city of Benicia, to abate a nuisance and for damages. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. A. McKenna, for appellant. L. B. Mizner, Matt Clarken, and Mr. Lynch, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This is an action to abate a nuisance and for damages. A demurrer was filed to the complaint, one of the grounds of which is that it did not contain facts sufficient to show a cause of action. The demurrer was sustained, and, the plaintiff declining to amend the complaint, judgment was given and made for the defendant, from which this appeal is taken. It is plain that the alleged nuisance in this case arose from the prevention of the flow of surface water from the defendant's lot down to a swamp adjacent to the straits of Carquinez by the raising of the grade of a street of defendant, a municipal corporation. This improvement of the street was made in accordance with lawful authority, unless it be held that the backing up on plaintiff's lot of this surface water, by raising the grade of the street, made the city liable in damages for the creation of a nuisance in the shape of pools of water, which, it is alleged, were thus created on plaintiff's land. It has been held in this state, in Conniff v. San Francisco, 67 Cal. 45, 7 Pac. Rep. 41, that embanking and damming the natural channel for the escape of water so as to force it back upon a private owner's lot would render the city liable; but it was also conceded by the decision in that case, at page 48, 67 Cal., and page 43, 7 Pac. Rep., that such a corporation would not be responsible for damages caused by the gathering of "the surface waters not running in a natural channel, produced by the raising of a street to the grade established by law." So the law is held to be in 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 1039; Waters v. Village of Bay View, 61 Wis. 644, 21 N. W. Rep. 811; Henderson v. City of Minneapolis, 32 Minn. 319, 20 N. W. Rep. 322; Stewart v. City of Clinton, 79 Mo. 612; Clark v. City of Wilmington, 5 Har. (Del.) 244,—in which last case it is said: "The collection of water on lots which are below the grades of new streets is inevitable, and, excepting the case of a running stream, the city would have no power, and it is not legally bound, to draw off the water. * * * The nuisance is not in the street, but on the lot, and the remedy is by raising the lot to a level with the street, which the city is not bound to do." From this view of the matter it is clear that the demurrer was properly sustained, and that the judgment ought to be affirmed; and we so advise.

CHANGE OF VENUE—APPEAL.

Action by one Daniels against one Church. From an order denying a motion for change of the place of trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. E. Church and Swinnerton & Rutherford, for appellant. J. E. Budd, Nutter & De Vries, and John E. Budd, for respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J. This appeal is from an order of the superior court of the county of San Joaquin, refusing, overruling, and denying said defendant's motion and application for a change of the place of trial in said above-entitled action, from the county of San Joaquin to the county of Fresno. If at the time of the commencement of the action the defendant resided in the county of Fresno he was entitled to have the action tried in that county. If not, not. It appears by the record that defendant, in support of his motion, introduced the affidavits of several persons who swore that he resided in Fresno county. The plaintiff, in opposition to the motion, introduced several affidavits, in which the affiants swore that defendant resided in Calaveras county. The conflict is apparent, and an order refusing to change the place of trial of an action to the county in which the defendant claims to reside will not be reversed on appeal, if the evidence as to the place of residence of the defendant is conflicting. DUSY v. PRUDOM et al. (No. 18,024.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 18, 1892.)

OPENING DEFAULT—IGNORANCE OF TIME OF TRIAL—MECHANIC'S LIEN.

1. Defendants moved to set aside a judgment by default, on the ground that neither they nor their attorney had notice that the case was set for trial; that they relied upon the belief that they were entitled, as nonresidents of the county, to such notice; that the rules of court specified no time for setting cases for trial; that their attorney had requested plaintiff's attorneys to inform him of the time of trial as soon as it was fixed; and that defendants and their attorney believed that the request would be complied with

Held, that a party, though a nonresident, is bound to know the day fixed for setting cases for trial, and if there is no such day fixed he must ascertain the day of trial from the proceedings of the court or otherwise, and hence the court did not abuse its discretion in denying the motion.

2. Code Civil Proc. § 1185, makes subject to a mechanic's lien on a building the land on which it is built, together with so much as may be required for the convenient use and occupation thereof, if at the commencement of the work or of furnishing materials for the building the land belonged to the person who caused the building to be constructed. Held, that where, in an action to foreclose the lien of a material man on a building, and land appurtenant thereto, the complaint recites that all the land is necessary for the convenient use and occupation of the building, and that the person at whose instance the building was erected was at all times the owner of the property, such recitals need not be repeated in the judgment directing the sale of the property.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. HARRIS, Judge.

Action by one Dusy against one Prudom and others to foreclose a lien for materials. From an order refusing to set aside a judgment by default, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

A. H. Carpenter and S. J. Hinds, for appellants. Webb & Strother, for respondent.

PATERSON, J. This is an action to foreclose the lien of a material man. The cause was commenced and determined in the superior court of Fresno county. The defendants Frank J. and Charles Prudom, who were residents of San Joaquin county, appeared and filed an answer to the complaint on April 20, 1891. The case was tried on November 4, 1891, and a decree in favor of the plaintiff was entered on the same day. The decree recites that the defendants Prudom failed to appear at the trial of the cause. On November 16, 1891, the defendants Prudom gave notice of an application to set aside the judgment on the ground that it was taken against them through their mistake, inadvertence, and excusable neglect. In support of their motion they filed an affidavit setting forth that neither they nor their attorney had any notice of the fact that the case has been set for trial until after the entry of the judgment; that they relied upon the belief that they were entitled to notice that the case had been set for trial, being nonresidents of the county in which the action was pending; that the rules of the court specified no time for the calling of the calendar and the setting of the cases for trial; that in August, 1891, defendants' attorney sent a letter to the attorneys of plaintiff at Fresno, and requested them to inform him, as soon as the cause was set, of the time when it would be tried, and the defendants and their attorney believed that such request would be complied with, and that no advantage would be taken of their absence. The record does not show how long the case had been set for trial prior to November 4th. We cannot say that the court abused its discretion in denying the motion to vacate the judgment. In Eltzroth v. Ryan, 91 Cal. 587, 27 Pac. Rep. 932, we held that no notice of the setting of a case for trial is required by statute; that parties to an action and their attorneys, whether residents or nonresidents of the county where the case is pending, must watch its progress, and are charged with notice of the fact that it has been set for trial. It is true in that case it appeared that the rules of the superior court fixed a day for the calling of the calendar. They provided that either party might without notice have any case set down for trial, and that all parties would be deemed to have notice of the fact, but that circumstance is immaterial. A party is bound to know the rules of the trial court. If they fix a day for setting causes for trial, he is presumed to know the fact; and if they do not he must govern himself accordingly, and learn from the proceedings of the court when his case is to be heard. This rule may work hardship in some cases, and the court below should be liberal in relieving parties from judgments taken against them where they have acted without negligence and without actual notice of the time fixed for the trial; but, ordinarily, a party will have no difficulty in ascertaining the day fixed for the trial. A request to the clerk, or the attorneys of his adversary, for notice of the fact will rarely be disregarded. There is nothing in the record to show that either the clerk or the attorney for plaintiff promised to notify the defendants. If such a promise had been made and relied on, the facts would present a cogent reason for setting aside the judgment taken against them. The stated rule is inconvenient and troublesome to nonresident litigants, but there is little danger that the results which counsel for appellants apprehends will follow its enforcement. Parties will not be forced to trial without a reasonable opportunity to prepare therefor. If a case has been set for trial at an unreasonably early day, and by reason thereof a party has been unable to be present or to prepare for trial, the court would abuse its discretion in refusing a continuance, or in refusing to set aside a judgment taken against him because of such hasty action.

It is claimed that the judgment should be reversed, because it directs the sale of the land described in the complaint, without adjudging that it was all necessary for the convenient use and occupation of the building.[1] In answer to this contention it is sufficient to say that the complaint alleged that "all of said land is necessary for the convenient use and occupation of said building," and the court found this allegation to be true. It was not necessary to repeat the statement in the judgment. It is also claimed that the judgment is erroneous, because it fails to adjudge that at the commencement of the action the land belonged to the person who caused the building to be constructed, or that it was erected with his knowledge; but here again the appellants overlook the allegation of the complaint and the findings of the court. It is alleged in the complaint that Francis J. Prudom, at whose instance the building was erected, was at all times mentioned the owner and entitled to possession of the property, and that the other defendants claim to have some interest therein, "but the same is subsequent to the lien of plaintiff." These allegations were denied. The court found they were true. Judgment affirmed.

[1] Code Civil Proc. § 1185, provides that "the land upon which any building * * * is constructed, together with a convenient space about the same, or so much as may be required for the convenient use and occupation thereof, * * * is also subject to the lien, if at the commencement of the work, or of the furnishing of the materials for the same, the land belonged to the person who caused said building * * * to be constructed."

Sachse v. Auburn et al. (No. 18,025.)

Mechanic's Lien—Extent of Land — Presumption in Favor of Decree.

Where, in an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien, there was no allegation or finding as to whether or not the land described in the decree was greater in extent than was necessary for the convenient use and occupation of the building, it will be presumed on appeal that it was not, unless it otherwise appears in the record.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. Harris, Judge.

Action by one Sachse against one Auburn and others to foreclose a mechanic's lien. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

A. H. Carpenter and S. J. Hinds, for appellants. Webb & Strother, for respondent.

Paterson, J. This is an action to foreclose a mechanic's lien. The case differs from Dusy v. Prudom, 30 Pac. Rep. 798, (No. 18,024, this day filed,) in one material respect only. There is neither an allegation nor a finding that all of the land which the decree directs to be sold is necessary for the convenient use and occupation of the building. In Green v. Chandler, 54 Cal. 627, —the case upon which appellants rely,—it appeared that the structure in controversy was built upon a tract of land containing something over eight acres. The court found that the whole of said parcel, with its appurtenances, was required for the convenient use and occupation of the mill, etc. It was held on appeal that this finding was not within any of the issues made by the complaint and answer, and that there was no evidence upon which the court could determine that the whole or any particular part of the land was necessary for the use and occupation of the structure. It was apparent to the court in that case that the court below had decreed the sale of a larger tract of land than that actually occupied by the building upon which the lien was filed, and, as there was no allegation, either in the complaint or in the answer, that all of the land was necessary for the convenient use and occupation of the building, the court held that the finding, being outside of any issue, did not warrant the judgment. In Sidlinger v. Kerkow, 82 Cal. 42, 22 Pac. Rep. 932, it did not appear that the plaintiff was claiming any more land than that occupied by the building, and we held that the failure of the court to define the exact amount or extent of the land necessary for the convenient use of the structure did not invalidate the decree that the purchaser would acquire only the land covered by the building. The land actually occupied by the building is necessarily subject to the lien, and it is only where the plaintiff claims that more than that is required for its use and occupation that he must make averments therefor. Steam Mills Co. v. Kremer, 94 Cal. 205, 29 Pac. Rep. 633. There is nothing in the record in this case to show that the land described in the decree is greater in extent than that covered by the building. We have to assume that it is not. Every presumption must be indulged in favor of the judgment.

People v. Lee Kong. (No. 20,901.)

Assault with Intent to Kill—Evidence.

In a prosecution for assault with intent to kill, it appeared that defendant, the keeper of a gambling hall, shot at a hole in the roof, which he knew had been made by a policeman for the purpose of watching the premises, and at which he supposed the policeman then was. The ball went through the roof at that point, but the policeman was then on the roof at another point, and so escaped injury. Held, that this constituted an assault, under Pen. Code, § 240, defining an assault as "an unlawful attempt, coupled with a present ability, to commit a violent injury on the person of another;" and a conviction of assault with intent to kill was warranted.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; J. W. McKinley, Judge.

Charlie Lee Kong was convicted of an assault with intent to kill, and appeals. Affirmed.

C. C. Stephens and H. C. Grant, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

Garoutte, J. Appellant was convicted of the crime of an assault with intent to commit murder, and now prosecutes this appeal, insisting that the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict. The facts of the case are novel in the extreme, and, when applied to principles of criminal law, a question arises for determination upon which counsel have cited no precedent. A policeman secretly bored a hole in the roof of appellant's building for the purpose of determining, by a view from that point of observation, whether or not he was conducting therein a gambling or lottery game. This fact came to the knowledge of appellant, and upon a certain night, believing that the policeman was upon the roof at the point of observation, he fired his pistol at the spot. He shot in no fright, and his aim was good, for the bullet passed through the roof at the point intended; but, very fortunately for the officer of the law, at the moment of attack he was upon the roof viewing the scene of action at an opening some distance from his contemplated point of observation, and thus no substantial results followed from appellant's fire. The intent to kill is quite apparent from the evidence, and the single question is presented, do the facts stated constitute an assault? Our Criminal Code defines an assault to be "an unlawful attempt, coupled with a present ability, to commit a violent injury upon the person of another." It will thus be seen that to constitute an assault two elements are necessary, and the absence of either is fatal to the charge. There must be an unlawful attempt, and there must be a present ability to inflict the injury. In this case it is plain that the appellant made an attempt to kill the officer. It is equally plain that this attempt was an unlawful one; for the intent to kill was present in his mind at the time he fired the shot, and if death had been the result, under the facts as disclosed, there was no legal justification to avail him. The fact that the officer was not at the spot where the attacking party imagined he was, and where the bullet pierced the roof, renders it no less an attempt to kill. It is a well-settled principle of criminal law in this country that where the criminal result of an attempt is not accomplished simply because of an obstruction in the way of the thing to be operated upon, and these facts are unknown to the aggressor at the time, the criminal attempt is committed. Thus an attempt to pick one's pocket, or to steal from his person, when he has nothing in his pocket or on his person, completes the offense to the same degree as if he had money or other personal property which could be the subject of larceny. State v. Wilson, 30 Conn. 500; Com. v. McDonald, 5 Cush. 365; People v. Jones, 46 Mich. 441, 9 N. W. Rep. 486; People v. Moran, 123 N. Y. 254, 25 N. E. Rep. 412. Having determined that appellant was guilty of an unlawful attempt to kill, was such attempt coupled with the present ability to accomplish the deed? In the case of People v. Yslas, 27 Cal. 633, this court said: "The common-law definition of an 'assault' is substantially the same as that found in our statute." Conceding such to be the fact, we cannot indorse those authorities, principally English, which hold that an assault may be committed by a person pointing in a threatening manner an unloaded gun at another; and this, too, regardless of the fact whether the party holding the gun thought it was loaded, or whether the party at whom it was menacingly pointed was thereby placed in great fear. Under our statute it cannot be said that a person with an unloaded gun would have the present ability to inflict an injury upon another many yards distant, however apparent and unlawful his attempt to do so might be. It was held in the case of State v. Swails, 8 Ind. 527, that there was no assault to commit murder where A. fires a gun at B. at a distance of 40 feet, with intent to murder him, if the gun is in fact loaded with powder and a slight cotton wad, although A. believes it to be loaded with powder and ball. The later Indiana cases support this rule, although in Kunkle v. State, 32 Ind. 230, the court, in speaking of the Swails Case, said: "But if the case is to be understood as laying down the broad proposition that to constitute an assault * * * with intent to commit felony, the intent and the present ability to execute must necessarily be conjoined, it does not command our assent or approval." In the face of the fact that the statute of this state in terms requires that, in order to constitute an assault, the unlawful attempt and present ability must be conjoined, Kunkle v. State can have no weight here. In State v. Napper, 6 Nev. 115, the court reversed the judgment upon the ground that the people failed to prove that the pistol with which the assault was alleged to have been made was loaded, and that consequently there was no proof that the defendant had the present ability to inflict the injury. It is not the purpose of the court to draw nice distinctions between an attempt to commit an offense and an assault with intent to commit the offense, for such distinctions could only have the effect to favor the escape of criminals from their just deservings; and, in view of the fact that all assaults to commit felonies can be prosecuted as attempts, we can see no object in carrying the discussion of the subject to any greater lengths.

In this case the appellant had the present ability to inflict the injury. He knew the officer was upon the roof, and knowing that fact he fired through the roof with the full determination of killing him. The fact that he was mistaken in judgment as to the exact spot where his intended victim was located is immaterial. That the shot did not fulfill the mission intended was not attributable to forbearance or kindness of heart upon defendant's part; neither did the officer escape by reason of the fact of his being so far distant that the deadly missile could do him no harm. He was sufficiently near to be killed from a bullet from the pistol, and his antagonist fired with the intent of killing him. Appellant's mistake as to the policeman's exact location upon the roof affords no excuse for his act, and causes the act to be no less an assault. These acts disclose an assault to murder as fully as though a person should fire into a house with the intention of killing the occupant, who fortunately escaped the range of the bullet. See Cowley v. State, 10 Lea, 282. The fact that the shots were directed indiscriminately into the house, rather than that the intended murderer calculated that the occupant was located at a particular spot, and then trained his fire to that point, could not affect the question. The assault would be complete and entire in either case. If a man intending murder, being in darkness and guided by sound only, should fire and the bullet should pierce the spot where the party was supposed to be, but by a mistake in hearing the intended victim was not at the point of danger, but some distance therefrom, and yet within reach of the pistol ball, the crime of assault to commit murder would be made out; for the unlawful attempt and the present ability are found coupled together. If appellant's aim had not been good, through fright or accident when pointing the weapon or pulling the trigger, or if the ball had been deflected in its course from the intended point of attack, and by reason of the occurrence of any one of these contingencies the party had been shot and killed, a murder would have been committed. Such being the fact, the assault is established. The fact of itself that the policeman was two feet or ten feet from the spot where the fire was directed, or that he was at the right hand or at the left hand or behind the defendant, at the time the shot was fired, is immaterial upon this question. That element of the case does not go to the question of present ability, but pertains to the unlawful attempt. Let the judgment and order be affirmed.

I concur: PATERSON, J.

HARRISON, J., (concurring.) I concur in the judgment upon the ground that upon the evidence before them the jury have determined that the unlawful attempt of the defendant was coupled with a present ability—that is, an ability by the means then employed by him in furtherance of such attempt—to commit murder upon the policeman.

HEILBRON et al. v. 76 LAND & WATER CO.

(No. 14,460.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 22, 1892.)

WATER RIGHTS — CONVEYANCE PENDING SUIT — RIGHT TO CONTINUE — PRESUMPTION—DECREE—MATTERS NOT IN ISSUE —MANDATE OF SUPREME COURT.

1. Where defendant conveyed its canal and water right pending an action to enjoin it from diverting the waters of a stream into and through the canal, it will be presumed, in the absence of a showing to the contrary, that subsequent proceedings in the case are had in defendant's name on behalf of the grantee, and defendant's appeal from a decree against him will not be dismissed.

2. It is not error, in such action, to refuse to provide in the decree that defendant is not enjoined from diverting from the stream into its canal the surplus waters "at times of flood or high water," when no issue was raised by the pleadings as to defendant's right to divert such surplus waters.

3. A statement made by way of argument in the opinion of the supreme court on a former appeal in such case, reversing and remanding it for a decree in accordance therewith, that "there may be times of flood or high water when no one below would be injured if defendant's canal should carry away from the river surplus waters to its full capacity," does not entitle defendant to such provision in the decree, in the absence of such issue by the pleadings.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; W. W. CROSS, Judge.

Action by A. Heilbron and others against the 76 Land & Water Company to enjoin it from diverting waters. From an order denying a motion by defendant to amend the decree, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. S. Goodfellow, (C. C. Wright, of counsel,) for appellant. Brown, Daggett & Adams and Thompson, Thompson & Thompson, (John Chetwood, Jr., of counsel,) for respondents.

BELCHER, C. The plaintiffs commenced this action in the superior court of Tulare county to obtain a perpetual injunction restraining the defendant from diverting any of the waters of Kings river into and through a certain canal constructed and owned by defendant. After trial the court granted the injunction as prayed for, and "further ordered, adjudged, and decreed that said defendant forthwith fill up the head of its said canal where it connects with the channel of said Kings river, and close the same so that no water can or will flow from said river into defendant's said canal." From this judgment and an order refusing a new trial an appeal was taken, and, in deciding the questions presented on the appeal, it was, among other things, said by this court, (80 Cal. 189, 22 Pac. Rep. 62.) "It clearly appears that defendant is a riparian proprietor above the plaintiffs. Its lands can be irrigated with water carried through its canal, and irrigation is necessary to make them productive. Being an upper riparian owner, defendant is entitled, as against the plaintiffs, to make a reasonable use of the water of the stream for the purpose of irrigating its riparian lands; and it is only for an unreasonable and unauthorized use that an action will lie. What is a reasonable use is a question of fact, and depends upon the circumstances appearing in each particular case. [Citing authorities.] One of the purposes for which the defendant constructed its canal was to irrigate its lands. And the fact that it has not yet used the water upon its own lands cannot destroy or impair its rights. * * * This being so, we are unable to see how the court could properly grant a perpetual injunction restraining the defendant from ever, at any time, or for any purpose, causing or permitting any water from the river to flow into or down its canal. Besides, there may be times of flood or high water when no one below would be injured if defendant's canal should carry away from the river surplus water to its full capacity. Why should defendant be required to fill up the head of its canal, so that no water at such times can flow into it? From what has been said it is not to be understood that defendant has a right, as against riparian owners further down the stream, to divert water from the river for the purposes of sale, or for use on lands which are not riparian." The judgment and order were accordingly reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to enter a decree in conformity with the views expressed in the opinion. Upon the going down of the remittitur the court entered a new and modified decree, by which the defendant was forever enjoined and restrained from diverting into or through its canal any of the waters of Kings river for sale, or for distribution or use upon lands not riparian, and also from diverting into or down its canal "any more of the waters of said river than such as are reasonably necessary to be used, and which, when so diverted, are actually used for irrigation and domestic purposes upon" certain tracts of land described and found to be riparian. Thereafter the defendant, after due notice, moved the court to amend the decree "by providing therein that the defendant is not thereby enjoined or restrained from diverting from Kings river into or through or down its canal the surplus waters of said river at times of flood or high water, when the plaintiffs would not be injured thereby," upon the ground that such amendment was necessary to make the decree conform to the views of the supreme court, expressed in its opinion, and remitted to the court below for its direction. At the hearing of the motion the plaintiffs were permitted, against the objection and exception of the defendant, to introduce and read in evidence a deed executed by defendant, and conveying its canal and water right, with certain exceptions, and also certain lands, to another corporation. At the conclusion of the hearing the court denied the motion, and thereupon the defendant appealed from the decree as entered and the order refusing to amend it.

1. The respondents ask that the appeal be dismissed, because, having conveyed away its canal and water right, "the appellant is no longer the party in interest, and is not a party aggrieved by the judgment." We do not think the appeal should be dismissed for the reason stated. After the transfer it was proper that all proceedings in the case, including the appeal, be taken for and on behalf of the grantee in the name of the original defendant; and in the absence of any showing to the contrary, it will be presumed that they were so taken. Malone v. Mining Co., 93 Cal. 384, 28 Pac. Rep. 1063

2. It is argued for appellant that the suggestion in the opinion of the supreme court, that "there may be times of flood or high water when no one below would be injured if defendant's canal should carry away from the river surplus water to its full capacity," constituted a part of the "views expressed" in the opinion, in conformity with which the trial court was directed to enter the new decree, and that the decree as entered wholly ignored the mandate of the court in this regard, and to that extent was erroneous, and should have been amended. It is said that "by the judgment of the supreme court above cited the defendant would be entitled in times of flood or high water, when the plaintiffs would not be injured thereby, to carry away from Kings river the surplus water of said river to the full capacity of defendant's canal; and that under the judgment of the supreme court aforesaid, defendant would at all times be entitled to divert the waters of said river through its canal to the full capacity of said canal whenever the plaintiffs would not be injured thereby;" and also that "during the greater part of the season the flow of water in Kings river is great enough to meet many times over the total demands made upon it; and to hold that in seasons of great abundance the riparian owner shall have the right to prevent the beneficial use of surplus waters is most unreasonable." On the other hand, it is claimed by respondents that the issues tried and disposed of in the case did not involve any question as to the right to divert flood or surplus waters from the stream, but related solely to the riparian rights of the parties, and hence that the clause quoted and relied upon by counsel for appellant had no bearing upon or connection with the point actually decided, and therefore cannot be regarded as one of the "views expressed" in the opinion. In one of the briefs filed for respondents it is said: "Where it appears that there is a surplus of water, no one can doubt that such surplus may properly be appropriated;" and the learned counsel then go on to state that there are statistical tables, showing the amount of water flowing in Kings river at all times during the six years ending in 1883–84, and that, looking at these statistical tables, it appears that the flow of water in the river has not at any time during the years named been nearly large enough to meet the demands which are shown by the county records to have been made upon it prior to the construction of appellant's canal. It is true that by the pleadings no issue was raised as to the right of appellant to divert from the river its flood or surplus waters, and hence that question was not, and could not have been, passed upon or decided by the trial court or by this court on appeal. It is also true that the remark found in the opinion of this court, as to "times of flood or high water," was not made for the purpose of deciding any question arising in the case, but was merely thrown out to show how unreasonable and uncalled for was that part of the decree which required the defendant to forthwith fill up the head of its canal so that no water could ever flow into it. This being so, it is apparent, we think, that the said remark was not intended to, and did not in fact, constitute one of the "views expressed" in the opinion, in conformity with which the trial court was directed to enter a new decree. Under these circumstances, we see no error in the action of the court, and therefore advise that the judgment and order appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; HAYNES, C.

BEATTY, C. J. Justice DE HAVEN is assigned to department 1 for the purpose of considering this case in place of Justice HARRISON, disqualified.

READING v. READING. (No. 14,761.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 22, 1892.)

DIVORCE—COMPLAINT—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action for divorce, a count of the complaint which alleges the marriage and proper residence of the parties for the requisite time, and that "defendant for more than five years last past, disregarding his duties as a husband towards the plaintiff, has been guilty of habitual intemperance," is sufficient to support a decree for plaintiff in the absence of a demurrer thereto for uncertainty.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Butte county; J. C. GRAY, Judge.

Action by Mary J. Reading against O. B. Reading for divorce. From a decree for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. J. Herrin, for appellant. P. O. Hundley, for respondent.

Paterson, J. This is an action for divorce, a division of the community property, and for the custody of the children. The grounds upon which plaintiff relies are extreme cruelty and habitual intemperance. In the first count it is alleged that plaintiff and defendant intermarried at Oroville, Butte county, January 8, 1873, and that plaintiff has been a resident of the state of California for more than 10 years prior to the commencement of the action. The plaintiff then proceeds to allege specific acts of cruelty by defendant at their residence in Oroville, extending from May 8, 1884, to December, 1890. For a second cause of action the plaintiff alleges marriage as stated above, residence of plaintiff in the county of Butte, state of California, for more than 10 years immediately prior to the commencement of the action, and that "the defendant for more than five years last past, disregarding his duties as a husband towards the plaintiff, has been guilty of habitual intemperance." The summons was served upon the defendant personally in the county of Butte, but he made no appearance. The court found that all the facts stated in the complaint were true, and a decree was entered in favor of the plaintiff. From this decree defendant has appealed, and the case is before us on the judgment roll alone.

Appellant contends that the judgment is not supported by the allegations of the complaint for the following reasons: (1) In the first count it is not alleged that the plaintiff was "a resident of the county for three months next preceding the commencement of the action," (Civil Code § 128,) and, as there is no reference to the allegations of the second count, no cause of action is stated in said first count; (2) that the second count does not state facts showing that defendant has been guilty of habitual intemperance, the allegation in that regard being a mere conclusion of law. It has been held here that each cause of action set up must be complete in its allegations,—Haskell v. Haskell, 54 Cal. 262,—but that it is sufficient merely to refer to and adopt in one count the allegations made in another count.—Green v. Clifford, (Cal.) 29 Pac. Rep. 331. In this case no reference is made in either count to any allegation made in the other. While the fact is not directly and positively alleged, it is a fair inference from the averments of the first count that plaintiff and defendant resided at Oroville, Butte county, for more than three months immediately prior to the commencement of the action; and the most that can be said against it is that it is uncertain; but whether this be so or not, the allegations of the second count are sufficient to support the judgment. Residence in the state and county for more than the requisite period is averred, and the allegation as to habitual intemperance is good in the absence of demurrer. It is not necessary to set out the particular acts of intemperance, (Forney v. Forney, 80 Cal. 528, 22 Pac. Rep. 294;) and the failure to allege that the defendant was disqualified, by the use of intoxicating drinks, a greater portion of the time, "from properly attending to business," or that his conduct inflicted upon plaintiff "a course of great mental anguish," (section 106, Civil Code,) is not fatal. The objection now urged for the first time should have been taken by demurrer, on the ground of uncertainty. The fact that the court amended the judgment after it was entered by stating the fact that plaintiff was a resident of the county of Butte for more than five years prior to the commencement of the action is not material. The court had already found that all allegations of the complaint were true. But even this was unnecessary, as findings were not required, there being no answer. The judgment is affirmed.

Von Schmidt v. Superior Court. (No. 15,109.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 25, 1892.)

In bank.

Original proceeding by A. W. Von Schmidt for writ of prohibition against the superior court of San Francisco county; William T. Wallace, Judge. Application denied.

Pierson & Mitchell, (A. N. Drown, of counsel,) for petitioner.

Per Curiam. The application for a writ of prohibition herein is denied, the court being of the opinion that the petitioner therefor does not disclose any excess or threatened excess of the jurisdiction of the respondent.

In re Hyde's Estate.[1]

Right to Administration—Nominee of Nonresident Heir.

A public administrator is entitled to letters of administration in preference to a nominee of a nonresident heir of deceased, under Code Civil Proc. §§ 1369, 1379, which provides respectively that nonresidents shall not be entitled to administration, and that administration may be granted to competent persons not otherwise entitled, "at the written request of the person entitled."

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county.

Petitions by L. A. Evans, as creditor, and by M. P. Cutler, as public administrator, for letters of administration on the estate of H. E. Hyde, deceased. Letters granted to L. A. Evans. The public administrator appeals. Reversed.

Code Civil Proc. § 1369, provides that no person shall be competent to serve as an administrator who is "not a bona fide resident of the state." Section 1379 provides that "administration may be granted to competent persons, not otherwise entitled, * * * at the written request the of person entitled, filed in court."

S. C. Hubbell, for appellant. Barclay & Wilson, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. L. A. Evans petitioned, as creditor, for letters of administration. M. P. Cutler petitioned for letters as public administrator. The petitions were heard together, and on the hearing the said Evans produced a written request from the father and heir of the estate that letters be granted to him, Evans. The father was a nonresident of this state. The court made an order that letters issue to Evans, and from this order Cutler appealed. This was error. See sections 1369, 1379, Code Civil Proc.; also Estate of Cotter, 54 Cal. 217; Estate of Kelly, 57 Cal. 81; Estate of Morgan, 53 Cal. 245; Estate of Beech, 63 Cal. 458. The order is reversed, and the cause is remanded for further proceedings.

SERVICE OF SUMMONS — ACTION TO CANCEL CERTIFICATE OF PURCHASE.

Where the record of a judgment and decree rendered in an action under the Political Code of California to cancel the certificate of a delinquent purchaser of school lands, and foreclose his interest, fails to show personal service of the summons, or an affidavit of publication and order thereon, as required by the Code of Civil Procedure, the judgment and decree will be set aside.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county.

Action against William Applegarth to foreclose his interest in a certificate of purchase of school lands, and cancel the certificate. Judgment for plaintiff by default. Defendant moved to set aside judgment, on the ground that by the record it did not appear that any personal service of summons was made, or any affidavit for publication of summons or order of court therefor. Order refusing to set the same aside. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

W. D. Tupper and H. S. Dixon, for appellant. W. D. Grady and J. F. Wharton, for the People.

PER CURIAM. The service of summons by publication in such a case as this should have been made in accordance with the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure. The four Codes constitute but one statute, (Pol. Code, § 4480,) and we are of opinion that the provisions of the Political Code must be read in connection with the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure on this subject. Under these latter provisions there must have been an affidavit for publication of summons, and an order of the court or judge thereon. The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded.

POWER OF ATTORNEY—RELEASE OF MORTGAGE.

A written power of attorney "to satisfy mortgages," and to execute all instruments in writing necessary therefor, will not authorize an entry of satisfaction of a mortgage until the debt thereby secured is paid, nor avail a subsequent purchaser of the mortgaged premises as a defense in case of nonpayment and suit to foreclose.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county.

Action by Thomas B. Hutchings, administrator, etc., of Hovey, Hutchings, against J. W. Clark, to foreclose a mortgage. Judgment for plaintiff, and order refusing new trial. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

The mortgage was executed by J. S. Hutchings to Hovey Hutchings, who thereafter gave a power of attorney to J. S. Hutchings, authorizing him to collect moneys due, "and to satisfy judgments and mortgages, and to make, execute, and deliver all and any instruments of writing necessary therefor." Under this power J. S. Hutchings satisfied the mortgage of record, though the note was not paid.

Barclay & Wilson and Smith & Hupp, for appellant. Thom & Stephens and W. L. Wicks, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. The power of attorney did not authorize satisfaction of the mortgage to be entered until the note was paid, and this event never occurred. We find no error in the record, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

BARBAIRES et al. v. GREGORY, Judge.[3]

NEW TRIAL—SETTLEMENT OF STATEMENT—NOTICE.

Where an attorney gives notice of settlement of a statement on motion for a new trial and proposed amendments, the filing by him of the statement and amendments, before the day fixed by the notice, does not entitle him to notice that the settlement will be made at the time fixed.

Department 2. Application by Felix Barbaires and others for a mandamus to compel John M. Gregory, judge of the superior court of Solano county, to settle a statement on motion for a new trial. Application denied.

L. C. Trusseau, for petitioners. Geo. A. Lamont, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. It was admitted on the argument by both sides that the defendants, in the action Mizner v. Barbaires et al., prepared and served their statement on the plaintiff's attorney in due time, and that he prepared and served on the defendants' counsel plaintiff's proposed amendments to said statement within the time prescribed by the Code, and that defendants' counsel, within 10 days after receiving said proposed amendments, gave the plaintiff's attorney notice that his said proposed amendments were not adopted or allowed by the defendants, and that on a day and hour and at a place named in said notice they would present said statement and proposed amendments to the judge for settlement; that at the time and place named in said notice the plaintiff's attorney appeared before said judge, but that no one appeared for the defendants, and the court proceeded to settle said statement. Before the time fixed in said notice for the settlement of said statement and proposed amendments the same had been filed with the clerk of the court. The defendants' counsel insists that the fact of his having so filed said statement and proposed amendments cast the duty upon the court of giving said defendants' attorney notice of the time and place of settlement, and that the court had no power to proceed and settle said statement on the day fixed for its settlement in defendants' attorney's said notice. We think, however, that the court had a right to proceed and settle said statement on the day designated for that purpose, and that defendant's counsel were not entitled to notice that the statement would be settled at the time and place fixed by them for its settlement in a notice given by themselves. Application denied, and proceeding dismissed.

APPEAL—FORECLOSURE OF MORTGAGE ON PERSONALTY—PENALTY OF UNDERTAKING.

In the absence of special provision to the contrary, the penalty of an undertaking for a supersedeas to a judgment foreclosing a mortgage on personal property must be in the sum of $300, being that prescribed by Code Civil Proc. § 941, generally for undertakings on appeal.

Department 2. Application by John F. Snow against C. J. Holmes to foreclose a mortgage. There was a judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals, and moves for a writ of supersedeas. Code Civil Proc. § 726, prescribes the form of action to foreclose a mortgage, but contains no provision as to the penalty of the bond to be given on appeal. Section 941 provides generally that undertakings on appeal must be conditioned in the penalty of $300. Motion granted.

Langhorne & Miller, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. This is an application for a writ of supersedeas, staying the execution of the judgment pending the appeal, in an action for the foreclosure of a mortgage of personal property. The appellant (mortgagor) has executed the usual undertaking on appeal for $300. The judgment in this case was rendered in accordance with section 726, Code Civil Proc. The Code prescribes no bond in addition to the $300 bond in such a case. Section 949 provides that, in cases not provided for in the sections therein named, the appeal is perfected by giving the undertaking provided in section 941. Such being the statute, we must be governed by it. The motion is granted.

DEAN v. BAKER et al.[2]

INSOLVENCY—DISCHARGE—OMISSION OF ASSETS FROM SCHEDULE.

In an action on a note, it is competent for plaintiff to prove, in answer to defendant's plea of a discharge under Insolvency Act Cal. 1852, that defendant had willfully and knowingly and intentionally omitted certain real property from the schedule annexed to his petition in insolvency, under section 32 of that act, which provides that the insolvent cannot avail himself of his discharge if it appears that he concealed any part of his property, gave a false schedule thereof, or committed any fraud under the act.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Merced county.

Action by T. C. Dean against A. D. Barker and ——— Grimes on a promissory note. Defendant Grimes pleaded a discharge in insolvency. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Act Cal. 1852, § 32, provides that "whenever any insolvent debtor has had the benefit of this act, if thereafter at any time it is made to appear that he has concealed any part of his property or estate, or given a false schedule, or committed any fraud under this act, * * * he cannot avail himself of any of its provisions."

Bennett & Wigginton, for appellant. R. H. Ward and Schell & Treat, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. We are of opinion that, under section 32 of the insolvency act of 1852, the court erred in ruling out the offer of the plaintiff to prove that the defendant Grimes had willfully, knowingly, and intentionally omitted from the schedule of property annexed to his petition in insolvency certain real property held and owned by him at the time of the commencement of the insolvency proceedings; and for this reason the judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded.

Ex parte REIS, Treasurer.[2]

STENOGRAPHERS' FEES—SUPERIOR COURT OF SAN FRANCISCO—POWERS.

Act March 13, 1866, provides that the compensation of stenographers in criminal cases shall be fixed by the court, and paid on its order. Act March 28, 1868, authorizes the county judge of San Francisco county to appoint a reporter, to be paid in like manner. The provisions of these acts are embodied in Code Civil Proc. §§ 269–271. By the constitution of 1879 the superior court of San Francisco was created, and the powers of the county court transferred to it; and by article 22, § 11, all laws relative to the then judicial system were made applicable to the system created by the constitution. Held, that such court had power to fix and order the compensation of its stenographer in a criminal case. In bank. Application for habeas corpus by Christopher Reis, treasurer of the city and county of San Francisco, adjudged guilty of contempt in refusing to pay the compensation of a stenographer in a criminal case upon an order of the superior court. Application denied.

McKinstry, J. Immediately prior to the adoption of the Codes, the law with respect to phonographic reporters of the courts in San Francisco was contained in the act of March 13, 1866, (St. 1865–66, p. 232,) and in the act of March 28, 1868, (St. 1867–68, p. 425.) The first act authorized the district judges of San Francisco to appoint shorthand reporters, and provided that, in criminal cases, the compensation of the reporter "shall be fixed by the court, and paid out of the treasury of the county on the order of the court." The act of 1868 provided for the appointment of a reporter by the county judge of San Francisco, and the payment of his compensation in like manner. Sections 269–271, Code Civil Proc., as they read originally,—since amended in particulars which do not affect the question we are considering,—authorized each district and county judge in the state to appoint a shorthand reporter, and provided that, "in criminal cases, * * * the compensation of the reporter must be fixed by the court, and paid out of the treasury of the county in which the case is tried, upon the order of the court." The statutes of 1866 and 1868, above referred to, were not "expressly continued in force" by the Code of Civil Procedure. They were therefore "repealed and abrogated," (Code Civil Proc. § 18,) unless kept alive by section 19 of the Political Code. That section reads: "Nothing in either of the four Codes affects any of the provisions of the following statutes, but such statutes are recognized as continuing in force, notwithstanding the provisions of the Codes, except so far as they have been repealed or affected by subsequent laws, (1) all acts incorporating or chartering municipal corporations, and acts amending or supplementing such acts; (2) all acts consolidating cities and counties, and acts amending or supplementing such acts." It is not necessary to decide whether the acts of 1866 and 1868 were acts "affecting" or "amending or supplementing" the consolidation act or charter of the city and county of San Francisco. If, by virtue of section 19 of the Political Code, the acts of 1866 and 1868 were continued in force, the district judges and the county judge, in San Francisco, had power under those acts to appoint reporters, and to fix their compensation in criminal cases, to be paid by the treasurer "upon the order of the court." If, on the other hand, the acts of 1866 and 1868 were repealed by the Code of Civil Procedure, sections 269–271 of that Code conferred like powers upon the district judges and courts and county judge and court. In either case, just before the adoption of the present constitution, the district courts and county court could legally employ the power of appointing a shorthand reporter, fix his compensation in criminal cases, and order such compensation to be paid, and it was the duty of the treasurer to pay the same "upon the order of the court." Section 11 of article 22 of the present constitution reads: "All laws relative to the present judicial system of the state shall be applicable to the judicial system created by this constitution, until changed by legislation." Of course, the former "judicial system" was not made applicable to the judicial system, or series of courts, created by the constitution of 1879, for the latter was substituted for the former. By "laws relative to the present judicial system" was intended laws passed to render the working of the system harmonious and effective, which would include the laws passed to secure the preservation of evidence, and the payment of compensation to the officers through whose agency it was preserved. Either the acts of 1866 and 1868, (if not repealed by the Code of Civil Procedure,) or the sections of the Code of Civil Procedure relating to the same subject, were therefore made applicable to the judicial system created by the constitution now in force. The powers previously conferred upon the district judges and courts and county judge and court, with respect to the appointment and compensation of reporters, were transferred to the superior judges and courts. It follows the superior courts in San Francisco have power to fix and order paid the compensation of the phonographic reporter in criminal cases, and the corresponding duty is imposed upon the treasurer to pay the same upon the order of the court. The petitioner is remanded.

Sharpstein and Ross, JJ., concurred.

Thornton, J,. (concurring.) Phonographic reporters were first appointed in this state as adjuncts to courts under the provisions of the act of May 17, 1861. See St. 1861, p. 497. That act authorized the judges of each of the 4th, 6th, 7th, 10th, 12th, and 15th judicial districts to appoint such an officer, and provided inter alia (see section 3) "that in criminal cases or capital offenses, when the testimony has been taken down by order of the court, the compensation of the reporter shall be fixed by the court, and paid out of the treasury of the county in which the case is tried, in the same manner as the fees of trial jurors are paid in such cases." In 1862 the third section of this act was amended, but the provision as to the compensation of the reporters was not changed. St. 1862, p. 253. In the first section of the act of 1861, as amended in 1864, (St. 1863–64, p. 521,) this new feature appeared: that the reporters appointed were required, before entering upon their duties, to "take and subscribe the oath prescribed by law for attorneys and counsellors at law practicing in the courts in this state." It is not too much to say that this made such reporters officers of the court. They were to some extent under the order of the court, and subject to its control. They performed their duties under the eye of the court, and became, like clerks and bailiffs, officers of the courts to which they were attached. The act of March 13, 1866, entitled "An act concerning district court reporters," (see St. 1865–66, p. 232,) was the next act on the subject. The third section of this act was amended by the act of March 28, 1868, (St. 1867–68, p. 455.) Each of these last-named acts had the same provision (see the third section) in regard to the payment of the fees of the reporter in criminal cases, in these words: "In criminal cases or capital offenses, when the testimony has been taken down by order of the court, the compensation of the reporter shall be fixed by the court, and paid out of the treasury of the county in which the case is tried, on the order of the court." A change will here be observed from the former acts referred to. The act of 1866 related to the judges of the 4th, 5th, 6th, 7th, 10th, 11th, 12th, 3d, and 15th districts. By the act of March 30, 1868, the provisions of the act of 1866 were extended to the second judicial district, with a proviso of no consequence touching this case. St. 1867–68, p. 668. The act was further extended by act of 1870. St. 1869–70, p. 330. This was all the legislation on this subject-matter prior to the adoption of the Codes.

These acts, and the proceedings under them, had no reference to the act commonly called the "Consolidation Act." They had no more connection with it than they had with the charters of the cities of Sacramento, Stockton, and San Jose. At the time these acts were passed the city and county of San Francisco was embraced within the 4th, 12th, and 15th judicial districts, the city of Sacramento was in the 6th, the city of Stockton was in the 5th, and the city of San Jose was in the 3d. Each of these counties had a board of supervisors, and in no one of them is any reference made to a board of supervisors, or auditor of any political division in the state.

These acts had nothing to do with the municipal government of counties or cities, or cities and counties, so as to be under the control of the governing bodies or officers of such political divisions. They were a part of the judicial machinery of the state, assistants of the judges in the discharge of their responsible functions, and furnishing reliable aid to counsel in the rendition of their professional services to litigants. They expedited the administration of justice, and afforded a means by which the occurrences of a trial could be correctly preserved, for the use and advantage of court and counsel, and giving further assurance to every litigant that no matter of fact or point in his case would be omitted or overlooked. It was specially advantageous in criminal causes, a history of all the incidents of which being written while the events constituting it were occurring. It may be said that the facts were photographed as they appeared, and the negatives of phonographic characters were laid up for future use and reference. The achievements of the reporters under these acts constituted a most valuable part of the administration of justice, and have been, since the first act was enacted, extended so as to apply to nearly all the courts of the state. Thus the legislation continued until the Codes were adopted in 1872, and went into operation on the 1st of January, 1873. The provisions in relation to phonographic reporters are found in Code Civil Proc. §§ 269–271, et seq. By section 269, as it originally passed, the power to appoint such reporter was vested in the judge of each judicial district and in each county judge. 2 Hitt. Codes & St. p. 944, note a to paragraph 10,269. This section was amended in 1874, so as to give such appointing power to the judge of each court of record. The provisions as to compensation will be found in section 274. This section was amended in 1874, but in both sections the language as to compensation is the same as in the acts of 1866 and 1868, above quoted. This provision underwent a change in 1880, when by amendment it assumed this form: "In criminal cases, when the testimony has been taken down or subscribed upon the order of the court, the fees of the reporter shall be certified by the court, and paid out of the treasury of the county or city and county in which the case is tried upon the order of the court." See Amend. Codes 1880, p. 55. We see nothing in this change which divests the court of power to fix the compensation of the reporter. The power to fix is implied by the power to certify. The greater power includes the less. The power to fix is a means by which the court reaches the result which it is called on to certify, viz., the amount of the fees or compensation. These provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, as to reporters, are found in title 4, pt. 1. Part 1 relates to courts of justice, and title 4 of this part to ministerial officers of courts of justice. See "Summary of Contents," (Olney's 4th Ed.) Code Civil Proc. Chapter 3 of title 4 treats of phonographic reporters as ministerial officers of courts of justice in California. In the view of the lawmaking power, these reporters were regarded as official adjuncts of the courts of justice, and we think the testimony of bench and bar would be universal that they are most valuable adjuncts. They are officers of the court, and take an oath as such. Code Civil Proc. § 272. The legislation on the subject shows that the laws relating to phonographic reporters pertain to the judicial system of the state, and are part and parcel of it, and so have been ever since their adoption, at least since the adoption of the Codes. Reference is made to section 19 of the Political Code as bearing on this subject. In that section it is provided: "Nothing in either of the four Codes affects any of the provisions of the following statutes, but such statutes are recognized as continuing in force, notwithstanding the provisions of the Codes, except so far as they have been repealed or affected by subsequent laws: (1) All acts incorporating or chartering municipal corporations, and acts amending or supplementing such acts; (2) all acts consolidating cities and counties, and acts amending or supplementing such acts." That by these provisions the consolidation act, and the acts amending or supplementing it, were continued in force, except so far as they were repealed or affected by subsequent legislation, there can be no doubt. But the provisions of that act were not enlarged by this section. It recognized it as existing, unrepealed, and unaffected by anything in the four Codes. It remained the same as it was before the passage of the Codes, giving jurisdiction to the officials of the municipality over the same subjects, and the same demands upon the city and county treasury, which it conferred before the Codes became law, and no other. Those demands were defined in the acts referred to, but there was no demand among them relating to the compensation of phonographic reporters. Such a demand was never a part of the municipal business. Although the laws relating to such reporters had been in existence before the adoption of the Codes, allowing their compensation to be fixed by the court and paid out of the county treasuries, by the order of the court, the boards of supervisors had nothing to do with such demands, or, if they did have anything to do in passing on such demands, such action was supererogatory and extrajurisdictional. The order on the treasurer to pay the demand on the allocatur of the court was imperative and unqualified, and there can be no doubt that the treasurer was protected by law in making such payment. Section 95 of the consolidation act specifies the demands payable out of the city and county treasury, (see St. 1856, pp. 172, 173,) and we look in vain in it, at any period of its existence, for any provision authorizing the payment of compensation to phonographic reporters. Section 97 of the same act restricts all demands payable out of the treasury of the city and county to those within the powers of the board of supervisors under the act, and section 98 expressly inhibits the payment, at any time, of any expenditure not authorized by the act. The powers of the board of supervisors are enumerated in section 74 of the act, and we cannot find at any period of the existence of this section, or in any phase which it has assumed, any power vested in such board in relation to the compensation of phonographic reporters. That the demands referred to in the consolidation act are those mentioned in and authorized by it is further clearly shown by the language used in section 82, to this effect: "No payment can be made from the treasury, or out of the public funds of said city and county, unless the same be specifically authorized by this act, nor unless the demand which is paid be duly audited, as in this act provided, and that must appear on the face of it." See article 6, Consolidation Act, "Finance and Revenue," and section 68 of same act.

The provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, above referred to, repeal nothing of the consolidation act. But it may be said, if it does not repeal, it affects, that act. How, it would be difficult to point out. If the provisions of the consolidation act are left untouched, if its officers exercised the same powers and discharged the same functions under this act after as before the Code legislation alluded to, we cannot perceive that the act is affected. That the powers of the officers are changed, or their duties interfered with, nowhere appears. It does not act upon, or produce an effect on, or change (see Webster's definition of "affect") any of the provisions of the consolidation act; and if it does not act on, or produce an effect on, or change, any of the provisions of that act, it can scarcely be held that such act is affected. The Code legislation may, and does, superadd a duty to an officer, the treasurer, which he was not called on to discharge before. It does this by an independent and distinct statute. But this does not affect any power or duty vested in him by the consolidation act. Those duties remain as they were, and another one is added. To say that this additional duty cannot be imposed on any officer of the corporation is to deny to the legislature the power conferred on it by the paramount organic law.

Treating the four Codes as parts of the same statute, (Pol. Code, § 4480,) it becomes the duty of the judiciary, in their interpretation, to reconcile all conflicts, if it can be done. And conceding that the above-cited provisions of section 19 of the Political Code and the sections of the Code of Civil Procedure in regard to phonographic reporters seemingly conflict, they ought to be so construed as to make every word of each have its proper meaning and effect, and this can be easily done by referring the provisions of the consolidated act to the objects for which it was intended and the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure to the objects for which it was enacted, in accordance with the rule of distributive construction expressed in the Latin maxim, reddendo singula singulis. It would be very strange if the compilers of the Codes had inserted a provision in the Code of Civil Procedure conflicting with a statute continued by the provisions of the Code, with a declaration that nothing in the Codes should affect this statute, and that the legislature should have enacted the Codes in the same shape. Certainly, it never was in the contemplation of the framers of the Codes, or of the legislature enacting them, that anything in the Code of Civil Procedure in relation to phonographic reporters had any reference to any provision of the consolidation act or affected any of its provisions. There are other declarations in the Code of Civil Procedure, inserted as rules for its interpretation, which go to show that the provisions as to reporters were never intended to conflict with or affect, and did not conflict with or affect, anything contained in the consolidation act. Thus, section 4 of the Code of Civil Procedure declares: "The Code establishes the law of this state respecting the subjects to which it relates, and its provisions and all proceedings under it are to be liberally construed, with a view to effect its objects and to promote justice." We know no other statute in the state in regard to phonographic reporters than the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure, and those provisions under the rule laid down in section 4, above cited, establish the law on the subject to which it relates, viz., phonographic reporters. Can it be said, in the face of this clear and distinctive declaration, that the provisions of the Code of Civil Procedure on this matter are in anyway superseded, affected, or changed by any other statute, even by the consolidation act? Again, section 5 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides: "The provisions of this Code, so far as they are substantially the same as existing statutes, must be construed as continuations thereof, and not as new enactments." This is in part a rule of construction, and as such its meaning is that words used in former statutes on the same subject have the same meaning in this Code as in the former statute, which statute is repealed, whether consistent with the provisions of the Code or not. Section 18, Code Civil Proc. It would, in our judgment, be a strained construction to hold that the Code of Civil Procedure did not establish the law of this state in regard to phonographic reporters, their compensation and mode and manner of payment. Whether the consolidation act can be changed by general laws enacted by the legislature is a question which does not arise in this case, as there is nothing in the act mentioned relating in any way to phonographic reporters.

But, conceding that such question does arise, it is very easy of determination. The constitution expressly declares that "cities or towns heretofore or hereafter organized, and all charters framed or adopted by authority of this constitution, shall be subject to and controlled by general laws." Const. § 6, art. 11. It would be difficult to use language more plainly and clearly declaring that all cities or towns, whenever organized, shall be subject to and controlled by general laws, and all charters thereof framed or adopted by virtue of the constitution shall also be subject to and controlled by general laws. That this provision applies to the city and county of San Francisco is plainly declared in section 7 of the same article. This could hardly be otherwise under a constitution in which the broad legislative power is vested in a legislature, without restriction on the power of enacting general laws. The restrictions on the legislative power extend only to special and local statutes. There are none in regard to its exercise of the power by general legislation. Now, to hold that a charter of a city, or city and county, is beyond the reach of general laws passed by the legislature, would be to place the power of a part of the state over the power of the whole; to accord a greater power to a particular district, and that a very small district, than to the whole state. The order of things by such a ruling would be reversed, and a beneficial exercise of the central power would be neutralized by a local authority, and the rights of the citizens of the state out of such locality would be affected by a legislation entirely beyond their control, even when acting with all the representatives of the other portions of the state, convened as a legislature in senate and assembly. The evils of local and special laws are not found in general legislation. General laws are enacted by all the representatives of the people. Each representative knows when he casts his vote that such a law will act upon his constituents and himself, and may affect their and his interests. Such is not the case with local and special laws. They only affect a district or class, and the majority of the legislature frequently impose such laws on a minority with a reckless disregard of right, because such laws do not operate upon their constituents nor themselves. Their constituents and themselves are safe from the consequences of such unrighteous laws, and, careless of the rights of others who are a powerless minority, in the spirit of apres nous le deluge, the majority enacts laws oppressive of such feeble minority. This law concerning reporters is a general law. The compensation of the reporters is fixed by a judge, elected in the city and county by the same constituents who elect the board of supervisors, and the other officers of the city and county, and all are responsible for misconduct in office to the same constituency. Thus the local influence is as much felt by the judge as by the officials of the city and county, and every guaranty for a faithful and honest discharge of official duty is had in the case of the judicial incumbent as of the board of supervisors. The danger of lack of local influence and local responsibility is no less in the case of the judge than of the officers of the municipality.

There is another consideration which is entitled to be regarded in the discussion of this subject. The law in relation to phonographic reporters appertained to the judicial system of the state, and constituted a part of it. Such laws were kept in existence by the eleventh section of article 22 of the constitution, until changed by legislation. It would be strange if the administration of such a law were committed to boards of supervisors or other officers of a municipality. Some degree of discretion is left to the official administering this law. The compensation must be fixed by the court, or the fees certified by the court. Section 274, Code Civil Proc. Such duty appertains to the court. Would it not be peculiarly strange if a board of supervisors was to be required to supervise the action of a court under a form of government where the judicial, executive, and legislative functions are distinctly separated by the organic law? We think this would be an anomaly in legislation which does not appear in our statutes. That a board of supervisors should review and reverse or modify the action of a court of general jurisdiction would be a thing unheard of in our system. If the board under the city charter can act on such claim, it can disallow it, or it can allow in part. Sections 83, 85, 92, Consol Act. It may cut down the compensation so that no competent reporter can be found to undertake the work. Thus the administration of the law in criminal cases would be embarrassed and impeded. An unseemly and unfortunate conflict between two departments of the government may thus be brought about, which should by all means be avoided. It is no answer to this to say that it is highly improbable that such a conflict will ever occur. Stranger things have happened. It might occur, and an interpretation of the law which might allow it should not be made. What is said above applies to any presentation made to the auditor for his action. Such action is not required. The legislation of this kind is not new. Witnesses in criminal cases were required to be paid, by a provision of the Penal Code, out of the county treasury by the county treasurer upon the order of the county judge. The production of the order, or a certified copy of it, was alone required to make it the duty of the treasurer to pay it. Section 1329, Pen. Code. Such was section 1329 as it was originally framed. It was afterwards modified by amendment in 1876. By this change the court in one case, and the judge of the court in all others, were empowered by written order to direct the auditor to draw his warrant on the treasurer, "in favor of witnesses for a reasonable sum, to be specified in the order, for the necessary expenses of the witness." No intervention of the board of supervisors is required here, nor does it affect the consolidation act for the reasons above set forth. The legislature fixes the mode of audit and payment in this, as in all other, cases, out of county or city, or city and county treasuries, within the constitutional limits, and the law is valid. See, also, the power given to the judges of the courts to create a charge on the county or city and county treasuries by section 144 of the Code of Civil Procedure, where suitable rooms for holding courts and the chambers of judges thereof are not provided in any city and county, or county, by the supervisors thereof. Here a charge is created against the treasuries of the political divisions mentioned in opposition to the action of the board of supervisors. It will be observed that the provision as to payment of compensation to the reporters in criminal cases in the first act passed on the subject (St. 1861, p. 498) was that the compensation should be fixed by the court and paid out of the treasury in the same manner as the fees of trial jurors are paid in such cases. The statute as to the payment of trial jurors may be seen in Parker's Supp. Gen. Laws Cal. par. 8084, p. 160. This payment was to be made, on the certificate of the clerk of the court, out of the county treasury or other county dues. If this should be held to require the action of the board of supervisors or of the auditor, then the change made by the acts of 1866 and 1868 becomes very significant, and plainly indicates that no action of board or auditor is required. I am of opinion that the order of the superior court is within its jurisdiction, the application should be dismissed, and the petitioner remanded to the custody of the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco.

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 24, 1883.)

MORTGAGES—DEED ABSOLUTE ON ITS FACE—DECLARATIONS OF GRANTEE.

In an action to redeem from a deed absolute on its face, but claimed to be intended as a mortgage, conversations between the parties subsequent to the deed, relative to its execution, are competent evidence.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Stanislaus county.

Bill by F. H. Ross against James Brusie to redeem from a deed absolute on its face, claimed to have been intended as a mortgage. Judgment for defendant, and order refusing new trial. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Scaniker & Branch and Scrivner & McKinne, for appellant. W. E. Turner, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. We are of opinion that the court erred in sustaining the objection, on the ground of incompetency, to the following question put to the plaintiff while testifying: "Did you at any time within three years have any conversation with the defendant relative to the execution of this deed and bond?" Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded.

McAFEE et al. v. FISHER.[1]

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 24, 1883.)

ACTION ON DUEBILL—MATURITY—ESTOPPEL IN PAIS.

1. An instrument as follows: "Due Mr. Maurice Dore the sum of five thousand five hundred and ninety-one dollars, in settlement of land purchased in Sutter county, the payment of which to be mutually arranged,"—is not due until the payment has been arranged.

2. The maker of such instrument stated, to one about to purchase the same, that it was valid and binding, and had been delivered in the ordinary course of business, and would be paid. Held, that he was not estopped from denying that the instrument had matured.

Department 2. Appeal from district court.

Action by William C. McAfee and another against Morton C. Fisher upon an instrument for the payment of money. Judgment for plaintiffs, and order denying a new trial. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

Vincent Neale, for appellant. Greathouse & Blanding, for respondents.

THORNTON, J. This is an action brought by the assignees of the payee, Dore, hereinafter named, to recover upon the following instrument in writing: "$5,591. San Francisco, Nov. 3d, 1877. Due Mr. Maurice Dore the sum of five thousand five hundred and ninety-one dollars, in settlement of land purchased in Sutter county, the payment of which to be mutually arranged. MORTON C. FISHER." It is evident that the time of payment of this money was to be arranged between the maker and payee. If the words, "the payment of which to be mutually arranged," in the foregoing instrument, mean anything whatever, it is that the time of payment was to be thereafter fixed and agreed on by the parties Dore and Fisher. We perceive nothing else open to be "mutually arranged." The amount in money was fixed, and the consideration agreed on and mentioned in the paper, viz., "in settlement of land purchased in Sutter county." It nowhere appears, either in the evidence or the finding, that the time of the payment has ever been arranged between the parties referred to. The action then is prematurely brought, unless it appears that the defendant is estopped to aver that the same was not due when this action was brought. It is found upon this point as follows: "That prior to the 17th day of November, 1877, and before accepting said duebill or obligation, plaintiffs went to said defendant, Fisher, and told him that they contemplated purchasing the same, and asked him if the same was a valid instrument given and delivered for a bona fide indebtedness, and would be paid upon demand; and that said Fisher expressly represented to plaintiffs that said instrument was valid and binding, and had been executed and delivered by him to said Dore in the ordinary course of business, and for a full and valuable consideration; and told said plaintiffs that it was all right, and would be paid; and that said plaintiffs thereupon executed and delivered to said Dore a full and complete release and discharge of said Dore of and from all claims and indebtedness due said plaintiffs from him, said Dore, and particularly of and from the indebtedess from said Dore to plaintiffs, in payment of which said duebill or obligation was proposed to be and was thereafter indorsed and transferred to them by said Dore, and took and accepted said Fisher as their debtor, in place and instead of said Dore, whom they then and there released as aforesaid." The facts contained in this finding, while estopping defendant from denying the validity of the instrument, do not estop him from denying that the time of payment had arrived. It is not found that defendant ever told the plaintiffs that the money mentioned in this action was due and payable before action brought. The finding is that "said Fisher expressly represented to plaintiffs that said instrument was valid and binding, and had been executed and delivered to him by Dore in the ordinary course of business, and for a full and valuable consideration, and told said plaintiffs that it was all right, and would be paid." There is no finding here that the instrument would be paid on demand.

[1] This case, filed October 24, 1883, is now published by request, with others, in order that the Pacific Reporter may cover all cases in volume 64, California Reports.

According to the finding, Fisher only said "that it was all right and would be paid." He did not say when it would be paid. What he said was perfectly consistent with the purport of the paper, that it would be paid when the time of payment had been mutually arranged, that is, agreed upon by Dore and the defendant. The meaning of the language of the paper is a question of law, and its meaning was, in contemplation of law, as well known to the plaintiffs as defendant. We cannot see, under the facts found, that there was any estoppel by the acts or words of Fisher, by which he was estopped from averring and proving herein that the instrument had not matured for payment when this action was begun. It follows from the foregoing that the judgment and order must be reversed, and cause remanded, and it is so ordered.

FAIRBANKS v. ROBINSON et al.[1]

ALLOWANCE TO WIDOW—PURCHASE-MONEY MORTGAGE.

Code Civil Proc. § 1469, providing that, if an intestate's estate shall not exceed the sum of $1,500, the whole thereof shall, after a rule against persons interested to show cause against the same be set apart for the support of intestate's widow and minor children cannot so operate as to divest the rights of a purchase-money mortgagee in real estate forming a part of intestate's estate.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Stanislaus county.

Action by Ames Fairbanks against William H. Robinson, administrator of John T. Martin, deceased, and Olive Martin and John Martin, children of said decedent, to foreclose a purchase-money mortgage executed by decedent in his lifetime. The answer of the children alleged that decedent's estate was less in value than $1,500, and that the whole thereof had been assigned them for their support in lieu of a family allowance and homestead. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Code Civil Proc. § 1469, provides that, if a decedent's estate shall not exceed the sum of $1,500, the whole thereof shall be set apart for the use and support of his widow and minor children. No exception or reservation in favor of creditors, by lien or otherwise, is made, but it is provided that a rule shall issue requiring "all persons interested" to appear and show cause against the setting apart of the estate.

Johnson & Hazen, for appellants. T. A. Coldwell, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an action to foreclose a mortgage executed by the intestate Martin to secure a portion of the purchase money of the premises. The answer of the defendants Olive and John Martin avers that all the property of the intestate, including the mortgaged premises, was set apart to said defendants under section 1469 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The answer was demurred to, and the demurrer overruled. We are of opinion that the demurrer should have been sustained. The matters set up in the answer constitute no defense to this action. Judgment reversed, and cause remanded, with instruction to sustain the demurrer to defendants' answer, with leave to amend within 10 days after notice thereof.

WITNESS — CROSS-EXAMINATION — COMPETENCY— HUSBAND AND WIFE.

1. On a trial for burglary, a witness, charged with the same offense in a separate information, may be asked on cross-examination whether he expects leniency in his own case in consequence of his becoming a witness for the prosecution.

2. On a trial for burglary, the wife of a party charged with the same offense in a separate information is competent to testify to matters tending to implicate her husband. Code Civil Proc. § 1881, and Pen. Code, § 1322, providing that the wife is not a competent witness for or against her husband, apply only to actions in proceedings in which "one or both are parties."

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

This was an information against Joseph Langtree for burglary. There was an order refusing to sustain a demurrer to the information and one refusing to set it aside. One Brandon was charged in a separate information with the same offense, and his wife was called as a witness for the defense on the trial of Langtree. Her testimony tended to show defendant's innocence of the charge, and also to implicate her husband. The court refused to allow her to testify to matters having the latter effect. There was a verdict of guilty, and judgment thereon, and orders denying a motion in arrest of judgment and refusing a new trial, from which defendant appeals. Judgment and orders reversed.

Davis Louderback, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Marshall, for the People.

SHARPSTEIN, J. It does not appear that Mrs. Brandon, who was called as a witness by the defendant, objected to testifying to all that she knew in regard to the burglary for which he was on trial. Nor does it appear that her husband objected to her testifying. His counsel, Mr. Carson, stated that from the commencement of the trial he had interposed no objection whatever. On being informed by the court that at that stage he had a right to interfere, if he so elected, Mr. Carson replied: "I would much prefer not to have Mrs. Brandon examined." She was a competent witness, and the only question which could possibly arise was whether she could be compelled to testify to any fact which might implicate her husband in the offense with which the defendant was charged. And such evidently was the opinion of the court, which held that the witness might "be examined on any matters touching the case" except those "relating to her husband," but would "not permit her to testify as to any matters in which her husband was implicated in the crime for which the defendant was on trial." It is of this that the defendant complains. There was a separate information pending in the court, in which the husband of the witness was charged with the same burglary for which the defendant was on trial. But said husband was not in any sense a party to the action or proceeding in which his wife was called as a witness. If he had been, his wife could not have been a witness for or against him, unless both he and she consented thereto. Pen. Code, § 1322; Code Civil Proc. § 1881. And it is claimed by the attorney general "that, although the husband of the witness was not a party to the proceedings then before the court, the fact that he was under information for the same offense made his connection with those proceedings such that the testimony of his wife, implicating him in the crime, would have been a breach of confidence repugnant to the policy and intention of the law, and a manifest violation of its meaning." In support of this he cites section 1881, Code Civil Proc., which reads as follows: "A husband cannot be examined for or against his wife, without her consent; nor a wife for or against her husband without his consent; nor can either, during the marriage or afterwards, be, without the consent of the other, examined as to any communication made by one to the other during the marriage; but this exception does not apply to a civil action or proceeding by one against the other, nor to a criminal action or proceeding for a crime committed by one against the other." This is the provision of the Code upon the subject, and it must prevail: "All statutes, laws, and rules heretofore in force in this state, whether consistent or not with the provisions of this Code, unless expressly continued in force by it, are repealed and abrogated." Code Civil Proc. § 18. "A wife cannot be examined for or against her husband without his consent." But when may she be said to be examined for or against him? If examined in an action or proceeding to which he was a party, she would undoubtedly be examined for or against him. Any witness examined in an action or proceeding is examined for one party and against the other therein. No witness is said to be examined for or against any one not a party to the action or proceeding in which such witness is called to testify. And the testimony of a witness is not evidence for or against any one not a party to the action or proceeding in which such testimony is given. If the husband of this witness had been a party to the action on trial she could not have been examined at all without his consent. She could not then have been examined in regard to any matters whatever, because, if relevant, her testimony would be, in some degree, for or against him. Not being a party to the action, her testimony could not be used for or against him. Thus far we have considered the provision of the Code of Civil Procedure as if it were the only one relating to the subject. But it is not. There is a provision of the Penal Code on the same subject. It is as follows: "Except with the consent of both, or in case of criminal violence upon one by the other, neither husband nor wife is a competent witness for or against the other in a criminal action or proceeding to which one or both are parties." Pen. Code, § 1322. This is the latest enactment on the subject, and relates exclusively to criminal actions or proceedings. It limits the incompetency of a husband or wife to testify in criminal actions or proceedings for or against each other to cases in which one or both are parties. By section 1102, Pen. Code, the rules of evidence in civil actions are made applicable also to criminal actions, except as otherwise provided in said Penal Code. Therefore, if there be any repugnancy between the provisions of the two Codes on this subject, that of the Penal Code must prevail. We think, upon a fair construction, both mean the same thing, although the Penal Code is more explicit than the other. On this, as on nearly every other subject to which the Codes relate, they are simply declaratory of what the law would be if there were no Codes. State v. Bridgman, 49 Vt. 206; Com. v. Reid, 8 Phila. 385; Same v. Patterson, Id. 609; State v. Briggs, 9 R. I. 361; Insurance Co. v. Noble, 5 Abb. Pr. (N. S.) 55; Rex v. Inhabitants, etc., 6 Maule & S. 194; Same v. Inhabitants of Llangunnor, 2 Barn. & Adol. 616; Reg. v. Halliday, 8 Cox, Crim. Cas. 298; Henman v. Dickinson, 5 Bing. 184; Reg. v. Williams, 8 Car. & P. 286; Higbee v. McMillan, 18 Kan. 136; 1 Greenl. Ev. 342; Rosc. Crim. Ev. 148; 1 Whart. Ev. 425; Warton, Crim. Ev. 396, 402; Schouler, Husb. & Wife, 85. "On the whole," says Schouler, "the prevailing tendency of late years in both England and America is to regard the domestic confidence or the ties of a spouse as of little consequence compared with the public convenience of extending the means of ascertaining the truth in all cases; such facilities being increased, it is believed, by hearing what each one has to say, and then making due allowance for circumstances affecting each one's credibility." Schouler, Husb. & Wife, 85.

On the cross-examination of Patrick Brandon, who, as before stated, was charged in a separate information with the same burglary for which the defendant was on trial, the counsel for defendant endeavored by appropriate questions to elicit from the witness whether he expected, in consequence of his becoming a witness for the prosecution, that he would be favored or more leniently dealt by when his own case should come up. To several questions of this character his answers were evasive. The court, seeing this, should have compelled the witness to give a direct answer. Instead of doing so, however, the court sustained an objection of the prosecution to a question put by the defendant's counsel to the witness as to his expectations. These are the only material errors which the record discloses.

Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

PEOPLE v. SCHMIDT.[1]

HOMICIDE—OBJECTIONS TO INFORMATION—FORMER CONVICTION.

1. An information will not be set aside on motion, except on the grounds specified in Pen. Code, § 995.

2. A demurrer to an information will not lie on any ground other than those specified in Pen. Code, § 1004.

3. A conviction of murder, set aside at the instance of defendant because of a defect in the information, is not a bar to a subsequent trial and conviction on a valid information for the same offense.

4. Defendant was convicted of murder. On appeal the conviction was set aside for defect in the information, and the case remanded for further proceedings. The court below dismissed the prosecution under Pen. Code, § 1385, which allows such dismissal when "in furtherance of justice," and allows the retention of defendant in custody for proceedings on a new information. Held, that defendant was properly proceeded against under a new information, and that his pleas of "once in jeopardy" and "former conviction" constituted no defense.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Butte county.

Information in the superior court of Butte county against Herman Schmidt for murder. From a conviction and an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

John W. Turner and Gray & Sexton, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Marshall, for the People.

McKEE, J. The appeal in this case is from a judgment of death pronounced against the defendant upon a conviction for murder in the first degree, upon an information filed March 13, 1883, in the superior court of Butte county, and also from an order denying a motion for new trial. It is stipulated in the record of the case that the verdict was warranted by the evidence, except on the issues of "once in jeopardy" and "a former conviction;" also that all the proceedings at the trial were regular, with the exception of the errors which are specified. The specifications of error are that the court refused to set aside the information upon motion, overruled a demurrer to the information, and, after conviction, refused to arrest the judgment, and denied defendant's motion for a new trial. The grounds enumerated in section 995 of the Penal Code are the only grounds upon which an indictment or information may be set aside on motion, (People v. Southwell, 46 Cal. 141;) and those enumerated in section 1004 of the Penal Code are the only grounds upon which a demurrer to an indictment or information may be made. Neither the motion to set aside the information nor the demurrer to the information was based upon any of the grounds enumerated in these sections, except that one of the grounds of the motion was that the defendant had not been legally committed by a magistrate before the filing of the information; and one of the grounds of the demurrer was that the information did not conform to the requirements of sections 950–952, Pen. Code. But the information substantially conformed to those sections; and the record of the case shows that the defendant had been legally committed by a magistrate pursuant to section 872 of the Penal Code, before the information was filed. There was therefore no error in denying the motion to set aside, nor in overruling the demurrer. Nor was there any error in denying the motion in arrest of judgment, because that motion was based upon the ground specified in the demurrer, which, as we have before seen, was properly overruled.

[1] This case, filed October 26, 1883, is now published by request, with others, in order that the Pacific Reporter may cover all cases in volume 64, California Reports.

But the principal question at issue, urged by the appellant and argued on the hearing, arises out of the specification of error that the verdicts upon the pleas of "once in jeopardy" and "a former conviction" were contrary to the law and the evidence. At the trial of the issues raised by these pleas, the defendant proved that he had been tried and found guilty of murder in the first degree for the same homicide, upon an information filed in the superior court of Butte county, June 29, 1882. But it was also proved that the information upon which he was convicted contained no allegation that the homicide had been committed with "malice aforethought," nor were any words of equivalent import used in it to describe the crime; the information was therefore fatally defective. Nevertheless, judgment of death was pronounced against the defendant; but he appealed from the judgment to this court, and obtained a reversal of the judgment, because of the defective information upon which the conviction was had, and the court "remanded the cause for further proceedings." People v. Schmidt, 63 Cal. 28. Yet the defendant contends that that conviction and judgment, although they have been set aside at his own instance, constitute a bar to further prosecution for the same crime upon the ground that he has been once in jeopardy. The mere statement of the proposition would seem to be its own refutation; for the judgment having been vacated, and the conviction set aside at the instance of the defendant himself, there was no existing judgment or conviction which could be availed of as a bar to the action. No case can be found where, the verdict of guilty having been set aside on motion of the prisoner, it has been held a bar to another trial. U. S. v. Keen, 1 McLean, 435.

But it is argued that on reversing the judgment this court did not remand the case for a new trial, and that in consequence of the failure to order a new trial the defendant was entitled to be discharged. A new trial upon a fatally defective information would be a vain thing; the case was therefore remanded for further proceedings. That did not entitle the defendant to be discharged from custody if the law authorized his detention. The legal effect of the remanding order was to remit the defendant to his original position upon his plea of not guilty to the information on file, just as though a trial had never been had, and, upon the going down of the remittitur to the superior court, that court had jurisdiction to proceed in the case before it in any way authorized by the criminal law. Now, a superior court in which a criminal action is pending has authority to dismiss the action, and to direct the resubmission or reexamination of the charge, and, in the mean time, detain the defendant in custody for his appearance to answer a new indictment or information, in the following cases: (1) Where in the trial of a cause it appears that the facts as charged do not constitute an offense punishable by law, and, in the opinion of the court, a new indictment or information can be framed, upon which the defendant can be legally convicted. Section 1117, Pen. Code. (2) Where, after a verdict of acquittal has been given, because of a variance between the pleading and proof which may be obviated by a new indictment or information. Section 1165, Id. (3) When, after an order in arrest of judgment, it appears to the court, from the evidence given on the trial, there is reason to believe the defendant guilty, and a new indictment or information can be framed upon which he may be convicted. Section 1188, Id. (4) Where, in the judgment of the court, the dismissal of the action would be "in furtherance of justice." Upon that ground the court is authorized of its own motion, or upon the application of the district attorney, to order the dismissal of an action or indictment. Section 1385, Id.

Under the provisions of the last cited section of the Penal Code, proceedings were taken by the superior court against the defendant. Upon due notice given, the district attorney moved the court to dismiss the action and retain the defendant in custody for a re-examination upon a new charge for the same homicide. The defendant and his counsel were present at the hearing of the motion, and made no objection; and the court ordered the dismissal of the action upon the ground stated in section 1385, supra. After the entry of the order a new charge of murder was made against the defendant, upon which he was regularly examined before a magistrate, and committed to answer. The dismissal of the former action did not constitute a bar to another prosecution for the same homicide. Section 1387, Pen. Code. Nor did the proceedings after the dismissal and before the filing of the second information have that effect; nor could the former conviction upon the first information be availed of for that purpose, because it had been set aside on the motion of the defendant himself. Having been set aside, at the instance of the defendant, upon the ground that the information was insufficient in form and substance to sustain the conviction, it cannot be legally said that the defendant had been already tried and convicted upon an information valid and sufficient to sustain a conviction for the same offense of which he has been since convicted upon another information. He has therefore not been tried twice for the same offense.

People v. Gilmore, 4 Cal. 376, is not a parallel case to the one in hand. In that case the defendant was indicted for murder and convicted of manslaughter. On his own motion verdict was set aside, and he was put on trial a second time upon the same indictment, and was convicted of murder; but the supreme court set aside the conviction upon the ground that the former conviction for manslaughter was an acquittal for murder, and the defendant could not be retried for the crime of which he had been acquitted, although the conviction for the less offense was set aside on his own motion. That decision was followed in the case of People v. Backus, 5 Cal. 275, and was quoted approvingly by Justice Sawyer in People v. Apgar, 35 Cal. 389, but neither Justice Sanderson nor Justice Rhodes expressed an opinion, both concurring in the judgment in the case upon other grounds. Whether those cases would be considered as binding upon this court under the provisions of the Penal Code, it is not necessary now to decide; for in the case in hand there has been no acquittal of a greater offense by a conviction for a lesser offense included within the greater, and there has been no retrial upon the same offense. There was a conviction for the highest offense under an information, which was adjudged insufficient to sustain the conviction. There was, therefore, no implied verdict of acquittal available for any purpose, and, as the conviction was set aside on the defendant's motion, there is no existing verdict of any sort which can be availed of as a bar to a further prosecution for the same crime. Therefore the defendant has not been in jeopardy, within the meaning of the constitution, and there was no error in denying his motion for a new trial. We find no error in the record.

Judgment and order affirmed.

Doerfler v. Schmidt.[1]

Service of Summons—Affidavit—Vacating. Deed—Waiver of Service.

1. An affidavit of service of summons, which states that affiant, who served it, is over the age of 18, but does not show that he was of that age at the time of service, is insufficient.

2. In an action to set aside a deed as fraudulent, the complaint will be fatally defective unless it avers delivery of the deed.

3. Statements in an affidavit used on a motion to set aside a default cannot be deemed a waiver of service of the summons.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county.

Action by Joseph Doerfler against Albert Schmidt to set aside a deed as having been procured by fraud. In the affidavit to show service of summons, affiant stated that "I am over the age of eighteen, and that I did on the 6th day of March, 1879, personally serve the defendant." The affidavit was made March 7, 1879. The complaint failed to aver that the deed sought to be avoided had been delivered. There was judgment for plaintiff, from which, and from an order refusing a new trial, defendant appeals. Judgment and order reversed.

H. S. Mulford, for appellant. Thomas Watts, for respondent.

Per Curiam. The proof of service of the summons was insufficient. Maynard v. McCrellish, 57 Cal. 355, was decided upon a similar state of attempted proof. The statement in the affidavit used on the motion to set aside the default cannot be deemed a waiver of the service. We cannot look beyond the judgment roll for the purpose of ascertaining the validity of the judgment. It is argued that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, in that it does not aver a delivery of the deed. We think the point is well taken.

Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings.

Perjury—Identification before Notary—Competency of Grantor.

The oath of a person before a notary public in his own behalf, identifying himself as the grantor in a deed, is competent for that purpose, where affiant is not within any of the exceptions of Code Civil Proc. §§ 1879, 1880, disqualifying witnesses; and such oath being with respect to a material matter, if false, renders the affiant guilty of perjury. Ross and McKinstry, JJ., dissenting.

In bank. Petition for a writ of habeas corpus. Petition denied.

Tyler & Tyler, for petitioner.

McKee, J. The petitioner is held in custody by an order of commitment holding him to answer upon a charge of perjury. He complains that his imprisonment is illegal, because there was no evidence before the committing magistrate to sustain the charge, and no sufficient cause to believe him guilty. The evidence upon which the order was made showed that between the hours of 8 and 9 o'clock on the night of the 21st of April, 1883, the petitioner appeared before a notary public in Solano county, to acknowledge the execution of a deed, which he then exhibited to the notary, signed by one E. Bouchard as the grantor therein named. The notary, having had no personal knowledge of the petitioner, administered to him an oath, as a witness in his own behalf, for the purpose of determining whether he was the person who had signed the deed which he wished to acknowledge; and the petitioner on oath testified that he was E. Bouchard, the person named in and who executed the deed. Upon that evidence the notary took the acknowledgment, certified to it, and returned the deed, with his certificate annexed, to the petitioner. The identity of a party acknowledging the execution of an instrument is an essential fact to be found by the officer taking the aknowledgment; and it must be found by him from his personal knowledge of the person, or from satisfactory evidence of a witness, and, when found, it must be stated in the certificate of acknowledgment. In the proceeding before the notary the testimony given by the petitioner was therefore material, and the evidence before the committing magistrate showed that it was false. Being false, the act of taking the oath was an act coupled with an intent prejudicial to one or the other or both of the parties named in the deed, and the evidence made a sufficient cause to hold the petitioner to answer upon the charge of perjury, if the notary had authority to administer the oath. There is no question that the notary was an officer legally authorized to take and certify acknowledgments to written instruments, and to administer oaths and take testimony for that purpose. Section 1181, Civil Code, and section 2093, Code Civil Proc. His jurisdiction, it is true, is limited by law to cases in which he personally knows, or has satisfactory evidence on the oath or affirmation of a credible witness, that the person making the acknowledgment is the person who executed the instrument. In the proceeding commenced by the petitioner the notary had jurisdiction, and, as the petitioner was unkown to him, he had authority to administer an oath to any credible witness for the purpose of ascertaining and determining the fact of the petitioner's identity with the grantor named in the deed before taking his acknowledgment. The question, therefore, arises whether, under such circumstances, the petitioner was a competent witness in his own behalf to prove that he was the person described in and who had executed the deed. By the practice act of 1850, all persons who were parties to an action or proceeding, or for whose immediate benefit the action or proceeding was prosecuted or defended, or who were the assignors of the things in action for the purpose of becoming witnesses, and all black and mulatto persons and Indians, in actions to which a white person was a party, were excluded from testifying. Sections 304–306, St. 1850, p. 455. And "no acknowledgment of any conveyance whereby any real estate was to be conveyed, or might be affected, could be legally taken, unless the person offering to make such acknowledgment was personally known to the officer taking the acknowledgment to be the person whose name was subscribed to the conveyance as a party thereto, or was proved to be such by the oath of a credible witness." The name of the witness was required to be inserted in the certificate of acknowledgment, and he had to be another than the grantor, for the grantor himself could not, at that time, as a witness in his own behalf, prove the execution of his deed. The deed had to be attested, and its execution could be proved only—"First, by the testimony of a subscribing witness; second, when all the subscribing witnesses were dead or could not be had, by evidence of the handwriting of the party of at least one subscribing witness, given by a credible witness to each signature." St. 1850, pp. 249, 250. In 1851 the legislature declared all persons competent to testify, except persons to an action or proceeding, or for whose immediate benefit the action or proceeding was to be prosecuted or defended, all persons of unsound mind, children under 10 years of age, who appeared incapacitated to receive just impressions of facts and to relate them truly, and Indians or persons having one fourth or more of Indian blood, etc. Sections 391–393, St. 1851, pp. 113, 114. In 1854 the disqualification of a witness was extended to "all persons who had a present, certain, and vested interest in the event of the action or proceeding," and to all unpardoned convicts of felony St. 1854, pp. 66, 67. Subsequently, by an act passed April 27, 1863, sections 391 and 392 of the act of 1851 were so amended that the disqualification of interest in the action or proceeding was entirely removed; and it was enacted that "the parties to any action or proceeding were competent to give evidence either viva voce or by deposition, or in any other legal mode, as any other witness, in behalf of himself, or of any of the parties to the action or proceeding," except where the adverse party, or the party for whose immediate benefit the action or proceeding was prosecuted or defended, was the representative of a deceased person, and the facts to be proved transpired before his death. At the same time it was provided that "nothing contained in section 392 shall affect the laws in relation to the attestation of any instrument required to be attested." St. 1863, pp. 701, 702. The amendments of 1863 continued to be the law of the competency of witnesses until the Codes swept away nearly all of the disqualifications which had rendered persons incompetent. By sections 1879 and 1880 of the Code of Civil Procedure no person was excluded from testifying because of interest in the action or proceeding to which he was a party, nor because of conviction for crime, nor on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude. All persons were declared competent to testify, except persons of unsound mind, children under 10 years of age, who appeared incapable of receiving just impressions of facts, or of relating them truly, and parties to or in whose behalf an action or proceeding was commenced against an executor or administrator upon a claim or demand against the estate of a deceased person, and professional persons as to confidential communications made to them in their professional character, (sections 1879–1881, Code Civil Proc.;) and by section 1195 of the Civil Code it was provided that "proof of the execution of an instrument, when not acknowledged, may be made either (1) by the parties executing it, or either of them; or (2) by a subscribing witness; or (3) by other witnesses, in cases mentioned in section 1198." At the time the petitioner appeared before the notary to acknowledge the deed, which was signed by E. Bouchard, whom the petitioner falsely personated, he was not within any of the exceptions enumerated in sections 1879 and 1880 of the Code of Civil Procedure. He was therefore a competent witness in his own behalf in the proceeding before the notary, to which he was a party; and, when he testified falsely on the oath administered to him by the notary he subjected himself to be proceeded against for perjury. "Every person who, having taken an oath that he will testify, depose, or certify truly before an competent tribunal, officer, or person, in any of the cases in which such an oath may be administered, willfully and contrary to such oath states as true any material matter which he knows to be false, is guilty of perjury." Section 118, Pen. Code. And it is no defense to a prosecution for perjury that the oath was administered or taken in an irregular manner, (section 121, Pen. Code,) nor is the incompetency, even, of a witness, any defense; it is sufficient that he did give such testimony, (section 122, Pen. Code.) It follows, as the notary had jurisdiction in the proceeding before him to administer an oath to the petitioner, that the oath administered was judicial; and as the testimony of the petitioner given on oath was material to the proceeding, and shown to be false, there was probable cause for holding him to answer upon the charge against him. Writ dismissed, and petitioner remanded.

RICHMOND v. LATTIN et ux.[1]

COUNTERCLAIM—FORECLOSURE OF MORTGAGE—PAYMENT.

In an action to foreclose a mortgage, an answer setting up a sale of property to plaintiff in satisfaction of the mortgage sufficiently shows a counterclaim, under Code Civil Proc. § 438, which provides that a counterclaim must be (1) a cause of action arising out of the transaction set forth in the complaint or connected therewith, or, (2) in an action on a contract, any other cause of action arising upon contract.

Department 2. Appeal from district court.

Action by Charles B. Richmond against Ambrose J. Lattin and Almira, his wife, to foreclose a mortgage executed by defendants to secure a note for $1,000. The answer alleged that the property mortgaged was community property, and that the interest of the wife was a homestead right only, and set up as a defense and counterclaim a sale by defendant A. J. Lattin to plaintiff of an interest in a patent right for $2,000, of which $1,000 was in satisfaction of the mortgage in question. The answer further alleged that plaintiff had neglected and refused to give a certificate of satisfaction of the mortgage, though often requested to do so, and prayed a decree declaring the mortgage satisfied, and directing the payment of a forfeit of $100 to defendants because of such refusal. The court decreed that plaintiff pay to defendants $1,000 balance due on the sale of the patent, and the $100 forfeit, and that he acknowledge satisfaction of the mortgage. Plaintiff appeals. Code Civil Proc. § 438, provides that a counterclaim must be "a cause of action arising out of the transaction set forth in the complaint, * * * or connected with the subject of the action," or, "in an action arising upon contract, any other cause of action arising upon contract, and existing at the commencement of the action." From a judgment for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed on condition.

Albert A. Moore and John Reynolds, for appellant. J. C. Martin and J. C. Plunkett, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an action to foreclose a mortgage. The affirmative relief asked for by the defendants is sufficiently stated as a counterclaim, as to the $1,000, (subdivision 2, § 438, Code Civil Proc.,) and the evidence relating thereto is sufficient to sustain the findings. As to the $100 claimed as a forfeit for not executing, on demand, a certificate of discharge of the mortgage, the findings relating thereto are not sustained by the evidence. There is no evidence of the demand required by section 2951 of the Civil Code. As there is a want of evidence to sustain the findings in regard to the demand for satisfaction of the mortgage, and as we cannot direct a new trial on that portion of the case only, it is therefore ordered that if, within 20 days next succeeding the filing of this opinion, the defendants shall file in this court a stipulation in due form, remitting the sum of $100 from the judgment in favor of the defendants, and consenting to a reduction of said judgment to that extent, the said judgment in that event shall be affirmed as to the remainder thereof; but, if the defendants shall fail or neglect to file said stipulation within the said period above prescribed, then that said judgment be reversed, and said cause remanded for a new trial.

HAHN v. SCHMIDT.[2]

MALICIOUS PROSECUTION—FORGERY—BONA FIDES OF PROSECUTION—ERROR OF MAGISTRATE.

1. A person who in good faith makes affidavit before a magistrate of facts conceded to be true, and which the magistrate erroneously determines to be a particular offense, and issues a warrant accordingly, is not liable to the person arrested, for malicious prosecution.

2. It is not necessary that a person making affidavit before a magistrate of facts supposed by affiant to constitute a forgery of his name must have believed at the time that he was responsible for the payment of the money mentioned in the forged paper, in order to relieve him from liability in an action for malicious prosecution.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county.

Action by William Hahn against Joseph Schmidt. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Tyler & Tyler, for appellant. Samuel P. Hall, for respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J. This is an appeal from a judgment and from an order denying the plaintiff's motion for a new trial in an action for malicious prosecution. There are but two exceptions before us:

1. To that portion of the charge of the court contained in the following extract: "Now, I instruct you that this complaint, on the face of it, not only does not state facts which constitute the crime of forgery, or any crime; it merely shows that the plaintiff signed an acceptance, thus: 'Joseph Schmidt, per William Hahn;' and this in law does not constitute a forgery. Yet the facts stated in the complaint, although not constituting the crime of forgery, may be true, and if made to the justice in good faith, and the justice, upon the facts so stated, adjudged the offense to be forgery, and issued his warrant, under which the arrest was made, then, under such circumstances, the defendant would not be liable; and you are therefore instructed that if you find that the facts stated in the affidavit or the complaint upon which the plaintiff was prosecuted were true, and defendant at the time believed the facts to be true, then the defendant cannot be held liable in this action, even though such facts do not technically constitute a crime. Do not misapprehend my instruction. You must find that the charge made or facts stated are true, and that defendant so knew or believed, before this complaint can form a defense. In determining whether this complaint was in fact true, you should consider whether, in making the complaint, the defendant suppressed any facts shown by the evidence to be known by him. In this connection you may consider the restriction placed upon the plaintiff in the power of attorney, which rendered the acceptance void, and also the evidence on the subject of the circumstances under which the acceptance was made."

2. To the refusal of the court to give in this connection an instruction asked by the plaintiff, of which the following is a copy: "That, in order for such complaint to be made in good faith by Schmidt, he must have supposed that at the time he made it he was responsible upon the acceptance, and that it charged him with the payment of the money." The complaint referred to is in the form of an affidavit made by the defendant before a justice of the peace, who thereupon issued a warrant for the arrest of the plaintiff, and upon which he was arrested and brought before the justice on a charge of forgery. The charge was dismissed. The only question which arises upon the record is whether one who makes, before a committing magistrate, an affidavit stating facts conceded to be true, which the magistrate erroneously supposes constitute a crime, and proceeds accordingly, is liable in damages to the person whom the magistrate causes to be arrested upon such affidavit. In Leigh v. Webb, 3 Esp. 165, Lord ELDON ruled that if a party makes a complaint before a justice, which the justice conceives to amount to a felony, and issues his warrant against the party complained against, and the facts do not amount to felony, no action for malicious prosecution will lie against the party who made the complaint. In Cohen v. Morgan, 6 Dowl. & R. 8, ABBOTT, C. J., said: "There is nothing in the defendant's conduct to show that he was influenced by malice. To support the averment of malice it must be shown that the charge is willfully false. But here, according to the evidence, the defendant merely related his story to the magistrate, leaving it to him to determine whether the facts amounted to felony." Referring to Cohen v. Morgan, supra, Lord DENMAN, in Carratt v. Morley, 1 Gale & D. 275, said: "It is clear from that and other cases, and upon principle, that a party who merely originates a suit by stating his case to a court of justice is not guilty of trespass, though the proceeding should be erroneous or without jurisdiction." We are unable to find any English case in which Leigh v. Webb, supra, has been overruled, or the soundness of the views expressed by Lord ELDON even questioned. In McNeely v. Driskill, 2 Blackf. 259, Leigh v. Webb was cited and followed. But, in order to constitute a defense to an action for malicious prosecution, the facts stated in the complaint, if they do not constitute a crime, must nevertheless be true. Dennis v. Ryan, 63 Barb. 145; Collins v. Lowe, 7 Blackf. 416; Forrest v. Collier, 20 Ala. 175; Anderson v. Buchanan, 8 Ind. 132; Farlie v. Danks, 30 Eng. Law & Eq. 115. The court not only so charged the jury, but went further than any case which has fallen under our observation goes, and charged that the defendant must have believed at the time of making the complaint that the facts stated in it were true, in order to shield himself from liability. In each of the cases cited by appellant's counsel the complaint, on which the warrant for the arrest of the party issued, charged him with a criminal offense, or, if it did not, was false, as in Dennis v. Ryan, 63 Barb. 145. In Sutton v. McConnell, 46 Wis. 269, 50 N. W. Rep. 414, the defense was that the facts which the defendant stated to the magistrate did not constitute the offense charged in the complaint. But the defendant swore to the complaint, and the court held that he could not avail himself of the statement which he made to the magistrate, a person unlearned in the law, and his advice thereon, before the complaint was prepared, as a defense to an action of malicious prosecution, based upon his having caused the arrest of the plaintiff on a false and malicious charge. The charge of the court was as favorable to the plaintiff as the law would admit of its being, and the instruction asked and refused was properly refused. It is not necessary that a party who makes a complaint charging another with forgery should suppose that he (the party making the complaint) is responsible upon the forged instrument in order to constitute good faith in making the complaint. A party is never responsible for an unauthorized use of his name.

Judgment and order affirmed.

DERBY et al. v. STEVENS et al.[1]

STOCKHOLDER'S LIABILITY—SEVERAL JUDGMENTS—JURISDICTION OF SUPERIOR COURT—COSTS.

1. Under laws of California, making the liability of stockholders to creditors several only, Civil Code, § 322, authorizing two or more separate actions to be united in one, but requiring separate judgments to be entered against each defendant, and Const. 1849, art. 6, § 6, limiting the jurisdiction of the district court to demands not less than $300, the district (now superior) court cannot, in an action against several stockholders alleging a liability less than $300 as to some of defendants, take jurisdiction as to them.

2. But as to such of the defendants of whom an amount in excess of $300 was demanded, the court had jurisdiction to render judgments for less than $300.

3. The aggregate of the judgment recovered by plaintiff exceeded $300, but not having recovered any single judgment, joint or several, for $300 or more, he was not entitled to costs under Code Civil Proc. § 1022, entitling him thereto only in case of recovery of judgment for $300 or more.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by E. M. Derby and others against C. F. Stevens, H. W. Thomas, and others, to recover of defendants proportionate amounts for which they were liable as stockholders of the Livermore Mining Company. Less than $300 was claimed against any of the defendants except Thomas. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants Thomas and Stevens appeal. Reversed.

Curtis H. Lindley, for appellants. H. A. Powell, E. B. & J. W. Mastick, and Arthur Rodgers, for respondents.

MCKINSTRY, J. From the moment a debt is created by a corporation each of the then stockholders becomes primarily liable for his proportion of such debt. Neither by the constitution, nor by any statute, are the several stockholders made jointly liable to each of the creditors of the corporation. Section 322 of the Civil Code authorizes two or more separate actions to be united in one, but the issues to be joined between the plaintiff and each of the defendants are separate, and may be very different, and by the express language of the section a several judgment must be rendered as between the plaintiff and each of the defendants. The present action was brought in the district court. The sixth section of article 6 of the constitution of 1849, as amended in 1862, provided: "The district court shall have original jurisdiction * * * in all cases at law * * * in which the demand, exclusive of interest, * * * amounts to three hundred dollars," etc.

Under the former constitution, to bring a case, under section 322 of the Civil Code, within the jurisdiction of the district court, a plaintiff had to allege as due to him $300 or more, from one or more, or all, of the defendants separately. A demand supposes a tribunal or person on whom it is made. The demand spoken of in the constitution is a demand for judgment, evidenced by the prayer of a complaint, and a statement of facts which can uphold the judgment prayed for. If a stockholder's proportion of a certain debt is less than $300, and the creditor sues the stockholder for such proportion, the former does not demand a judgment against the latter for $300 or more. If the creditor shall unite as defendants other stockholders, the proportion of each of whom is less than $300, the creditor does not demand a judgment of $300 or more against the defendants severally, nor does he demand (under section 322 of the Civil Code he is not authorized to demand) a judgment for $300 or more against the defendants jointly. In such case the plaintiff does not pretend to demand a judgment against any one for $300 or more; he demands a several judgment against each of the defendants in a sum less than $300. If the creditor demanded a judgment for more than $300 against one of the defendants only, as in the case before us, the district court had jurisdiction only to render a judgment based upon such demand,—a demand for judgment against the particular defendant. The section of the Civil Code does not purport to provide that the actions therein authorized may be brought in the district or superior court, without regard to the judgments demanded; it provides that certain actions may be brought. The matter of jurisdiction is left intact, and a party proposing to bring the suit must select the appropriate forum. If he demands a judgment against one of the stockholders, defendants, or a several judgment against more than one, for $300 or more, the superior court has, as the district court had, jurisdiction to render a judgment against such defendant or defendants. If in the same action he demands a judgment for less than $300 against any of the defendants, the superior court has no jurisdiction to enter a judgment in plaintiff's favor against those defendants of whom he has so demanded less than $300. But when the plaintiff has demanded $300 or more as against any defendant, the district court had, and the superior court has, jurisdiction to enter a judgment for less than $300 against such defendant. The action should have ben dismissed as to all the defendants except H. W. Thomas, and a judgment entered against him for $280.65. Whether the judgments be or be not valid as against the defendants, other than Stevens or Thomas, inasmuch as Stevens alone has appealed, we are only required to order that the judgment be reversed as to defendant Stevens. There is no authority for the joint judgment for costs against all the defendants. This action is for the recovery of "money or damages," and plaintiff has recovered no judgment, joint or several, for $300 or over. Code Civil Proc. § 1022. Plaintiff was not entitled to any costs. It is not necessary to decide whether, in case he had recovered several judgments against two or more of the defendants, plaintiff would have been entitled to full costs against each, or whether the court could divide the costs.

FAILURE TO MAKE FINDINGS—HARMLESS ERROR—WAIVER OF APPEAL BOND.

1. A judgment will not be reversed because of the failure of the trial court to find on issues, the burden of proving which was on appellant, unless he shows by bill of exceptions or by statement that he offered evidence in support thereof, sufficient, in the absence of countervailing evidence, to justify a finding in his favor thereon.

2. Under Code Civil Proc. § 940, requiring an undertaking to be filed or waived within five days after service of notice of appeal, the waiver must be made within the five days, but it need not be filed within that time. Perkins v. Cooper, 25 Pac. Rep. 411, 87 Cal. 241, followed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; W. P. WADE, Judge.

Suit by Mary A. Newman, William Newman, and others against George B. Maldonado, by Mary Hentig, his guardian ad litem, to quiet title to certain lands. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal, and plaintiffs move to dismiss appeal. Motion to dismiss denied, and judgment affirmed.

Geo. M. Holton, Duncan & Haas, and Houghton, Silent & Campbell, for appellants. Thomas J. Carran, for respondents.

HAYNES, C. Suit to quiet title to certain lands in Los Angeles county. The complaint is in the usual form. The defendant George B. Maldonado, a minor, appeared by his guardian ad litem, Mary Hentig, and filed an answer, and also a cross complaint. The answer alleged that William Newman, one of the plaintiffs, was a minor, was not represented by guardian, and had no capacity to sue; denied the ownership of plaintiffs of the lands described in the complaint, or that they were, or ever had been, in possession, except as tenants of one J. H. Book, a special administrator of the estate of Bernard Newman, deceased, and of Mary Hentig, administratrix of said estate, and that as tenants they were holding over without right after the expiration of their term. The answer further admitted that he claimed to be the owner, and denied that his claim was without right, and alleged that defendant Mary Hentig claimed no interest otherwise than as his guardian. For a second and a third separate defense he pleaded that plaintiff's action was barred by sections 318 and 319, respectively, of the Code of Civil Procedure. Defendant's cross complaint alleged his ownership of said lands as heir at law of Bernard Newman, deceased, under a decree of distribution made by the superior court June 30, 1888, in the matter of said estate; that plaintiffs claim as the heirs of John Newman, deceased; that John Newman's title rested upon an instrument purporting to be a conveyance made by said Bernard Newman to John Newman, January 22, 1874, and which was afterwards recorded, but alleging that it was never delivered to John Newman, or to any one for him, and that John Newman died without knowledge of the making or recording of it; that for a long time prior to the date of said conveyance, and up to the time of his death, November 15, 1886, Bernard Newman continued to occupy the premises adversely, and that since the death of Bernard Newman his administrators were in possession, paid the taxes, etc., until the final distribution of said estate, June 30, 1888, when said lands were distributed to defendant, and that he is still the owner, and seised in fee. The cross complaint also repeated the allegations of the answer that plaintiffs entered under leases from Bernard Newman's administrators, and were holding over their term. The prayer of the cross complaint was for a cancellation of the deed above mentioned, and that the title be quieted, etc. The plaintiffs joined in an answer to the cross complaint, putting in issue all its material allegations. The transcript also contains another answer to the cross complaint, which is as follows: "Now comes W. B. Mathews, guardian ad litem, appointed by the court in the above-entitled action, and for answer to the cross complaint herein denies each and every allegation therein severally. W. B. MATHEWS, Guardian ad litem." This answer was not verified. Findings and judgment went in favor of plaintiffs, and defendants appeal from the judgment upon the judgment roll alone.

The findings are sufficient to support the judgment; but appellants contend that no findings were made upon several affirmative issues presented by defendant's answer, viz., the pleas of the statute of limitation; the allegation that plaintiffs entered under a lease and were in possession holding over after the expiration of their term; and that William Newman, one of the plaintiffs, was at the commencement of the action a minor, that he did not appear by guardian, and had not capacity to sue.

As to the first and second of these points it is sufficient to say that the burden of proving these affirmative matters rested upon the defendants, and, in the absence of evidence upon the issues thus presented, findings, if made, must have been against them; and under that supposition the defendants were not prejudiced by the failure of the court to find upon them, and this court will not presume that evidence was introduced in support of such issues, where the record does not disclose that fact. Himmelman v. Henry, 84 Cal. at page 105, 23 Pac. Rep. 1098; Winslow v. Gohransen, 88 Cal. 453, 26 Pac. Rep. 504. In Himmelman v. Henry, supra, the court said, (page 106, 84 Cal., and page 1098, 23 Pac. Rep.:) "This court will not reverse for the want of a finding upon an issue when there is no evidence in relation to that issue,—meaning, of course, an issue upon a point not necessary to sustain the judgment, but only sufficient, if proved, to invalidate the judgment. * * * The findings must be sufficient to support the judgment, and must contain nothing inconsistent with it; but a failure to find upon some issue, a finding upon which would merely have the effect of invalidating a judgment fully supported by the findings made, will not be held ground for reversal unless it is shown by statement or bill of exceptions that evidence was submitted in relation to such issue." Counsel for appellants cite several cases to the point that findings upon all these issues are necessary. In all of these cases except Roeding v. Perasso, 62 Cal. 515, the appeal was from an order granting or refusing a new trial, as well as from the judgment; and it may therefore be inferred that the evidence touching the issues not found was before this court. In the excepted case above mentioned the opinion is per curiam, consisting of but five lines. There the appeal was from the decree rendered in the court below, and from an order refusing to modify it; but whether there was a bill of exceptions, or whether the fact that evidence was or was not given upon the issues in question, is not disclosed by the case as reported, and does not appear. These cases, therefore, cannot be held to conflict with the cases sustaining the proposition that to enable defendant Maldonado to reverse a judgment against him, upon the ground that no findings were made upon material issues raised by the averment of new matter in the answer, he must show by bill of exceptions or statement that he offered evidence in support of his allegation sufficient, in the absence of countervailing evidence, to justify a finding in his favor upon such issue.

Appellants' contention that there was no finding upon the allegation contained in the answer of the incapacity of one of the plaintiffs, William Newman, and that for that reason the judgment should be reversed, would be disposed of by the foregoing but for the insertion in the record of what purports to be an answer of W. B. Mathews, guardian ad litem, but which, among other imperfections, does not disclose for whom he was appointed such guardian, nor for whom he answered. The objection that this plaintiff was a minor, not appearing upon the face of the complaint, was properly taken by answer; but, like all other defenses of new matter, it is deemed denied, and the burden of proof was therefore upon the defendants, and, in the absence of evidence, the finding, if one were made, must have been against them. Counsel for respondents contends that, as the allegation of infancy was made only as to William Newman, the answer referred to must be presumed to have been that of William Newman. If that presumption may be indulged for any purpose, it must be taken as a confession that he was an infant, as alleged by defendant Maldonado, and, if so, a finding that he was an infant might have been made. That, however, would not have aided the appellants so far as the want of a finding upon that point is concerned, since, if it can be considered at all, it must be taken as an admission upon the pleadings, which rendered a finding unnecessary, (Swift v. Muygridge, 8 Cal. 445;) and in that case appellants would have the full benefit of a finding in their favor by such admission. But I do not think this answer, which does not disclose for whom he was appointed such guardian, and which therefore could not give him authority to bind any one, can be considered for any purpose; and a finding upon that issue must therefore be held unnecessary upon the authorities and for the reasons hereinbefore stated in reference to the other issues upon which no findings were made. If we were to regard the answer in question as an answer to the cross complaint, it would not aid appellants, as there was a finding that all the allegations of the cross complaint were untrue.

Whether the judgment in favor of William Newman be or be not conclusive between the parties is neither considered nor decided. It is sufficient to say that the record discloses no ground upon which, under the authorities heretofore cited, a reversal can be properly based.

Respondents' counsel makes the point in his brief that the appeal in this case should be dismissed, upon the ground that the written waiver of an undertaking on appeal was not filed until the sixth day after the notice of appeal was served. Respondents moved this court to dismiss the appeal upon other grounds, before the submission of the cause on the merits. Good practice would have required the ground now urged for a dismissal to have been presented at that time. The notice of appeal was served February 1, 1890, and the waiver of an undertaking on appeal was filed February 7th. The waiver was not dated, nor is it claimed by counsel for respondents that it was not made before the time expired for filing an undertaking on appeal. Section 940 of the Code of Civil Procedure does not require the waiver to be filed within the five days limited for filing an undertaking on appeal, if it is required to be filed at all. The waiver must be made before the time for filing the undertaking expires, (Perkins v. Cooper, 87 Cal. 241, 25 Pac. Rep. 411;) but there is no intimation in that case, or in any other to which counsel has referred, sustaining his proposition that the stipulation must be filed within that time. I find no case in which this question was directly presented or decided, but the intimations and reasoning of the court in several cases would seem to sustain the construction above given. See Buffendeau v. Edmondson, 24 Cal. 95; Moyle v. Landers, 78 Cal. at page 106, 20 Pac. Rep. 241, and Little v. Jacks, 68 Cal. 343, 8 Pac. Rep. 856, 9 Pac. Rep. 264, and 11 Pac. Rep. 128. I think respondents' request to dismiss the appeal must be denied, and that the judgment appealed from should be affirmed, and so advise.

FINCHER v. MALCOLMSON. (No. 14,777.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 25, 1892.)

NEW TRIAL—MISTAKE—FINDINGS.

1. A defendant, whose attorney withdrew his cross complaint and failed to ask for a continuance, or to be present at the trial, after consultation with, and with the consent of, defendant, cannot, by changing his attorney, obtain a new trial on the ground of accident or surprise, where no charge is made that the attorney was incompetent, unfaithful, or negligent.

2. There is no such ground for granting a new trial as mistake or inadvertence, as distinguished from accident or surprise.

3. By failure to attend the trial a party waives findings. It is of no consequence, therefore, that the judgment erroneously refers to findings.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. HARRIS, Judge.

Action by Paulina Fincher against William Laing Malcolmson to quiet plaintiff's title to a tract of land. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order refusing his motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Edward Lynch, for appellant. Church & Cory, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. Defendant appeals from the judgment and order refusing him a new trial. The action is to quiet plaintiff's title to a tract of land. The answer, after certain denials, sets out as a further answer and cross complaint an agreement between the defendant and L. N. Fincher, husband of plaintiff, who, it is averred, owned the land, by which agreement said Fincher, in consideration of one dollar, agrees at any time within six months to sell to defendant, or any one he might name, the whole or any part of a tract of 320 acres of land, which included the tract in controversy. The contract reserved the crop then growing, or required compensation therefor at $2.80 per acre. There was a provision for the extension of the time for performance. It is averred that plaintiff knew all these facts, and that the conveyance to her was made for the purpose of hindering, cheating, and defrauding the defendant; that defendant, within the time, elected to purchase on the terms proposed, and notified Fincher of the fact, and also that he would take the crop growing on the land at the stipulated price; that said Fincher refused to perform his part of the agreement, and is about to harvest the crop, which he avers is worth $4,500; and he asks that said L. N. Fincher be brought in and made a party and required to answer; that he have specific performance of the agreement, and that a receiver be appointed to take possession of the crop. To the answer and cross complaint separate demurrers were interposed by plaintiff. An order was obtained making L. N. Fincher a party, and he was duly served. Before he had appeared herein the case was set down for trial. At the time set the demurrers had not been disposed of, but counsel for both parties were in court. No objection was made on any ground to the trial, but defendant's counsel asked and obtained leave to withdraw his cross complaint, without prejudice to his right to bring an action for damages against L. N. Fincher. Defendant's counsel then left the court room, although fully aware that the trial was about to proceed, having concluded, as he says, that it would be better to make the entire suit against Fincher a suit for damages. The plaintiff obtained a judgment quieting her title against defendant, whereupon, having changed his attorneys, defendant moved for a new trial on the minutes of the court and upon affidavits. The grounds of the motion were: First, accident; second, surprise; third, insufficiency of the evidence; fourth, the decision is against law; fifth, mistake, inadvertence, surprise, and excusable neglect; and, sixth, that the evidence was insufficient to enable the court to find that plaintiff is or was the separate or sole or any owner of the land described in the complaint, or that she had any interest therein.

It is plain that there is nothing in the nature of accident or surprise shown by the affidavits. The trouble seems to be that his attorney withdrew his cross complaint, failed to ask for a continuance, or to be present at the trial. But all this was done deliberately, after consultation, possibly with bad judgment, but certainly there is found here no element of surprise or accident. According to the affidavits of his attorneys, which are corroborated by other affidavits, it was also done after consultation with defendant and with his consent. He denies this, and proceeds now as though his attorneys were the adverse party, and not his representatives. He is bound by the action of his counsel, and cannot avoid responsibility in this way. What they knew he knew; what they did as his attorneys he did. There is no charge that his attorneys were incompetent, unfaithful, or negligent. He seems to have had an outside adviser, whom he trusted more than he did his counsel, and he concluded that their course was not the best, and so attempted to avoid it in this way. The court had ample grounds for believing that what was done was with his concurrence. There is no such ground for granting a new trial as mistake or inadvertence, as distinguished from accident or surprise, already discussed. There was evidence to sustain the conclusion that plaintiff was the owner of the property. It was secondary, that is, was not the best evidence of the fact, but it was not objected to. No exception was taken or reserved. By failing to attend the trial, defendant waived findings. Section 634, Code Civil Proc. This is a statutory waiver. The fact, therefore, that the judgment erroneously refers to findings, when none existed, is of no consequence. The statute requires none under such circumstances. The appellant was not injured by the failure of the court to pass on the plaintiff's demurrer to his answer. McCarthy v. Yale, 39 Cal. 585. Perhaps the fact that it had not been disposed of would have been a fact of some importance, if defendant had objected to a trial at that time. But when plaintiff insisted upon trying the issue of fact, he waived his demurrer. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; BELCHER, C.

GUTZEIL v. PENNIE et al. (No. 15,004.)

CORPORATION—SIGNATURE—FOREIGN SURETY COMPANY—RIGHT TO DO BUSINESS.

1. Where an undertaking on appeal, purporting to be executed by a corporation as surety, is signed by its second vice president and its assistant secretary, and has affixed to it the corporation seal, in the absence of anything to show that such officers were not authorized to sign and deliver the undertaking, it will not be held void, as not properly signed.

2. Code Civil Proc. § 1056, provides, in respect to surety companies, that "the insurance commissioner shall have the same jurisdiction and powers to examine the affairs of such corporations as he has in other cases," and "shall require them to file similar statements, and issue to them a similar certificate." Pol. Code, § 616, provides that the insurance commissioner shall not issue a certificate to a foreign insurance company until it has filed with him "the name of an agent and his place of residence in this state, on whom summons and other process may be served in all actions * * * against such corporation." Held that, under the former statute, the latter applies to a corporation organized to become surety on bonds and undertakings, and, on filing a designation of an agent for the service of process with the insurance commissioner, such a corporation was entitled to transact business, though it had not filed such designation with the secretary of state, as required by St. 1871–72, p. 826, in the case of foreign corporations.

3. A certificate of the insurance commissioner that such a corporation is entitled to do business in the state raises a presumption that the corporation has complied with Pol. Code, § 616, requiring a designation of an agent for the service of process.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; W. G. LORIGAN, Judge.

Action by Henry Gutzeil against James Pennie and others. Motion to dismiss appeal. Denied.

Eugene Deuprey, for appellant. Barker & Leib, W. L. Gill, and J. R. Patton, for respondents.

DE HAVEN, J. The undertaking on appeal herein was executed by the American Surety Company, a foreign corporation, and the respondent moves to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that the undertaking is not properly signed, and upon the further ground that the corporation has not filed with the secretary of state a designation of some person residing in this state, upon whom service of summons may be made, as required by the act relating to foreign corporations, approved April 1, 1872, (St. 1871–72, p. 826.)

1. The undertaking is signed in behalf of the corporation surety by its second vice president and its assistant secretary, and has affixed to it the seal of the corporation. There is nothing before us to show that these officers were not authorized to sign and deliver the undertaking, and we cannot, therefore, hold that the undertaking is void because not properly signed.

2. The corporation has never filed with the secretary of state a paper designating the person upon whom service of process can be made for it in this state, as required by the act of the legislature above referred to; but it appears from the certificate of the insurance commissioner for this state that "the American Surety Company of New York city, N. Y., is duly authorized to transact business in this state, and has been so authorized since December 5, 1884." It is provided by section 1056 of the Code of Civil Procedure that, in respect to corporations organized for the purpose of becoming surety on bonds or undertakings authorized by law, "the insurance commissioner shall have the same jurisdiction and powers to examine the affairs of such corporations as he has in other cases, [and] shall require them to file similar statements and issue to them a similar certificate." The certificate here referred to is one that the corporation is authorized to transact business in this state, and the insurance commissioner is not authorized to issue such a certificate to a foreign insurance company until it has first filed in his office "the name of an agent, and his place of residence in this state, on whom summons and other process may be served in all actions or other legal proceedings against such corporation or company." Pol. Code, § 616. We think that, under section 1056 of the Code of Civil Procedure, this provision of section 616 of the Political Code also applies to corporations like that executing the undertaking on appeal in this case, and that, when such a corporation has filed with the insurance commissioner the designation required by this section of the Political Code, that is all that is required of it in the matter of naming an agent upon whom process in actions against it may be served, to entitle it to transact business in this state, although the failure to file such designation with the secretary of state might deprive it of the benefit of "the statutes of this state limiting the time for the commencement of actions," as provided by the second section of the above-mentioned act of April 1, 1872. The certificate of the insurance commissioner, filed by the appellant herein, while it does not expressly state that the American Surety Company has complied with section 616 of the Political Code, is at least prima facie evidence that it has done so. There is a presumption that the insurance commissioner properly performed his official duty in issuing this certificate, and, in the absence of any evidence showing that this certificate was issued under circumstances not authorized by law, the certificate will be regarded as sufficient proof that it was properly issued, and that, as stated above, the American Surety Company had and has authority to transact business in this state. If, in fact, that corporation has not complied with the section of the Political Code above referred to, the respondent will be permitted to renew his motion, and show that the certificate was improperly issued, but upon the facts now before us the motion to dismiss the appeal must be denied. Motion denied.

PEOPLE v. FAULKE. (No. 20,903.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 25, 1892.)

CRIMINAL LAW—ARGUMENTS OF COUNSEL—NEW TRIAL.

1. In a prosecution for grand larceny, it was not error, during the district attorney's address to the jury, to refuse defendant's request that the stenographer's note of a witness' evidence be read to the jury, on account of an alleged misstatement of it by the district attorney.

2. The court's subsequent offer to the jury, if any of them desired it, to have the notes read after such address, was as advantageous to defendant as he could ask.

3. Specifications of error, on a motion for a new trial, are for the purpose of pointing out the particulars in which errors were committed at the trial, and the matters to which they point must be found in the substantive portion of the bill of exceptions, or they cannot be considered.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Santa Clara county; W. G. LORIGAN, Judge.

Faulke was indicted for grand larceny, and convicted. From a judgment denying his motion for a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

C. W. Clement, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

HARRISON J. The appellant was convicted of grand larceny, and has appealed from the judgment and an order denying him a new trial. In the bill of exceptions there is assigned as error certain remarks claimed to have been made by the district attorney in his closing argument to the jury, outside of the evidence in the case, and prejudicial to the defendant, but, as the bill of exceptions does not show other than by these specifications that the district attorney did in fact make such remarks, we cannot consider the matter. Specifications of error are the act of the attorney, annexed to a bill of exceptions after the trial, and are for the purpose of pointing out the particulars in which errors were committed at the trial. The matters to which such specifications point must be found in the substantive portion of the bill of exceptions; otherwise they cannot be considered. After the testimony had closed, and while the district attorney was making his closing argument to the jury, he made a statement respecting certain evidence, which was disputed by the attorney for the defendant, who thereupon requested the court to direct the stenographer to read the testimony of the witness in that regard. The court denied the request of counsel, stating that the jury had heard the witness, and that it was their province to determine what he testified to, to which ruling and remarks the defendant excepted. After the district attorney had completed his argument, the court said to the jury that they were the exclusive judges of what the witness had testified to, but, if any of them were in doubt as to what any witness testified to, if they desired, he would have the reporter read the testimony. There was no error in this action of the court. It would seriously interfere with the orderly conduct of a trial, if the court were to interrupt counsel in their address to the jury, by causing the evidence upon any controverted point to be read to them from the reporter's notes, whenever the opposing counsel should claim that the evidence was not correctly stated. The jury who heard the testimony must be presumed as able to determine whether it is correctly stated to them by counsel as to weigh the arguments that are based thereon, and, unless some one of that body desires to be assured upon the controverted point, there is no occasion for a repetition of the evidence. If the court is itself of the opinion that the evidence is being misrepresented, it will of its own motion, or upon a suggestion to that effect, cause the proper corrections to be made; but its omission to do so carries with it the presumption that no misrepresentation was made. The subsequent offer of the court to allow the testimony to be read for the purpose of resolving any doubt that there might be with the jury, gave to the defendant every advantage that he could have asked. The instruction given by the court in reference to the manner in which the jury should consider the testimony of the defendant, in view of the fact that he would be seriously affected by their verdict, does not differ appreciably from that on the same subject which was approved by this court in People v. Knapp, 71 Cal. 10, 11 Pac. Rep. 793, and for that reason it cannot be regarded as error. If the question was before us as a new proposition, we should be inclined to hold that it was an instruction upon the weight of evidence, and in violation of the constitutional provision which declares that "judges shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact," and that a court would be justified in refusing to give such an instruction. An instruction of this character was first approved in People v. Cronin, 34 Cal. 191, and, as was said in People v. Murray, 86 Cal. 35, 24 Pac. Rep. 802, has been since approved so many times that it is too late now to question its correctness; but it is an instruction that can rarely be necessary, since, if its matter was not presented to the jury in the argument of the respective counsel, their own power of reasoning would impress them with all that is expressed in its terms. While a district attorney, in the zeal of his official position, may ask for such an instruction under the impression that it will have more weight with the jury if it comes from the court than if merely presented by him in argument, yet the court is not required to lend its aid to such zeal; and, if district attorneys as well as courts would be careful while framing instructions not to tread upon that dangerous border land which lies between matters of fact and matters of law, the result of the trial would rarely be changed, and the occasion for an appeal would be avoided. After a proposition of law involved in an instruction has been often approved upon appeal, the trial court will obviate further appeal thereon if it will limit its instruction upon that proposition to the terms in which it has been approved, rather than attempt a variation upon such terms. Many of the appeals which we are called upon to consider involve only the necessity of determining the effect of such variation, and the reversal of a judgment is often caused by the introduction of some phrase or expression which appears to result, not so much from a purpose to present a different proposition of law, as from a desire to express that proposition in different language. We cannot review the conflicting evidence for the purpose of determining whether the jury came to a correct conclusion thereon, and, as we find no error in the instructions of the court, the judgment and order are affirmed.

BOARD OF EDUCATION OF CITY OF SACRAMENTO v. BOARD OF TRUSTEES OF CITY OF SACRAMENTO. (No. 18,041.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 25, 1892.)

SCHOOL TAXES—POWER TO LEVY—DISCRETION AS TO AMOUNT.

St. 1863, p. 717, §§ 1, 2, incorporating the city of Sacramento, as amended by St. 1870, p 7, provide that the board of education shall annually make and report to the board of trustees a statement in detail of the receipts and expenditures for school purposes in the city during the year then last past, and shall at the same time "make and furnish a detailed statement of the probable amount of money that will be required during the current year, and the purposes for which it is required;" and that on receiving the estimate "the board of trustees shall, at the time of levying other city taxes, levy a direct special school tax, which, after making proper allowance for delinquencies, will produce a sum that will make the amount required by the board of education," provided the levy shall not exceed 35 cents on the $100. Held, that the amount of the levy within the limit was discretionary with the board of trustees, and an action would not lie to compel them to levy the amount reported and required by the board of education.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; A. P. CATLIN, Judge.

Action by the board of education of the city of Sacramento against the board of trustees of the city of Sacramento to compel defendant to make a certain levy of taxes for school purposes. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

W. A. Anderson, for appellant. E. C. Hart and Clinton L. White, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The board of education of the city of Sacramento, on the 1st day of February, 1892, submitted to the board of trustees of that city, in accordance with the act of April 27, 1863, (St. 1863, p. 717,) a statement of the receipts and expenditures made for school purposes during the preceding year, and also a statement that the probable amount of money that would be required during the current year for school purposes, to be raised by taxation upon city property, was $68,700, and also stated that it was necessary that a tax of 35 cents on the $100 be levied in accordance with the law for the support of schools. After receiving the said report and statement, the board of trustees levied a special tax upon the property of the city of 26 cents on the hundred dollars, to meet the expenses of said school purposes. The petitioners herein allege that the taxable property of the city for the current year amounts to $15,300,000, and no more; that said tax of 26 cents is not sufficient to raise the amount so estimated and reported by the board of education; that, in order to raise said amount of money, it would require a tax of 35 cents upon each $100 of taxable property within the city; and that, under the provisions of the several acts of the legislature in reference thereto, it was the duty of the board of trustees to levy a tax of that amount for school purposes.

The act incorporating the city of Sacramento (St. 1863, p. 415) provides that the city shall be governed by a board of trustees, consisting of three members, in whom is vested the executive and legislative powers conferred upon the city, and who are authorized to levy taxes for whatever amount of money is to be collected for municipal purposes. At the same session of the legislature another act was passed (St. 1863, p. 717) in reference to the government of the common schools of the city, containing the following provisions: "Section 1. The board of education shall annually on or before the first day of February make and report to the board of trustees a statement in detail of the receipts and expenditures for school purposes in the city during the year then last past, and shall at the same time make and furnish a detailed statement of the probable amount of money that will be required during the current year, and the purposes for which it is required; and also an estimate of the amount that will be received by the city from the state and county for school purposes. Sec. 2. Upon receiving the estimate of moneys needed, as provided in section 1, the board of trustees shall, at the time of levying other city taxes, levy a direct special school tax, which, after making proper allowance for delinquencies, will produce a sum that will make the amount required by the board of education: provided, however, that in no case shall such special school tax exceed twenty-five cents on the one hundred dollars." This latter section was amended in 1870, (St. 1870, p. 7,) by which the limit was placed at 35 cents instead of 25 cents on the hundred dollars. The appellants contend that under the provisions of these sections the board of trustees has no discretion in the matter of levying a special tax for school purposes, but is required to levy such a tax, not exceeding 35 cents on the hundred dollars, as will raise the amount of money that the board of education shall estimate will be required during the current year. We are of the opinion, however, that it was not intended by this act to take from the board of trustees the power or right of determining the amount of money that should be raised by taxation for school purposes in any one year, but merely to fix a limit upon such power, and to furnish the board, in the exercise thereof, with such information as will enable it to act intelligently, and with a view to the needs of the school department of the city, considered relatively to the other departments. The trustees, having general charge of the welfare of the city, are intrusted with the discretion of determining the amount of money that shall be raised by taxation for the various municipal purposes, and must be deemed to have a better knowledge of the public needs, as well as of the financial condition and prosperity of the inhabitants, than any other department of the city government. As the legislative department of the city government, this board would be deemed to have the exclusive right of determining this question, unless such right has been qualified by the legislature in some express and unequivocal language.

The clause in the second section of the above act providing that upon receiving the statement from the board of education the trustees "shall, at the time of levying other city taxes, levy a special school tax, which will produce the amount required by the board of education," does not, by reason of the words therein used, necessarily imply that the legislature intended that the board of trustees should accept the statement as conclusive of the amount that should be expended for school purposes, and mandatory upon it to levy a tax sufficient to raise that amount. The general rule in the construction of statutes relating to the performance of a public duty which does not affect any private rights or interests, but concerns the public alone, is that the language of the statute, although imperative in terms, must be regarded as directory, rather than mandatory. The intention of the legislature is to be gathered from the manifest purpose of the statute itself, and also from a consideration of all of its provisions. The provision in the first section of the act aforesaid, that the board of education shall furnish to the board of trustees "a detailed statement of the probable amount of money that will be required during the current year, and the purposes for which it will be required," was evidently inserted for the purpose of enabling the board of trustees to intelligently exercise its discretion in determining the amount of tax to be levied, and also to revise the estimate, as well as pass upon the sufficiency of the purposes for which the board of education had reported that the money was needed. If, as is contended by the appellants, the board of trustees has no function in the matter other than to comply with the requirements of the board of education, there would seem to be no reason why the board of education should furnish it with any details of the amount required by it; but, inasmuch as, before the trustees levy the tax, they are to receive information in detail from the board of education, not only of the requirements of that board, but also of the purposes for which the money is to be expended, it must be assumed that the board of trustees is to make some use of this information in the exercise of the discretion conferred upon it in its general authority for levying taxes. This conclusion is strengthened also by considering that the board of education is to furnish only a statement of the "probable" amount of money that will be required, and that in the second section of the act it is referred to as an "estimate." This implies that the amount named in their statement is not a definite sum which the trustees are to raise by taxation, but is rather a recommendation of the amount which, in the opinion of the board of education, should be appropriated for school purposes. The fair and reasonable interpretation to be given to the statute is that the board of education shall give to the board of trustees an estimate in detail of the amount of money which in its judgment will be needed for disbursement in behalf of certain school purposes, and that the board of trustees, upon a consideration thereof, shall exercise its own judgment in determining whether the purposes therein specified are suitable subjects for expenditure, and whether the amount of money named in the statement is correctly estimated, and that thereupon it shall levy such tax as in its judgment, having regard to the interests of the entire municipality, as well as of its several parts, will be proper and just. The judgment is affirmed.

STINCHFIELD v. GILLIS et al. (No. 14,752.)

MINES—INTERSECTING VEINS—ESTOPPEL TO DENY LOCATION.

Defendant conveyed a portion of a mining claim, of which he was in possession and claimed ownership, to plaintiff, and subsequently located the remaining portion of the claim at a date prior to a location by plaintiff of the portion conveyed to him. A vein running from defendant's claim intersected one of plaintiff's veins within his surface boundaries. Held, that plaintiff was entitled to all mineral at the point of intersection, since, as against plaintiff, defendant's claim was not a prior location, within Rev. St. U. S. § 2336, providing that all the mineral in the space of intersection of two veins shall belong to the prior location; defendant being estopped by his deed to deny that his title to the portion conveyed was perfected by a location valid at the time of the conveyance.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tuolumne county; G. W. NICOL, Judge.

Action by A. W. Stinchfield against James W. Gillis and others to recover the value of certain property alleged to have been taken by defendants. From a judgment in favor of defendants, and from an order denying a motion for new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

I. M. Kalloch and F. P. Otis, (Wheaton, Kallock & Kierce, of counsel,) for appellant. F. W. Street, for respondents.

GAROUTTE, J. This action was brought to recover the value of certain gold alleged to have been taken by respondents from the mining claim of appellant. The facts, briefly stated, are as follows: For many years prior to January 17, 1886, respondent Gillis was in the peaceable possession of and claiming to be the owner of a certain mining claim known as the "Carrington Claim." Upon said date he sold and transferred to appellant, by bargain and sale deed, a portion of the Carrington claim, designated as the "Pine Tree Mine." At the date of this transfer the co-respondent Rice was working upon a portion of the Carrington claim not included in the transfer to Stinchfield, known as the "Rice Vein," giving Gillis a certain percentage of all gold taken out for the use of the mine. The apices of a vein called the "West Vein" and of the Pine Tree vein were within the surface limit of the Pine Tree mine, and the apex of the Rice vein was in that portion of the mine not transferred to Stinchfield by Gillis. Immediately after the transfer to Stinchfield, Gillis located or relocated that portion of the mine not transferred, and within a few days thereafter Stinchfield located that portion of the mine transferred to him. The Rice vein and the West vein in their descent into the earth intersect within the surface ground purchased by Stinchfield, and at the point of intersection of these veins valuable deposits of gold were found. Rice, in following his vein into the earth, came to the point of intersection, and thereupon found the deposits of gold, which he removed as his property. A few days subsequent, Stinchfield, following the West vein into the earth, arrived at the same spot, but too late. Indications pointed unmistakably to what had been, but the gold was gone. Appellant claimed the gold to be his property, and brought this action to recover $10,000, the same being the value thereof. Judgment went against him, and this appeal is before us attacking the judgment and the order denying the motion for a new trial.

As between the owners of separate and intersecting veins, the ownership of the mineral contained within the space of intersection is determined according to the provisions of section 2336 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, which reads as follows: "Where two or more veins intersect or cross each other priority of title shall govern, and such prior location shall be entitled to all ore or mineral contained within the space of intersection, but the subsequent location shall have the right of way through the space of intersection for the purpose of the convenient working of the mine; and, where two or more veins unite, the oldest or prior location shall take the vein below the point of union, including all the space of intersection." From an examination of the record it is apparent that the judgment for respondents was based upon the law quoted, taken in conection with the finding that neither Gillis nor his grantor, Carrington, ever located the Carrington claim; and the further fact that the location of Gillis, made after his deed to Stinchfield, was prior in point of time, as compared to the location of Stinchfield. This is necessarily the fact, for the court finds in express terms that the gold was taken from the point of intersection of the veins to which reference has already been made, and that such point of intersection was upon the Pine Tree mine. Under such conditions, the title to the gold would be determined by priority of title to the respective mine, and it is from this standpoint that the court decided the case. As between the plaintiff and Gillis, the locations of their respective mines, made subsequent to the deed of Gillis, are not material to any matter involved in this litigation. By bargain and sale deed Gillis conveyed the Pine Tree mine to plaintiff, particularly designating its surface boundaries. These parties occupied the relative positions of grantor and grantee, under a bargain and sale deed, with all the rights and obligations peculiar to that relation; and it is elementary that Gillis, by a subsequent location or otherwise, could not obtain any title which he could assert against his grantee, and thereby defeat or limit his grantee's estate, or destroy or limit any easement or right appurtenant thereto, and necessary to the enjoyment of a perfect title. By his deed respondent Gillis was estopped from denying his own title in fee at the date of that conveyance, and therefore necessarily estopped from denying a valid location by himself or his grantor as the basis of such title. If he had title to the mining claim at the date of the deed, he could only have had such title by virtue of a prior location, for title in fee necessarily implies a prior valid location. It was said in Belcher Con. Gold Min. Co. v. Deferrari, 62 Cal. 163: "As we take notice of the character of the property and its original ownership in the United States, the defendants were estopped from denying that they and their cograntors (or those from whom they derived) had located the mines in accordance with the laws of the United States,—the only way in which the title could be acquired." It follows that no right whatever accrued to the grantor Gillis as against his grantee, the plaintiff, by virtue of his subsequent location, and that the location of the Pine Tree mine as against the grantor Gillis, must have occurred at some time prior to his deed to Stinchfield. In Champion Min. Co. v. Consolidated W. Gold Min. Co., 75 Cal. 78, 16 Pac. Rep. 513, it was held that defendant's location must be considered as having been made at least from the date of its patent, and here it must be considered that the location of plaintiff's mine must have been made at least as early as the date of his deed. The deed of Gillis passed to the plaintiff the Pine Tree mine to the same extent and to the same effect that a patent from the United States would have passed it; that is, as against the grantor, he was vested with the title to this mining claim, including every vein, and every part of every vein, throughout its depth, which had its apex within the surface boundaries of the claim, subject to the provisions of the Revised Statutes of the United States, heretofore quoted.

It is insisted that the West vein is not a vein, but a crossing. The court finds this "crossing" to be a "single small vein, dipping to the west, and having its apex in the Pine Tree mine." If this crossing, as it is termed, is a vein, (and the court has so found it to be,) its size is immaterial when considered with reference to the legal rights attached to the ownership. A "single small vein" is weighed and measured by the same law and entitled to the same consideration before the court as the mother lode, and very often is far more valuable in the eyes of its owner. In the case of Jupiter Min. Co. v. Bodie Con. Min. Co., 11 Fed. Rep. 675, Circuit Judge SAWYER said: "A vein or lode authorized to be located is a seam or fissure in the earth's crust, filled with quartz, or with some other kind of rock in place, carrying gold, silver, or other valuable mineral deposits named in the statute. It is not enough to discover detached pieces of quartz, or mere bunches of quartz not in place. The vein, however, may be thin, and it may be many feet thick or thin in places,—almost or quite 'pinched out,' in miner's phrase,—and in other places widening out into extensive bodies of ore. So, also, in places it may be quite or nearly barren, and at other places immensely rich. It is only necessary to discover a genuine mineral vein or lode, whether small or large, rich or poor, at the point of discovery within the lines of the claim located, to entitle the miner to make a valid location, including the vein or lode." By reason of the views of the court hereinbefore expressed, the finding that neither Gillis nor his grantor made a location of the Carrington claim prior to the deed to Stinchfield is immaterial, and, if material, the evidence disclosed by the record is too weak to support it. The facts as to the erection of a barricade or bulkhead by the parties between the works of the respective mines are immaterial to the questions here involved, conceding them to be as claimed by the respondents. Stockton v. Garfrias, 12 Cal. 315. Let the judgment and order be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

VENDOR AND PURCHASER—DEED SUBJECT TO LEASE.

Where the owner of a farm leased it to his son at a yearly rent, payable in cash, and the son leased it to B. for a share of the crops, a purchaser of the farm from the owner, "and the rents, issues, and profits thereof," subject to B.'s lease, is not entitled to such share of the crops reserved in the lease to B.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Yuba county; JOHN C. GRAY, Judge.

Action by Samuel Garber against Vincenzo Gianella, in the nature of trover for certain wheat. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

W. G. Murphy and Barney & Donohue, for appellant. M. E. Sanborn, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. In October, 1884, Lorenzo Gianella, then residing in Sonoma county, and being the owner of a tract of land in the county of Yuba, containing about 500 acres, leased it to the defendant—his son—for the term of five years, commencing November 1, 1884, at a yearly rent, payable in cash. On April 6, 1886, the defendant entered into a written agreement with Daniel Boulware, which they called a "sublease" of said land to Boulware, for a term of three years, commencing November 1, 1886, and extending to the termination of defendant's lease from his father. By the terms of this sublease, Boulware was to pay defendant a "yearly rent or sum of one third of the crops in the sack at the machine; the party of the first part (defendant) to furnish the sacks for the same; the party of the second part to keep the buildings and fences in repair during said term; the party of the first part to furnish the material for said repairs. The party of the second part agrees to plow and sow to wheat one half of said described land this coming winter, and summer fallow the other half the coming spring; all to be done in a good workmanlike manner, and to continue said work in its season during the term of this lease. * * * The proceeds of the pasture shall be equally divided among the parties to this lease. The party of the second part to cut and use all wood necessary for domestic purposes on the said premises. And the lessor may at any time enter to view and make improvements on said premises, and to expel the lessee if he shall fail to pay the said crop rent as aforesaid, or make or suffer any strip or waste on said described premises. * * *" This instrument was duly acknowledged September 7, 1886, and recorded April 3, 1888. On April 12, 1888, Lorenzo Gianella, by a grant, bargain, and sale deed, conveyed to plaintiff a certain field of said tract, (113 acres,) together with the appurtenances, "and the rents, issues, and profits thereof." The deed contains an express covenant of warranty against all persons lawfully claiming or to claim the land, "subject, however, to a lease to Daniel Boulware, which said lease expires November 1, 1889." By virtue of this deed plaintiff claims one third of the wheat grown on the field conveyed to him; and whether he is entitled to it, as against the defendant, is the principal question presented by this appeal.

During the wheat harvest in July, 1889, the plaintiff and defendant, adversely to each other, demanded of Boulware one third of the wheat; and, defendant having furnished the sacks according to the terms of the sublease, Boulware delivered the wheat to him. Thereupon plaintiff brought this action, in the nature of trover, alleging that he "was the owner and in possession of the wheat, (400 sacks,) of the value of $715, and that defendant wrongfully took the same and converted it to his own use, to the damage of plaintiff," etc. The answer of defendant is a denial of all material allegations of the complaint. The court found, generally, the facts as alleged in the complaint, and rendered judgment in plaintiff's favor for the value of the wheat and interest from the date of the alleged conversion. From this judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, the defendant has appealed, and contends here that the evidence is insufficient to justify the finding that plaintiff was the owner or in possession of the wheat at the time defendant took it.

Upon the facts proved, it may be questioned whether the agreement between defendant and Boulware is a sublease, reserving rent payable in a specified portion of the crop, or a mere cropping contract, by which defendant became a tenant in common with Boulware in the crop. See Schell v. Simon, 66 Cal. 264, 5 Pac. Rep. 238; Bernal v. Hovious, 17 Cal. 542; Henderson v. Allen, 23 Cal. 519; Wentworth v. Miller, 53 Cal. 9; Gear, Landl. & Ten. §§ 42, 43, and cases there cited. But I think it unnecessary to decide this question, since, by the terms of the deed from Lorenzo Gianella to plaintiff, the latter acquired only the rights of the former in and to "the rents, issues, and profits, * * * subject, however, to the lease to Daniel Boulware." Lorenzo Gianella had no interest in the rents, issues, or profits to be derived from the agreement between defendant and Boulware, whether that agreement was a lease, or a mere cropping contract. His interest in rents, issues, and profits was limited to such as he was entitled to by his lease to the defendant; and defendant was entitled to one third of the crop under his sublease to or agreement with Boulware, whatever may have been the value of the crop. It is claimed for respondent, however, that the lease of Lorenzo Gianella to defendant was not in writing, and therefore was void, except for the first year of the five-years term. But the testimony of the defendant, on examination by plaintiff's counsel, was that that lease was in writing, though not acknowledged nor recorded, and there was no other evidence touching that question.

It is also claimed that defendant is estopped from claiming the wheat in controversy. But no estoppel was pleaded or found; and the evidence did not tend to prove any representations of the defendant, by words or acts, which could have effected such estoppel, even though the plaintiff had necessarily confided in and acted upon them. If the plaintiff understood, as he claims he did, that the lease to Boulware mentioned in the deed was a lease from Lorenzo Gianella, such understanding was not induced by any representations of the defendant or any other person connected with the sale of the land, nor does he so pretend. That lease was of record, and his attention was called to it by the clause in the deed excepting it from the warranty, so that his misunderstanding of its contents must be attributed entirely to his own negligence. The only facts or circumstances proved, which should have been considered for the purpose of construing or interpreting the deed, are hereinabove stated. The evidence as to plaintiff's construction and understanding of it, in the absence of fraudulent misrepresentations, was erroneously admitted, having been objected to by counsel for defendant. Civil Code, § 1625; Code Civil Proc. § 1856. My conclusion is that the finding that plaintiff was the owner, in the possession, or entitled to the possession, of the wheat at the time it was taken by defendant, is not justified by the evidence; and for this reason that the judgment and order should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; HAYNES, C.

LIMITATIONS—ACTION BETWEEN JOINT INDORSERS—EQUITABLE REMEDY.

1. F. and R., payees of a note, indorsed it jointly to F. Bros. The note not having been paid at maturity, F. paid it, and it was transferred to him by F. Bros. F. afterwards transferred the note to plaintiff, in the name of F. Bros., might himself, or through the agency of another, maintain against R. in equity, if not at law; and was not governed by the statute of limitations relating to contribution.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Kern county.

Vincent Neale and Henry E. Highton, for appellant. Lewis Shearer, for respondents.

THORNTON, J. This is an action brought by plaintiff on the 22d of March, 1881, in the superior court of the county of Kern, to foreclose a mortgage against E. J. Weston, Stephen Boushey, L. L. Robinson, Alexander Forbes, William Temple, Julius Boushey, Richard Roe, and John Doe. The mortgage was executed to L. L. Robinson and Alexander Forbes by Weston and Boushey, to secure a promissory note for $5,000, executed by the latter to the former. The note and mortgage bear date March 23, 1876, and the former matured one year after date, and bore interest at the rate of 2 per cent. per month compounding. The payees of the note indorsed and transferred the note and mortgage to Forbes Bros., a copartnership consisting of the above-named Alexander Forbes and Charles Forbes, who paid $5,000 to Robinson and Alexander Forbes, and this money was paid over by the last-named persons to the makers of the note. At the time of indorsing this note the payees waived demand, protest, and notice of the same. It appears that during the time of the existence of the firm of Forbes Bros. Alexander Forbes was the managing partner of the firm. This firm continued in existence until the 1st day of January, 1877. The above facts were found by the court, and the court further found: "That after the maturity of said promissory note, to wit, about the 27th of October, 1880, the said Alexander Forbes instituted an action in this court against E. J. Weston, Stephen Boushey, Julius Boushey, William Temple, L. L. Robinson, John Doe, and Richard Roe, (defendants also in this action,) upon the said note and mortgage, for a decree for the foreclosure and sale of said mortgaged premises. That the complaint in said action was verified by said Alexander Forbes, and therein it was claimed that there was due to him, the said Alexander Forbes, from the defendant L. L. Robinson, as joint indorser with him of said note, the sum of $2,500 for principal, and $3,697.65 for interest, on said promissory note. That said Alexander Forbes, in said complaint verified by him, averred that, at the maturity of said promissory note, to wit, March 23, 1877, he was compelled to pay and did pay the same, and that he was, at the time of the verification of said complaint, to wit, the 16th day of October, A. D. 1880, the lawful owner of said promissory note and mortgage; and in that action said Alexander Forbes sought to recover from the said L. L. Robinson the moiety of the amount said Forbes had paid upon said note, as joint indorser thereof with said Robinson, together with interest thereupon. That to the complaint in the action the defendant L. L. Robinson demurred, upon the ground that the same did not state a cause of action against him, and that the cause of action for a contribution therein claimed was barred by limitation. That upon the hearing of counsel thereupon said demurrer was sustained. That thereafter, on March 15, 1881, the said Alexander Forbes wrote to the said L. L. Robinson, informing him that said demurrer had been sustained, and threatening to dispose of and transfer the note and mortgage, and have a new suit brought by the transferee, unless the said Robinson should pay to said Alexander Forbes one half of the principal of said promissory note, with interest thereon at 1 per cent. per month. That said Alexander Forbes afterwards, on or about the ——— day of March, 1881, caused said action, Forbes v. Weston et al., to be dismissed, and on the 19th day of March, 1881, indorsed the said promissory note in the name of said Forbes Bros., and delivered the same to William McPherson, the plaintiff in the action. That Vincent Neale, Esq., the attorney of the plaintiff in this action, was also attorney for the said Alexander Forbes in said former suit of Forbes v. Weston et al., and said Neale counseled and brought about the transfer of said note and mortgage by said Forbes to said McPherson That upon the indorsement and delivery of said promissory note to him, the said McPherson delivered his promissory note of $14,000, payable to Forbes Bros. That there was no money or other consideration given therefor. That it was understood that said note of $14,000 was not to be paid, and the matter was regarded as an exchange of checks between Forbes and McPherson. That said $14,000 note has not been paid." The court found, inter alia, the following conclusions of law: "That on the 1st day of January, 1877, by the dissolution of copartnership between Charles Forbes and Alexander Forbes, the said note and mortgage became the individual property of Alexander Forbes, and on the 23d day of March, 1877, the said Alexander Forbes was the owner and holder thereof. That from Alexander Forbes individually holding the note after the dissolution of said firm of Forbes Bros., it must be presumed that he paid the note at the time of the dissolution." Judgment was entered against the makers of the note, and in favor of Robinson. The plaintiff appealed.

That the plaintiff had a cause of action on this note, and was entitled to maintain it against the makers and indorsers of the note, there can be no doubt. The action by plaintiff was brought on the note, and not on any implied contract arising from a loan of money to Robinson by Forbes. The cause of action was not barred until the lapse of four years from maturity. The note matured on the 23d of March, 1877, and the action was brought on the 22d of March, 1881. The action was not then barred as to Robinson, on which ground the court below rested its judgment in favor of Robinson. It is argued that Chipman v. Morrill, 20 Cal. 130, sustains the view that the action is barred. We see no reason for any such conclusion. The case was this: Chipman, Morrill, and Webster purchased a piece of property together, Chipman taking an undivided one half, and Morrill and Webster each one undivided fourth, and for the purchase money executed their joint note. The note was not paid. Action was brought against the makers above named, and judgment recovered. Execution issued on this judgment was levied on Chipman's property, the property sold, and the proceeds applied to the payment of the judgment. Chipman brought a joint action against Morrill and Webster to recover their proportion of the debt which had been paid by a sale of his property. The court held—First, that a joint action could not be maintained; and, second, that, the judgment on the note having been paid by the plaintiff, the action was not on the written instrument, but on the implied assumpsit of each defendant to reimburse what had been paid for each by the plaintiff. As to the first part the court said: "But the case is not one for contribution between parties who have sustained a common loss upon a common liability. The note of the plaintiff and defendants, upon which the judgment was rendered, was given upon the purchase of real estate in which the parties took separate and distinct interests,—the plaintiff one undivided half, and each of the defendants one undivided fourth,—and between themselves the obligation of each was to pay for his respective interest. In giving their joint note for the whole amount of the purchase money each party was principal for the amount of his own interest, and cosurety for the remaining interests. Thus the plaintiff was principal for one half of the purchase money, and cosurety with Webster for one fourth of the same for Morrill, and cosurety with Morrill for one fourth for Webster. Goodall v. Wentworth, 20 Me. 322. When, therefore, the plaintiff paid the entire amount of the judgment recovered upon the note,—or, what is the same thing, when the proceeds of the property of the plaintiff sold under execution were applied to such payment,—he became entitled to maintain an action against the defendant for moneys paid on their account. The demands which he could then assert were several in their character. They were demands, not for contribution, but for reimbursement of moneys paid. The action should, therefore, have been against the defendants separately, upon the assumpsit which the law implies where a surety is compelled to advance money for his principal." 20 Cal. 136.

Here Alexander Forbes and Robinson were not makers of a note, but payees of one. They were joint indorsers, but there had been no payment of the note, as will more clearly appear hereafter. Their relations continued the same as to all the parties who succeeded to the ownership of the note through their indorsement. If Forbes (when this name, simply, is used herein, reference is always made to the defendant) should become the owner of the note by indorsement from Forbes Bros., we do not see why Robinson would not be liable to him on the written instrument. Forbes might have maintained an action in some way, either at law or in equity, by himself or through the agency of another, on the note against Robinson, and we do not see why the action would have been barred in less than four years. It would still have been an action on a written instrument, not barred in less time than the period above stated. It makes no difference that Forbes could not have maintained an action at law against Robinson and himself on the note (and they must have been parties to the action, as they were joint indorsers) by reason of the fact that Forbes could not sue himself. Under what is tyled the common-law system of procedure he (Forbes) could not have maintained an action at law, but he could have maintained his suit in chancery. He could have set forth the facts in a complaint, and if he was on such facts entitled to a judgment the court would be bound to grant it to him. White v. Lyons, 42 Cal. 282. In the case just cited the rule is thus stated: "Under the Code there is but one form of action in this state, and if the complaint states facts which entitle the plaintiff to relief, either legal or equitable, it is not demurrable on the ground that it does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. If the facts stated are such as address themselves to the equity side of the court, the appropriate relief will be granted by the court, sitting as a court of equity. On the other hand, if the facts alleged are purely cognizable in a court of law, the proper relief will be administered in that form of proceeding. But a complaint which states a sufficient cause of action, either at law or in equity, is not demurrable as not stating facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action." See Wiggins v. McDonald, 18 Cal. 126, and Carpentier v. Brenham, 50 Cal. 551, 552. The language just quoted we understand to lay down the correct rule on the subject, and is in accordance with the rulings of the courts of New York, under the system of procedure long ago adopted in that state, by which, like the system in this state, one form of action is established. See Pom. Rem. pp. 81–83, et seq., and notes, where the cases are cited and commented on. See, also, Story, Eq. Pl. §§ 679, 680, 681.

Forbes Bros. could transfer the title to this note to the plaintiff, unless there appears in the case an inhibition raised by law. It will be observed that the court determined, as conclusions of law, that the joint payees of the note, Forbes and Robinson, indorsed and delivered it to Forbes Bros.; that on the 1st day of January, 1877, by the dissolution of the copartnership of Forbes Bros., the note and mortgage became the individual property of Alexander Forbes, and on the 23d of March, 1877, Forbes was the owner and holder of the note; that from Alexander Forbes individually holding the note after the dissolution of the firm of Forbes Bros. it must be presumed that he paid the note at the time of dissolution. Certainly the first proposition stated as a conclusion of law, that the joint payees of the note indorsed and delivered it to Forbes Bros., is not a conclusion of law, but a fact, and had already been found as a fact. The other propositions stated as conclusions of law are not of any law which will stand the test of investigation. How, merely by a dissolution of copartnership, a note belonging to the firm becomes by law the property of one member of it, we cannot perceive or understand. The same is true of the last proposition, that, because Alexander Forbes individually held the note, there is a presumption that he had paid it. If the propositions above stated are matters of fact, we do not find the two latter sustained by the evidence. There is no evidence that the title to the note ever vested in Forbes, and we know of no presumption authorized either by law or fact that Forbes has paid the note, because he at any time held it individually. We cannot perceive that when it is said that Forbes held the note individually anything more is meant than that he had it in his individual possession, and this is as compatible with ownership in the firm of Forbes Bros. as with ownership by himself. In fact, it is more in accordance with the other facts found that Forbes Bros. owned the note, because it nowhere appears that they ever indorsed or delivered it to any one, or that title ever passed out of them in any way, until indorsed to the plaintiff. Further, any interference or presumption of ownership by A. Forbes is entirely rebutted by the other facts found, viz., that the note was indorsed to and became the property of Forbes Bros., and there is no evidence that the ownership ever passed out of them but by the indorsement to the plaintiff. Forbes had the right, as partner, to indorse it in the name of Forbes Bros. to the plaintiff for the purpose of collection, to enable the plaintiff to bring an action on the note. If the note had been his individual property by assignment from Forbes Bros. he had a right to indorse it to the plaintiff. Admitting that Forbes had acquired the possession of the note by a payment of the amount due on it to the indorsees, Forbes Bros., we see no legal impediment to his indorsing it, either in his own name or in the name of Forbes Bros., to the plaintiff, especially as it appears that A. Forbes, after the dissolution of the partnership, carried on business in the name of Forbes Bros. It makes no difference that the plaintiff paid nothing for the note. Forbes had the right to indorse it to him whenever the note became his property. He held it with the same right as any other owner had. When he acquired it from Forbes Bros. he had the right to have it indorsed by that firm in their firm name, and to write over their names an indorsement to himself or any other person. We cannot understand that there is anything in the relation Forbes bore to Robinson, as a joint payee, that would take away this right from him. By paying Forbes Bros. the amount due thereon on the note he became its owner, with all the rights of ownership, and could transfer that ownership as any other owner. If he paid the money to Forbes Bros., it does not appear that he used any money of Robinson's to pay it with, and there is no evidence tending to prove, nor is there any principle of law making Forbes Robinson's agent, in paying the amount due on the note to the indorsee, with his own funds, by which such payment inured to the benefit of Robinson, and make Robinson his debtor on an implied assumpsit for money lent. What is meant by Forbes paying the note at the time of dissolution? The note had not matured at that time, and did not mature for months after that event. The dissolution was on the 1st of January, 1877, and the note matured on the 23d of March following. What is meant by his paying the note at any time? Certainly, not that he paid it for the makers, Weston and Boushey. If this was done, the note would have ceased to exist, and no action could have been maintained on it against Weston and Boushey. The court did not mean any such thing, for it rendered judgment on it against Weston, Boushey, and Forbes. It could only mean, then, that Forbes paid the amount due on it to his indorsees, Forbes Bros., took it up, and became the owner of it. If this was the case, we have stated what would be the legal result of such conduct. There is no evidence, in our judgment, that Forbes ever paid the amount due on the note to Forbes Bros. The facts show that he is using a lawful means to collect the amount due on the note for Forbes Bros. We think that the plaintiff is entitled to maintain the action brought on the note against Robinson, and to judgment against Robinson, as well as Forbes, for the amount due on the note. Should Robinson be compelled to pay more than his proportion of this indebtedness, he has recourse to Forbes for what he has been compelled to pay, and we see nothing which will prevent his recovery being effectual. It is not averred that Forbes is insolvent, nor is there any evidence that such is the fact. There is nothing in the cause which would justify us in holding that Forbes should lose his recourse against Robinson for this money, and that the burden of paying the whole of it should be cast on Forbes.

The admission of the record of the suit, Forbes v. Weston et al., and the letter of Forbes to Robinson, was of matters which did not affect injuriously the plaintiff in this case. They show nothing adverse to plaintiff's right to maintain this action. The court erred in holding that the action was barred as to Robinson. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial, in accordance with the views above expressed.

EXEMPTIONS—FINDING OF FACTS.

A finding that certain property is not exempt from levy and sale, instead of a finding of the facts on which such conclusion of law was founded, is insufficient. Paulson v. Nunan, 54 Cal. 123, followed.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by L. L. Paulson against Mathew Nunan to recover two horses, claimed by plaintiff as exempt from levy under Code Civil Proc. § 690, subd. 6, which exempts, among other things, two horses by the use of which a huckster, peddler, etc., habitually earns his living. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

B. S. Brooks and Wm. Leviston, for appellant. Citus Barbour, for respondent.

ROSS, J. The complaint is in the usual form, for the recovery of two horses. The answer justifies the taking by the defendant as sheriff under certain stated writs. Plaintiff claimed the property as exempt under the sixth subdivision of section 690 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and introduced evidence tending to show that he was a peddler, and habitually earned his living by the use of the horses. When the case was last here (54 Cal. 123) it was held that the question as to whether the plaintiff was or was not a peddler, habitually earning his living by the use of the horses, was a material issue in the case, upon which there was then no finding, and there is none now. For the same reason that the case was then reversed and sent back for a new trial, it must be reversed and sent back now. The finding that is now relied on as determining that question was then regarded as but a conclusion of law, and it must be so regarded now. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

MECHANICS' LIENS—MATERIAL MAN—AMOUNT DUE CONTRACTOR.

Under laws of California, a person furnishing materials to a subcontractor beyond the amount due from the owner to the original contractor is not entitled to a mechanic's lien. Latson v. Nelson, 11 Pac. Coast Law J. 589, followed.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county.

Action by W. F. Whittier and another against H. F. Hollister. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Charles J. Swift, for appellant. H. A. Leake, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an action to enforce a lien for materials furnished to a subcontractor, which were used in the construction of a building on the premises of the defendant, Hollister. The building was erected in pursuance of a contract. There is no allegation in the complaint that any money was due or to become due from the owner to the contractor. The defendant, Hollister, demurred to the complaint. The question involved in this appeal was disposed of in Latson v. Nelson, 11 Pac. Coast Law J. 589. The judgment, so far as it relates to the defendant, Hollister, and so far as it concerns the real estate mentioned therein, and directs a sale thereof, and the order denying her motion for a new trial, are reversed, and the cause is remanded with instructions to sustain the demurrer of the defendant, Hollister. Ex parte BENNINGER.[2]

(Supreme Court of California. Nov. 5, 1883.)

COUNTY BOARD MEETINGS — VALIDITY OF ORDINANCE — INTOXICATING LIQUORS — VALIDITY OF LICENSE TAX.

1. A session of the board of supervisors of a county was commenced May 7th, under Pol. Code, § 4032, and continued from day to day until May 16th. Held, that the session of the board was not terminated by an act which went into effect May 14th, requiring the board to provide for regular meetings thereof at the county seat, and that an ordinance adopted by it on May 16th was valid.

2. An ordinance imposing a license tax of $25 per month on sellers of spirituous liquors, and malt or fermented liquors, and wines in quantities less than one quart, is not in restraint of trade, unreasonable, or oppressive, and is valid.

In bank.

Application by John Benninger for a writ of habeas corpus. The ordinance referred to in the opinion imposed a license tax of $25 per month on sellers of spirituous liquors, malt or fermented liquors, and wines, in quantities less than one quart. Writ dismissed.

Henry M. Willis and Byron Waters, for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. The petitioner is in custody under a warrant of arrest duly issued upon a complaint charging him with a violation of a certain ordinance adopted by the board of supervisors of San Bernardino county, which he claims to be void. The ordinance is said to be void for two reasons: First, because adopted at a time when the board was not legally in session; and, secondly, for the reason that it is unreasonable, oppressive, and in restraint of trade. It was adopted pursuant to the act of the legislature approved and which went into effect March 13, 1883. St. 1883, p. 297. At that time section 4032 of the Political Code read: "The regular meetings of the boards of supervisors must be held at their respective county seats on the first Mondays in May, August, November, and February of each year, and must continue from time to time, until all the business before them is disposed of. * * *" Pursuant to this authority of law, the board of supervisors of San Bernardino county met in regular session on the 7th day of May, 1883. Not concluding its labors on that day it adjourned until the next, and so on to and including the 16th day of May, on which day the ordinance in question was adopted. We do not understand counsel to deny that the board was legally in session on the 16th of May, unless it be that it was deprived of the power to act by reason of section 22 of the act commonly called the "County Government Act," which it is said went into effect on the 14th of May. That section reads: "The board of supervisors must by ordinance provide for the holding of regular meetings of the board at their respective county seats." We do not think this section put an end to the May session of the board, which was legally commenced and continued under section 4032 of the Political Code. It is not so inconsistent with the last-mentioned section as to annul a meeting legally existing at the time it went into effect. Nor do we think the provisions of the ordinance come within the rule that would justify us in declaring it void because unreasonable, oppressive, or in restraint of trade. Writ dismissed, and prisoner remanded.

HOMICIDE—DECLARATIONS OF CO-CONSPIRATOR—PROCEEDS OF ROBBERY—IDENTIFICATION.

1. On a trial for murder committed in a highway robbery perpetrated in pursuance of a conspiracy, the declarations of one of the conspirators, who procured the gun with which the murder was committed by defendant, made before the robbery, and showing the objects of the conspiracy, namely, the business of robbing stages, are admissible.

2. On a trial for murder committed in a highway robbery it appeared that defendant took from the murdered man two bars of gold bullion, of the value of about $4,000 each. Defendant at the time of the murder had just been released from prison, and was without money. Held, that evidence that defendant, shortly after the murder, disposed of two gold bars of the same value as those taken from the murdered man was properly received as a circumstance tending to show defendant's guilt, though the bars taken and those sold were not shown to be the same.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Nevada county.

Indictment against John C. P. Collins for murder. Defendant was convicted, and appeals. Affirmed.

J. M. Walling and A. D. Mason, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Marshall, Thos. S. Ford, E. H. Gaylord, Miles Searls, and A. C. Niles, for the People.

ROSS, J. About midday of the 1st of September, 1879, the Eureka stage, en route from Eureka via North Bloomfield to Nevada City, in Nevada county, of this state, was stopped when within three and one half miles of its destination by two masked highwaymen, who forced the driver and passengers to alight, and thereupon proceeded to rob them. Among the passengers was William F. Cummings, who had with him a valise containing two bars of gold bullion, each about 4 inches long, 2 to 3 inches wide, and from 1½ to 2 inches in thickness, and each of the value of from $3,500 to $4,000. When the robbers took hold of the valise, Cummings said it contained all his worldly possessions, and that he would defend it; and thereupon a scuffle ensued between him and them, during which one of the robbers fired upon him with a shot gun, killing him almost instantly. They then fled with the bullion of the murdered man. For that murder Collins, whose alias is Patterson, and one Thorne, alias Dorsey, were jointly indicted on the 26th of October, 1882. They were separately tried. Collins was convicted of murder in the first degree, and sentenced to be hung. From the judgment of death and an order refusing him a new trial he prosecutes the present appeal, relying upon certain alleged errors in the ruling of the court below.

It appears that, nearly two years after the commission of the murder, Collins and one Roger O'Meara met in the jail at St. Louis, in the state of Missouri. Each was incarcerated for a crime alleged to have been committed by him in that state. They had known each other in California, and had been inmates together of the state prison at San Quentin, and, subsequently, had been confederates in the commission of other crimes within the state of California. When O'Meara met Collins in the St. Louis jail the conversation between them, according to O'Meara's testimony in the case at bar, turned upon the robbery and murder of the 1st of September, 1879; and in that conversation Collins confessed to him his own participation in them, detailing with great minuteness all the circumstances in relation to them, from the inception of the unlawful and wicked enterprise, in the pursuit of which the robbery and murder were committed, to and including the disposal of the bullion of the victim at New Orleans, La., and Louisville, Ky. According to the confession, as testified to by O'Meara, Collins, Thorne, and one Crumm met by appointment, in the spring of 1879, at Stockton, and there arranged for a series of robberies, commencing their operations in Tuolumne county, and continuing them in Sacramento and Yuba counties. About August, 1879, they met at the house of one Frazee, near Marysville, in Yuba county, where Thorne obtained the gun with which the murder was committed. About that time Crumm withdrew from the agreement and Collins and Thorne went into Nevada county for the further prosecution of their enterprise, camped in the vicinity of Nevada City, and committed the robbery and murder in question on the 1st day of September. Crumm was put upon the stand by the prosecution, and testified to the meeting of Collins, Thorne, and himself at Stockton, and to the agreement to rob; the subsequent meeting at Frazee's about August, 1879; his withdrawal from the arrangement; and to declarations by Collins and Thorne that they would go into Nevada county, and continue the business of robbing stages, mines, and whatever else they could.

The first point made for the defendant is that this testimony of Crumm was inadmissible. We do not think so. It not only went to corroborate the confession, but it was good as independent testimony of the conspiracy to perpetrate robberies formed by Collins, Thorne, and Crumm in the first place, and its subsequent continuation by Collins and Thorne. The conspiracy, according to the testimony, contemplated the robbing of stages and their passengers whenever and wherever opportunity offered. The law holds each party to it responsible for the acts of each co-conspirator done in pursuance and furtherance of the common design, which extends to the consequences which might reasonably be expected to flow from carrying into effect the unlawful combination. There was therefore no error in admitting in evidence against Collins the acts and declaration of Thorne in relation to the gun with which the murder was committed. Besides, there was evidence tending to show that, within an hour of the commission of the murder, the defendant was seen in company with Thorne, in the immediate vicinity of the place of the murder, with the identical gun in his hand. On the trial the people offered evidence tending to show that the murderers of Cummings took from him the two bars of gold bullion, and they also introduced proof tending to show that in December, 1879, at New Orleans and Louisville, the defendant had in his possession and disposed of gold bullion corresponding in amount to that proven to have been taken from the murdered man. It is objected that the bars of bullion possessed and disposed of by defendant in New Orleans and Louisville were not shown to have been the same bars taken from Cummings. It is true there was no direct evidence that this was so, nor was it necessary that there should have been. It had been shown that the defendant was discharged from the state prison at San Quentin but a short time before the commission of the robbery and murder; that he was then impecunious; that the robbery and murder were committed; that two bars of gold bullion were taken by the murderers from the murdered man; that shortly afterwards the defendant was in possession and disposed of gold bars corresponding in amount with that stolen; and that he and Thorne divided the proceeds. We have no difficulty in holding such testimony admissible, as tending to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime. We see no error in the instructions nor in the rulings of the court below prejudicial to any substantial right of the defendant. Judgment and order affirmed.

Livermore v. Brundage Judge.[1]

Change of Venue—Disqualification of Judge—Notice of Motion.

When the judge of a court is a party defendant to a cause, it is not necessary to serve him with notice of a motion for change of venue, since no defense could be made to such motion, under Code Civil Proc. § 170, subd. 1, which provides that a cause in which a judge is disqualified from acting as such "must be transferred" to another court; nor can the judge make any order in such case, except an order of transfer.

Department I. Application by Horatio P. Livermore for a writ of mandate to compel Benjamin Brundage, judge of the superior court of Kern county, to transfer a cause in which said judge was defendant, to another court. Writ granted.

Stetson & Houghton, for petitioner.

McKee, J. The petitioner is plaintiff in an action against the defendant, who is judge of the court in which the action is pending. Being defendant in the action, and judge of the court in which the action is pending, it was not necessary for the petitioner, in making a motion to transfer the cause, to serve the judge of the court with notice of the motion, as it would be in a motion for a change of venue under the provisions of section 396 of the Code of Civil Procedure, in a suit before him between ordinary litigants; for in an action pending in his court, to which he himself is a party, he has no jurisdiction to hear and determine an application for a change of venue. Being a party to the action, the judge was directly interested in the action, and disqualified from acting at all, except so far as the action might be affected by the arrangement of the calendar of his court, or the regulation of the order of business, and except to transfer the case to some other court for trial. A judge who is a party to a cause pending in his court should not assume to sit in the case, (subdivision 1, § 170, Code Civil Proc.;) nor has he any authority to retain the case in his court for nonaction. The law imposes upon him a single duty in regard to it, and that is to order the case to be transferred for trial to the nearest court of an adjoining county, unless it shall be stipulated to transfer it to some other court. Section 398 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides as follows: "If an action or proceeding is commenced or pending in a court, and the judge or justice thereof is disqualified from acting as such, * * * it must be transferred for trial to a court the parties may agree upon by stipulation in writing, or made in open court, and entered in the minutes; or, if they do not so agree, then to the nearest court where the like objection or cause for making the order does not exist." Other than the duty imposed by this provision of the Code, a judge who is a party to an action or proceeding pending in his court has no discretion in the case. Let a writ of mandate issue.

HARVEY v. FOSTER et al.[1]

ATTACHMENT—JUDGMENT—COLLATERAL ATTACK—FORECLOSURE OF MORTGAGE—SURPLUS—LIABILITY OF SHERIFF—PARTIES.

1. Mortgaged property was levied on under attachment, and the attaching creditor recovered judgment. The mortgagee afterwards foreclosed his mortgage, and at the foreclosure sale bid an amount sufficient to cover, not only the mortgage debt, but an unsecured debt of the mortgagor to the mortgagee. Held, that such excess was bound by the lien of the attachment in question.

2. In such case, the mortgagee, not having been a party to the attachment proceeding, could not attack the validity of the judgment therein obtained, in an action by the attaching creditor against the sheriff and himself to recover the excess in question.

3. In such action the sheriff was concluded by his return showing such excess.

4. The sheriff and his sureties were liable for the excess in question.

5. The mortgagee was properly joined with the sheriff as defendant in the action to recover such excess.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tehama county.

Action by Charles Harvey against Charles F. Foster and others to recover a surplus remaining in his hands after satisfying a mortgage from the proceeds of a foreclosure sale, claimed by plaintiff under a judgment obtained by him in an attachment proceeding wherein defendant, the mortgagor, appeared, but made no objection to the validity of the proceeding. The surplus in question was claimed by the mortgagee, defendant Kraft, who bid an amount sufficient to cover not only the mortgage, but an unsecured claim which he had against the mortgagor. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Chipman & Garter and Geo. Cadwalader, for appellants. J. Chadbourne, J F. Ellison, and A. P. Catlin, for respondent.

MCKINSTRY, J. As the answer consists only of general and specific denials of the averments of the complaint, the finding "that all the allegations of the plaintiff's complaint are true" covers all the issues of fact. The attachment affidavit filed by plaintiff in the action Harvey v. Logan stated that the indebtedness from the defendant to the plaintiff therein had not been secured by any mortgage or lien, "or, if originally so secured," such security had become valueless. The affidavit fails to state the amount of the indebtedness due from Logan to Harvey. Code Civil Proc. § 538. If the defendant in the action (Harvey v. Logan) had moved to dissolve the attachment, it would have been the duty of the court to have ordered the attachment to be dissolved. Wilke v. Cohn, 54 Cal. 212; Hawley v. Delmas, 4 Cal. 195. But the lien of the attachment was valid as against the present defendants. Fridenberg v. Pierson, 18 Cal. 152, was a bill in equity alleging that both plaintiff and defendant were attaching creditors, the defendant's attachment (upon insufficient affidavit) having been first issued and levied, and prayed that the defendant's attachment be set aside in favor of the plaintiff. The court held that the bill could not be maintained, citing Drake, Attachm. § 273: "Whatever irregularities may exist in the proceedings of an attaching creditor, it is a well-settled rule that other attaching creditors cannot make themselves parties to those proceedings, for the purpose of defeating them on that account." Hawley v. Delmas, 4 Cal. 195, was an appeal from an order quashing an attachment. So, also, was Wilke v. Cohn, 54 Cal. 212. In Porter v. Pico, 55 Cal. 173, it was said: "Any irregularities in obtaining it [the attachment] were waived by the defendant to the suit when he appeared and answered, without taking advantage of them by motion or otherwise in the course of the proceedings. The process is merely auxiliary, and the judgment in the action cures all irregularities." The transcript shows that in the action Harvey v. Logan the defendant appeared, etc. If the transaction connected with the sale under the mortgage decree could be held to constitute Kraft, the mortgagee, successor in interest to Logan's statutory right of redemption, he acquired by it no right to attack the lien of the attachment, since Logan had none. Drake, Attachm. §§ 87, 112, 124, 143, 185, 273. The sheriff's return to the order of sale shows that he received at the mortgage sale the sum of $15,700.53 cash. He cannot make any defense inconsistent with his return. Freem. Ex'ns, 450; Ferguson v. Tutt, 8 Kan. 370. A sheriff is concluded by his return when it is set up by any party who may claim something under it. Crock. Sher. 46. Where at a judicial sale property brings more than the amount of the execution, if the officer fails to pay the excess, or see to it that it is paid to the defendant, he and the sureties on his official bond are liable in an action of debt at the suit of the defendant for the excess. State v. Reed, 5 Ired. 357. And an action may be maintained by the execution creditor for money collected by the sheriff upon an execution. Nelson v. Kerr, 59 N. Y. 224; Nelms v. Williams, 18 Ala. 650. Statutory remedies are cumulative, and leave the common-law remedies unimpaired. Freem. Ex'ns, 448. In the case before us the plaintiff has shown that he is entitled to receive from the sheriff the excess of the proceeds of the sale beyond the amount of the sale, costs, etc. Upon principle he should recover in an action against the sheriff, and, under the peculiar facts pleaded and proved, he was justified in joining Kraft as defendant.

Judgment and order affirmed.

LOCKE v. MOULTON et al. (No. 14,739.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 25, 1892.)

MORTGAGES—ABSOLUTE DEED—NEW TRIAL—NOTICE OF MOTION.

1. On an issue as to whether a deed absolute in form, executed by defendant to plaintiff, was a mortgage, as claimed by plaintiff, a witness testified that plaintiff had told him that "he had lent some money and got the land, and all he wanted out of it was his money and interest." The accounts between plaintiff and defendant, as kept in plaintiff's books, were introduced, in which defendant was charged with the fees for recording the deed under which plaintiff claimed, and also with the annual interest on the whole amount of money paid by plaintiff, and which formed, under his claim, the consideration for the deed. Held, that the evidence was sufficient to warrant a finding that the deed was intended as a mortgage.

2. A motion to set aside a judgment, and asking for a new trial, is not necessarily defective because it fails to ask to vacate the decision, since granting a new trial will of itself vacate the decision.

3. A deed absolute in form may be shown to be a mortgage, though there is no written promise by the grantor to pay money.

4. A mortgage, though in the form of a deed absolute, does not give the mortgagee the right of possession, and the mortgagor cannot be required to pay the debt for which the security was given, to enable him to defeat an action brought by the mortgagee to gain possession.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; JOSEPH H. BUDD, Judge.

Ejectment brought by George S. Locke against C. S. Moulton, S. M. McCloud, and Mrs. McCloud. From a judgment rendered in favor of plaintiff, and from an order denying defendants' motion for new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed.

Carter & Smith, for appellants. L. W. Elliott and W. L. Dudlen, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. Appeal from a judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff, and from an order denying defendants' motion for new trial. The complaint was in ejectment to recover certain lands therein described, alleging ownership in fee for five years last past. A general demurrer to the complaint was properly overruled. The defendants answered, and set up three separate defenses: (1) Denied plaintiff's ownership and right of possession, admitted the possession of S. M. McCloud, denied that it was unlawful, and denied that either of the other defendants were in possession. (2) Alleged that defendant Moulton was the owner in fee of the demanded premises from April, 1870, to May 15, 1890, and during that time was in possession; that on October 2, 1885, Moulton executed and delivered to plaintiff what purported to be a grant, bargain, and sale deed, which was duly acknowledged and recorded, and which, although in form a deed absolute, was executed and delivered as, and was intended to be, a mortgage to secure the payment of $6,127.50, with interest at 10 per cent. per annum, in which sum Moulton was then indebted to plaintiff; that Moulton was then in possession of said land, and so continued in possession until July 15, 1890, when he conveyed to defendant S. M. McCloud, who since that time has been in possession and entitled to the possession of the lands in controversy. (3) The third defense alleged adverse possession under a written instrument by defendant McCloud and his grantor, Moulton, for more that five years. Defendants prayed that said instrument be decreed to be a mortgage, and that defendants recover costs. The court found that all the allegations of the complaint were true; that Moulton was not the owner; that said instrument was intended to be and was a deed; that it was not given to secure any sum of money; that prior to the delivery of said deed Moulton was indebted to the plaintiff, which indebtedness was part of the consideration, and the remainder of the consideration was paid in cash; and that neither of the defendants have held adversely to plaintiff.

The principal question presented by appellants is whether the evidence justified the finding that the deed made by Moulton to plaintiff October 2, 1885, was not a mortgage. The plaintiff introduced in evidence said deed, which expressed a consideration of $1,500, but subject, however, to a deed of trust before that time made by Moulton to secure to the Stockton Savings & Loan Society the payment of $4,240 and interest. The plaintiff then testified as follows: "I know the land mentioned in the complaint. I demanded possession of the land from Mr. Moulton. He was upon the land at the time. I went there a short time before I commenced this suit. I went there to notify him to leave. He said he wouldn't leave, I think." The plaintiff offered no other evidence, except as hereinafter noticed, either in chief or in rebuttal. The land in question consisted of about 320 acres. The defendant Moulton testified that he was nearly 72 years of age, that he had resided on the land in question "going on twenty-one years," and resided there in October, 1885, and remembered the making of what purported to be a deed of said land to the plaintiff in October, 1885. "The agreement between us at that time was this: I borrowed some money of him, and gave him a deed to secure him, and whenever I paid him the principal and interest I was to have the deed back again. I saw Mr. Locke about it at his ranch; I went there to see him. I told him I wanted to pay some bills, and he spoke of the mortgage, and I told him the bank had a mortgage on it, and he agreed to take it up, and I should pay him. He should let me have $1,500, barring the $500 I owed him, and he should take up the mortgage, and I should pay him ten per cent. interest, and whenever I paid him principal and interest I should have the deed back; and that S. M. McCloud was present, and heard all the conversation." The witness further testified, in substance, that he had talked with Mr. Locke about it several times since; and he wished plaintiff to reduce the interest, and plaintiff thought he could not, or would not, but witness could not recollect all that was said; that plaintiff never called it his ranch, and all he ever wanted or claimed was the principal and interest; that witness thought he could get the money for 8 per cent., but thought he would call to see plaintiff first, to see if he would let him have it for 8 per cent., and at one time witness wanted to get a bond so as to raise the money, and plaintiff said he had better let it be as it was. Upon cross-examination Moulton testified that he did not give a note; that he thought the amount he was to repay plaintiff was $6,100; that he could not tell the amount; that he made no memorandum; that his memory was short; that he knew all about it at the time, but had forgotten; that he thought he had it down in his memorandum book which Mr. McCloud had made; that the interest was paid right along by Mr. McCloud, who had the ranch; that he did not rent the place from plaintiff; that he gave a note for the interest and a mortgage on the crop to secure the interest, the note being for $1,200. The note and mortgage were made January 8, 1886. The witness was unable to explain why the note was for nearly twice the amount of one year's interest, and in reply to the question put by plaintiff's counsel, "Didn't you mortgage the crop for the rent money?" answered, "Yes; for the first season;" but later said it was not to secure rent, but to secure the interest; that other creditors might come in, attach the crop, and plaintiff wouldn't get any interest; that he had always claimed the land,—always lived there.

In reply to a question put by plaintiff's counsel, the witness said he never swore that it was not his land. Witness was then shown the assessment book of San Joaquin county for 1886, and admitted that the signature looked like his. Plaintiff then offered in evidence said assessment, to which defendants objected, as will be noticed hereafter. The objection being overruled, the said assessment list was read in evidence, and showed only some personal property amounting to $65 assessed to witness. The witness said he did not recollect why he did not put in the land; that he wanted to get a bond for a deed, because "I couldn't get it unless he signed it;" that he tried to get plaintiff to give McCloud a bond for a deed, so they could either sell or get the interest cheaper; that he didn't understand whether the only way to remove a mortgage was for the mortgagee to make a deed. "Question. You say he got a certain share of the grain each year as rent? Answer. Yes; as interest. He got half the grain to pay him for interest, and if there was anything over it went on the principal."

S. M. McCloud, one of the defendants, testified that he had resided on the land in question about 20 years; that he was present at the conversation at plaintiff's ranch testified to by defendant Moulton; that Moulton wanted the money, and wanted to mortgage the land; that Locke said he would not take a mortgage, but that, if he would give him a deed, he would give Moulton the ranch back when he paid the principal and interest. Mr. Moulton said he wanted to pay some bills, and accepted the proposition with the understanding that he, Locke, should give the place back on paying the principal and interest at 10 per cent. per annum. At another time the witness said he went with Mr. Moulton to see plaintiff, when Moulton told Locke to give the witness the same agreement he had with him,—that witness was to take care of him,—and Mr. Locke said he would, or words to that effect; that he, the witness, had other conversations with Locke in regard to this transaction when he made settlements with him for the interest on that property, and for seed and feed that witness was to pay him for; that he had settlements with plaintiff, from plaintiff's books, in 1888 and 1889; that all the settlements he had related to the ranch in question; that in February, 1889, witness had a conversation with plaintiff in presence of Dr. Barber, in which witness asked plaintiff if he would give him the ranch on payment of the money and interest, and plaintiff replied, "Yes; I guess so;" that in 1890 he asked Locke to tell him the amount of the mortgage on that ranch; that he thought he could get the money; that plaintiff replied he could not now, but to come over to the house and he would; that the crop mortgage given in January, 1886, for $1,200, was to secure the interest, and for whatever seed and feed he might want; and that that note had been settled. Defendants further put in evidence the account kept by plaintiff in his books, entitled, "M. McCloud & Ranch in account with G. S. Locke," under which C. S. Moulton and M. McCloud were charged under dates of October 2 and 3, 1885, with sundry notes paid to other parties; also several items of cash and checks, and among them, "making deed, $3;" "recording Moulton deed, $1.50;" "recording trust deed to G. S. Locke, $3;" and "payment of trust deed to bank, $4,624.50," —the whole amounting to $6,127.50. This account further shows, among other items relating to feed, seed, interest on other items, etc., an annual charge of interest on the original amount of $6,127.50 for each year down to October 13, 1890, and under date of May 30, 1887, and also in the year 1890, he charges for taxes paid; but whether these taxes were paid on the land does not appear.

A. J. Larsen, another witness for defendants, testified that about 18 months before the trial he saw plaintiff, and asked him if he wanted to sell the land in question, "and he said I would have to see McCloud; that he had lent some money and got the land, and all he wanted out of it was his money and interest, and wanted me to go and see McCloud about it."

M. G. Flanders corroborated the testimony of defendant McCloud as to the conversation with plaintiff in the presence of witness.

The defendants also introduced evidence tending to show that the value of the land in question at the time of the transaction between plaintiff and defendant Moulton, in October, 1885, was about $35 per acre, amounting to some $4,500 more than was paid by plaintiff.

Upon the evidence in this case, the findings of the court that the deed was absolute in fact as well as in form, and was not given to secure a loan, cannot be sustained. The presumption arising from the execution and delivery of a deed absolute in form is undoubtedly that it is made in pursuance of an agreement to sell, and vests an absolute title in the grantee; and this court, while holding that a deed absolute in form may be shown by parol to have been intended as a mortgage, has sufficiently protected purchasers in fact by requiring satisfactory proof that the deed was intended as a security for the payment of money or the performance of an act by the grantor. At the same time the court has been watchful against all schemes of money-lenders to deprive unfortunate debtors of their lands at less than their value, under the claim that the transaction was a purchase and not a loan; and equity has not unfrequently gone further, and relieved against absolute sales and conveyances where the circumstances of oppression and undue advantage taken by the creditor of the debtor's condition has been held to constitute actual fraud. In the case at bar there can be no difficulty in arriving at a satisfactory conclusion. The testimony of Moulton is not only strongly corroborated, but is wholly undenied by the plaintiff. Some apparent contradictions and want of memory on the part of Moulton are sufficiently accounted for by his age, his apparent lack of knowledge of proper business methods, and his evident confidence in plaintiff's integrity. If any shadow of doubt rested upon the testimony of defendants Moulton and McCloud, it was entirely removed by the testimony of the witness Larsen, to whom plaintiff stated that "he had lent some money and got the land, and all he wanted out of it was his money and interest." But stronger still is the evidence furnished by his own accounts, showing that he not only charged Moulton for recording a deed to himself, which he now claims to have been a deed absolute, but also charged his vendor annually the interest at 10 per cent. upon the whole of the purchase money, which he paid, and which interest he received year after year, and on the 13th of October, 1890, only two months before the commencement of the action, the total indebtedness charged up by plaintiff amounted to the sum of $8,255.15. As I view this evidence, it is not strange that he did not go upon the stand to rebut the evidence he had piled up against himself.

The specifications of errors of law occurring at the trial require but little notice. The relation Mr. McCloud bore to Mr. Moulton and to the ranch could not affect the result of the case. If the deed to plaintiff was an absolute conveyance, and not a mortgage, he would have been entitled to recover, whatever might have been the relation of Mr. McCloud to the property or to Mr. Moulton; nor could such relation affect plaintiff's security if it were a mortgage.

As to the assessment list put in evidence by plaintiff, defendants' objection was properly overruled. It was defendant Moulton's duty to have listed his land subject to the mortgage, while it was equally the duty of the plaintiff to have returned his mortgage security for taxation, and Mr. Moulton would have been liable only for the tax upon any excess of the assessed value of the land over the amount of the mortgage. As it had some tendency to show that Mr. Moulton did not consider the land his at that time, even though inconclusive and susceptible of explanation, the evidence was properly received.

The exclusion of defendant Moulton's book, considered as the admission of plaintiff, the witness having testified that he took it down at plaintiff's dictation, was error; but, as the same facts were shown by defendants from plaintiff's account book, they were not prejudiced.

Respondent contends, however, that appellants' notice of motion was to set aside the judgment, and that a proceeding for a new trial must be aimed at the decision, and cites Sawyer v. Sargent, 65 Cal. 259, 3 Pac. Rep. 872, in which the notice was that defendant "intends to move the court to vacate and set aside the judgment, and to ask the court for a new trial," etc. The notice was held insufficient. In the case at bar, the notice is: "You will please take notice that the defendants, and each of them, intends to move the court to set aside and vacate the judgment rendered and entered herein, and to grant a new trial in this case upon," etc. In Bauder v. Tyrrel, 59 Cal. 99, it was held that it was not necessary for the notice of intention to move for a new trial to contain in terms a notice of intention to move that the decision should be vacated; that the order granting a new trial does of itself vacate the decision. This case was cited and followed in Heinlen v. Heilbron, 71 Cal. 557, 12 Pac. Rep. 673, in which the notice was that defendants would "make and submit to said court above named a motion for a new trial of said cause," designating the grounds of the motion. If, therefore, as was held in Bauder v. Tyrrel, it was not necessary that the notice in terms included the vacation of the decision, the notice in the case at bar is sufficient, and that part of the notice referring to the vacation of the judgment may be treated as surplusage; for if that part of the notice were stricken out, it would leave the notice precisely within the case of Heinlen v. Heilbron, supra. But the case of Sawyer v. Sargent, 65 Cal. 259, 3 Pac. Rep. 872, upon which respondent relies, has been virtually overruled by the late case of O'Connell v. Hotel Co., 90 Cal. 518, 27 Pac. Rep. 373. There the objection to the notice was that it did not formally give notice that a new trial would be asked for, and instead gave notice that defendant would move to set aside the decision. This court there held that if the notice distinctly and unmistakably gave the information that a new trial was asked for, it must be held sufficient; and pertinently asked: "Could any attorney imagine such a motion based upon the ground of insufficiency of the evidence, or errors of law occurring at the trial, or for newly-discovered evidence, and made upon a statement of the case, unless it were a motion for a new trial under the statute authorizing and requiring these things?" Under these authorities the notice of motion for new trial in the case at bar must be held sufficient.

Respondent's objection that the indebtedness of defendant Moulton was not evidenced by any writing is fully answered by the case of Husheon v. Husheon, 71 Cal. 407, 12 Pac. Rep. 410, where it was held that no accompanying written promise on the part of the mortgagor is necessary.

Respondent further contends that defendants cannot be heard to say that the deed is a mortgage, and to have it so decided, unless they offer to pay what they admit they owe. Such offer is not necessary to the defense in an action of ejectment brought upon a deed which was given as security, since it is well settled in this state, since the adoption of the Codes, that such deed does not pass the title, and therefore the denial of the title and ownership of the plaintiff raises an issue under which the facts showing the deed to be in fact a mortgage may be proved, and, when that conclusion is reached, section 2927 of the Civil Code, which declares that a mortgage does not entitle the mortgagee to possession unless authorized by the express terms of the mortgage, becomes applicable to the case. In Smith v. Smith, 80 Cal. 323, 21 Pac. Rep. 4, and 22 Pac. Rep. 186, 549, it was held that an affirmative defense that the deed relied on by plaintiff was a mortgage is covered by a denial of the plaintiff's allegation of ownership, and therefore that it was not an equitable defense, which the parties could require to be first disposed of.

As the mortgage, though in the form of a deed absolute, does not give the mortgagee the right of possession, it must follow that defendant Moulton, or his grantee, McCloud, being the owner of the legal title, cannot be required to pay the debt for which the security was given, or offer to pay it, to enable him to defeat the action brought by plaintiff to recover possession. I advise that the judgment and order denying defendants' motion for a new trial be reversed, and a new trial granted.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; FOOTE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and a new trial granted.

WILLIAMS et al. v. FRESNO CANAL & IRRIGATION Co. (No. 14,855.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 24, 1892.)

INJURIES BY CONTRACTOR—RESPONDEAT SUPERIOR—EVIDENCE—HARMLESS ERROR.

1. Where defendant canal company contracts with a third person for the repair of its canal, to be made with soil taken from plaintiff's land, the contract is in its nature injurious to plaintiff, and defendant is liable for the damage caused by its performance, under the doctrine of respondeat superior.

2. The employment of a surveyor by a canal company to have the canal repaired need not be in writing, to render the company liable on contracts made by the surveyor in effecting the repairs.

3. Where a witness, in an action for removing the soil from a portion of a tract of land, has testified that he is acquainted with the value of the land in the locality, and that the portion from which the soil was removed was injured to the extent of its whole value, it is not prejudicial to defendant to ask witness whether he would give as much for the tract after the removal of the soil as before.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. HARRIS, Judge.

Action by Williams and another against the Fresno Canal & Irrigation Company to recover damages for wrongfully digging, plowing, and scraping away the soil of plaintiff's land, and for an injunction against continuing said alleged trespasses. Judgment for plaintiffs for $750. From an order denying a motion for a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Church & Corey, for appellant. Sayle & Coldwell, for respondents.

MCFARLAND, J. This action was brought to recover damages for wrongfully digging, plowing, and scraping away the soil of plaintiffs' land, and for an injunction against continuing the said alleged trespasses. The jury returned a verdict for plaintiffs in the sum of $750, for which judgment was entered. Defendant appeals from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

1. The main point urged by appellant is that the trial court erred in denying a motion for a nonsuit made upon the ground "that no evidence has been adduced connecting the Fresno Canal & Irrigation Company with the alleged trespass set out in the complaint." The appellant, a corporation, owned a canal running along the northern side of respondents' land; and, for the purpose of raising and otherwise improving the canal, the top soil of respondents' land was plowed up to an average depth of about one foot, and over a space about 60 feet wide and a quarter of a mile long, and scraped off and piled up on the bank of said canal. The work by which this was accomplished was actually done by one Applegarth, and appellant contends that it was not responsible for the result of such work. But it sufficiently appears from the evidence that one Manuel was the surveyor of the appellant, regularly employed at a monthly salary, and that it was his business to have the said work done on the canal; that he made some kind of contract (the particulars of which do not appear) with said Applegarth to do said work; and that by said contract said Applegarth was to take the soil from respondents' land. When A. makes an independent contract with B., by which the latter is to do for the former a piece of work in itself harmless, and B. does the work so carelessly or unskillfully as to injure a third party, A., as a general rule, is not liable. But, when the contract is in its very nature and necessarily injurious to a third party, then the doctrine of respondeat superior applies. In such a case the injury does not result from the manner in which the work is done, but from the fact that it is done at all. In Boswell v. Laird, 8 Cal. 469, frequently cited as a strong case against the liability of principals, the court, by Judge FIELD, says: "If the mode and manner which constituted the defect by which the injuries complained of were occasioned had been inherent in the plan, and this plan had been devised by Laird and Chambers, which the contractors were engaged to carry out, then liability would attach to Laird and Chambers." In the case at bar the carrying away of respondents' soil was the very thing contracted for, and it inherently and necessarily caused the injury complained of. Without reviewing the evidence here at length, it is sufficient to say that, in our opinion, the agency of Manuel to act for the appellant in the matter of repairing and enlarging the canal clearly appears. It was not necessary that his employment for that purpose should have been in writing.

2. The second point made by appellant is that the verdict is not sustained by the evidence. This, however, is substantially the same as the one made about the nonsuit, and is not tenable.

3. The third and last point made by appellant is that the court erred in allowing respondent to ask the witness Shipp the following question: "Would you give as much for that eighty acres of land since the digging and scraping as you would have given for that eighty acres of land before?" Assuming that this question was not in proper form, still it is impossible to see how it could have prejudiced appellant. Before the question was asked the witness had testified at considerable length to the effect that he was a landowner, and well acquainted with the nature of the soil and the value of land where the premises described in the complaint were situated, and that the digging and scraping had taken away from the value of the land. He was afterwards examined minutely, and testified that the land was worth $2.50 per acre before the scraping; and he said, "I think this digging and scraping has damaged that part dug and scraped to the extent of its whole value," and that the acres thus injured "would not be worth anything now." In the face of this testimony, it was of no importance whether or not he said he would not give as much for the land after the scraping as before; of course he would not. The order appealed from is affirmed.

MAZE v. GORDON. (No. 14,915.)

Real-Estate Agents—Compensation—Contract—Ratification by Principal.

1. Where recovery of broker's commission is sought on a contract of employment in the sale of land, the contract need not describe the land specifically, if the terms of the employment can be made definite without it; but, where there is an attempt to limit the employment to certain property, it must appear that the property sold was within the description.

2. Before ratification of a sale of lands intrusted for sale by the owner to a broker can be inferred, it must be shown that the owner had knowledge of the particular conditions of the sale.

3. By the terms of a contract of employment between an owner of land and a broker, commission became due upon withdrawal of the property from sale within a certain time. Held, that a notice reciting that it was given under the contract by the owner to the broker not to sell, as the land had been withdrawn from the market, written within that time, while the owner was repudiating a sale by the broker, was a withdrawal of the premises from sale, entitling the broker to his commission, not as damages for breach of contract, but as a debt.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. Harris, Judge.

Action by W. C. Maze against Alexander Gordon, administrator of the estate of J. H. Hamilton, deceased, to recover broker's commission. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Edward Lynch, R. B. Terry, and G. E. Colwell, for appellant. J. P. Meux, for respondent.

Temple, C. Plaintiff appeals from the judgment and an order refusing a new trial. Action to recover broker's commission. The broker was employed under the following contract: "Know all men by these presents, that I have this day placed in charge and possession of W. C. Maze, as broker, for sale, for the term of twelve (12) months from date hereof, the following described property, to wit, secs. 1, 2, 3, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, and 15 of T. 11 S., R. 19 east, containing fifty-seven hundred and twenty acres, or any number of acres agreed on of above-numbered sections, commencing on the north side, at $7 per acre, and agree to pay 5 per cent. on small sales, and 3½ per cent. on entire tract of 10,840 acres, for $75,000, with improvements thereon; and I hereby agree that if during said time or thereafter, and before the said W. C. Maze shall have been notified in writing not to sell said property, he shall make sale, or any sale be made, of said property for the sum of $7 per acre, or $75,000 on entire tract, or any less sum hereafter fixed by J. H. Hamilton, to pay the said W. C. Maze 3½ and 5 per cent. commission on the gross amount of said sale; and further agree to pay the said W. C. Maze the like commission in the event of withdrawing the sale of said property during said time. Said W. C. Maze is authorized to allow any person applying to purchase said property, as aforesaid, a reasonable time to examine the title thereto, and to give such person a receipt for the deposit made, with the condition that if the title is defective the deposit will be returned, and also the sum of $— to cover expenses of examination of title. And it is further agreed that, in case I consummate the sale or exchange land at any time to the said W. C. Maze's customer, he having shown or called the attention of said customer to the above property, and he afterwards becomes a purchaser, to pay the above compensation, and will also pay the above compensation if I should find purchaser. Witness my hand this 29th day of October, 1886. J. H. Hamilton."

The broker found a purchaser for the entire tract of 10,840 acres, and entered into a written contract with the proposed purchaser in the name of his principal. The terms of the sale differed materially from those authorized in the broker's contract. The tract of 10,840 acres is described in the purchaser's contract as the east half of township 11 S., range 19 E., Mount Diablo meridian, excepting section 36, and 40 acres in section 12, which is not owned or possessed by Hamilton. It is averred in the complaint that this is the entire tract of 10,840 acres alluded to in the contract.

The complaint contains three counts. In the first it is averred that the sale made was ratified by Hamilton; in the second, that, after the purchaser was found and sale made, Hamilton withdrew the land from sale and forbade the completion of the contract of sale; in the third, that Hamilton ratified the sale made, and accepted it as under the contract, and then compromised the matter with the purchaser, paying him a consideration to be released, and then withdrew the land from sale, and revoked the authority of the plaintiff, before the expiration of the year, wherefore plaintiff is entitled to his commissions. In neither count is it averred that the authority of the broker was changed as to the conditions of the sale authorized. The action was tried without a jury, and the findings were for defendant on every point. The answer admits the contract of employment, and that a sale was arranged as averred, but denies that a purchaser was found willing to purchase according to the terms authorized, or that the sale negotiated was ratified, and it is denied that the land ever was completely withdrawn from sale. Some affirmative matters are also set up in defense. No evidence was offered by the defense, but the case was submitted upon the evidence of plaintiff.

It is contended that the tract of 10,840 acres is not described in the contract of employment. A contract to employ a broker need not describe the lands specifically, if the terms of the employment can be made definite without it. Where, as here, there is an attempt to limit the employment to certain property, it must appear that the property sold is within the description. So far as the statute of frauds is concerned, however, the terms of the employment are the essential part. If the circumstances surrounding the transaction should disclose that Hamilton then owned or claimed a tract of land containing just that number of acres, of which the nine sections specified composed a part, I think it would suffice for a contract of this character. No such circumstances are averred or proven here. If, however, the sale was ratified by Hamilton, and accepted as made under the employment, this would not matter. I do not think the evidence shows ratification. It is not made to appear that, when the letters were written to plaintiff, Hamilton was sufficiently aware of the terms of the sale to enable him to ratify it. The letters show that he knew of a sale, and, since he was willing to ratify, one might infer that he must have known of the particular conditions of the sale. But this is not enough. Before ratification can be inferred, such knowledge must be shown.

At the date of the telegram of November 2d he certainly knew, but then he was trying to rid himself of the claim that a purchase had been made. The dispatch was evidently sent under the impression that at that late date the purchaser could not comply with the terms of the sale, and may be taken as an offer, by way of a bluff, to let the purchaser go on with the contract, rather than pay what he had promised as a compromise. The offer to buy off the purchaser cannot be construed into a ratification. It was an attempt to get rid of a claim which was a cloud upon his land. Although it may be evidence of some value, it is too equivocal to justify finding upon it alone a contract of sale. September 14, 1887, while Hamilton was repudiating the sale and attempting to get rid of the claim, he wrote the following letter to plaintiff: "To W. C. Maze, Madera, Cal.: You are hereby notified, according to the terms of my contract with you, dated 29th day of October, 1886, not to sell sections one, two, three, ten, eleven, twelve, thirteen, fourteen, and fifteen, in township eleven south, range nineteen east, M. D. B. & M., as the same has been withdrawn this day from the market. J. H. HAMILTON. Dated Fresno, Cal., Sept. 14, 1887." In view of this letter, I am unable to see how the third finding, to the effect that "Hamilton did not, at any time previous to the expiration of the period mentioned in said agreement within which the plaintiff should have authority to sell, withdraw said premises from sale, or prevent the plaintiff from effecting a sale thereof," can be sustained. It was not essential to make out plaintiff's case that he should have found a purchaser. By the terms of the employment, commissions became due "in the event of withdrawing the sale of said property during the time." The claim to compensation under this provision of the contract is not, as respondent suggests, as damages for a breach of the contract in withdrawing the land from sale. This Hamilton had a right to do, and in such event he became indebted to plaintiff for his commissions. I think the judgment and order appealed from should be reversed, and a new trial had.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed, and a new trial ordered.

PEOPLE v. McNULTY. (No. 20,945.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 11, 1892.)

CRIMINAL LAW—APPEAL—STAY OF EXECUTION.

1. Under Pen. Code, § 1237, subd. 3, allowing defendant in a criminal case to appeal "from any order made after judgment affecting the substantial rights of the party," an order, made after a capital conviction, fixing the time and place of execution, may be appealed.

2. Under Pen. Code, § 1248, providing that an appeal may be dismissed if it "is irregular in any substantial particular, but not otherwise," an appeal cannot be dismissed on the ground that it is frivolous. McFarland, J., dissenting.

3. Under Pen. Code, § 1243, providing that "an appeal * * * from a judgment of conviction stays the execution of the judgment in all capital cases, and in all other cases upon filing * * * a certificate of the judge * * * or of a justice of the supreme court that in his opinion there is probable cause for the appeal, but not otherwise," an appeal from an order fixing the time and place of execution does not stay the execution, unless such a certificate is filed.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; D. J. MURPHY, Judge.

McNulty was convicted of murder in the first degree, and sentenced to death, and appeals from an order fixing the time and place of execution. Motion to dismiss the appeal. Denied.

Carroll Cook and J. E. Foulds, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

BEATTY, C. J. The defendant in this case was convicted of murder in the first degree, and sentenced to suffer death. He appealed from the judgment of conviction, which was finally affirmed by this court in February last. 29 Pac. Rep. 61. Upon the going down of the remittitur the superior court made an order fixing the 12th day of August, 1892, as the time, and the county jail of San Francisco as the place, of execution of the judgment. From this order the defendant, on the 8th day of August, served and filed his notice of appeal. The people now move to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that it is frivolous. This is not an appeal from the judgment of conviction, but only an appeal from the order last above mentioned, made and entered on June 17, 1892, and the fact that said order is designated in the notice of appeal as a judgment does not make it an appeal from the judgment of conviction which was made and entered more than three years before this last appeal was taken. An appeal from the judgment in a criminal case must be taken within one year after its rendition. Pen. Code, § 1239. This, then, is an appeal taken under subdivision 3 of section 1237 of the Penal Code, which allows the defendant in a criminal action to appeal "from any order made after judgment affecting the substantial rights of the party." In People v. Sprague, 54 Cal. 92, and in two subsequent cases[1] decided by this court, it has been held that an order made after affirmance of a capital conviction fixing the time and place of execution is one of the orders included by said subdivision. There can be no doubt of the correctness of this view, and it therefore follows that this defendant had a right to take and to prosecute this appeal.

Can it be dismissed upon the ground that it is frivolous? To dismiss an appeal is to refuse to consider its merits, and therefore there can be no dismissal of an appeal on the ground that it is without merit; for to reach this conclusion the merits must be considered, and the record must be examined. The motion, therefore, is in terms self-contradictory, and must be viewed in its real character as a motion for a summary hearing of the appeal and affirmance of the order of the superior court. This conclusion seems to be inevitable upon the grounds stated, but, if it were not, the statutory provision makes it so. By section 1248 of the Penal Code it is expressly provided as follows: "If the appeal is irregular in any substantial particular, but not otherwise, the appellate court may, on any day, on motion of the respondent, upon five days' notice, accompanied with copies of the papers upon which the motion is founded, order it to be dismissed." By this provision the supreme court is forbidden to dismiss an appeal in a criminal case unless the appeal itself is irregular in some substantial particular, and this is to be determined by reference to the order or judgment appealed from and the steps taken to perfect the appeal. Looking to this order, notice of appeal, etc., we find an appealable order and notice of appeal therefrom substantially and formally sufficient, regularly served and filed and in due time. The appeal, therefore, cannot be dismissed without a plain violation of the express inhibition of the statute.

Nor can we consider and determine the appeal upon its merits upon this motion and in this summary manner. The record is not before us, and the cause is not brought to a hearing in accordance with the rules of practice of the court, nor pursuant to any order modifying or dispensing with such rules. The argumentum ab inconvenienti, so strongly insisted upon by the attorney general as a reason for putting a different construction upon the above-quoted provision of the Penal Code relative to the dismissal of appeals in criminal cases, is without any force, for the simple reason that the inconvenience suggested cannot possibly arise. He says that, unless such an appeal as this can be summarily dismissed upon the ground that it is frivolous, it will be in the power of every person condemned to death to delay the execution of the sentence again and again, as often as he chooses, by the simple expedient of taking an appeal from each successive order appointing the time and place of execution, so short a time before the date of execution as to preclude the hearing of the appeal before the day has passed. This argument assumes that the taking of the appeal ipso facto stays the execution of the sentence. But the assumption is contrary to the express provision of the statute. Section 1243 of the Penal Code is as follows: "An appeal to the supreme court from a judgment of conviction stays the execution of the judgment in all capital cases, and in all other cases, upon filing with the clerk of the court in which the conviction was had a certificate of the judge of such court, or of a justice of the supreme court, that, in his opinion, there is probable cause for the appeal, but not otherwise." It is clear, from a reading of this section, that it is only the appeal from the judgment of conviction which, as we have seen, must be taken within one year after its rendition, that stays the execution proprio vigore. In case of any other appeal, such, for instance, as this appeal from an order after judgment, the mere appeal has no effect in staying execution, unless the judge of the superior court or a justice of this court will grant a certificate of probable cause for the appeal. This, of course, involves an examination of the original record, or a copy, by the judge to whom the application is made, and is the regular and only method prescribed by the statute for a determination whether the appeal is frivolous. In pursuing this method, the onus rests upon the appellant to convince the judge of the superior court or one of the justices of this court that there is some merit in his appeal. If he cannot,—if his appeal is clearly frivolous,—no certificate will be granted, and there will be no stay. This being so, there is no occasion in such case for the people to assume the laboring oar, and, on motion to dismiss the appeal, show that it is frivolous. Motion denied.

We concur: De Haven, J.; Harrison, J.; Sharpstein, J.; Garoutte, J.

McFarland, J. I dissent. I think that the papers submitted show upon their face that they constitute a mere confessed attempt to take a second appeal from the judgment, and should be so considered. The appeal should, in my opinion, be dismissed.

GREEN v. THORNTON. (No. 14,747.)

ACCOUNT STATED—IMPEACHMENT.

Where a surviving partner, having in his possession a note of the partnership, which he is led by the representations of a third person to believe will be paid, renders an account, under Code Civil Proc. § 1585, for the purpose of adjusting the partnership affairs, and determining what part of the money thereon should go, when collected, to the estate of the deceased partner, which account is finally settled, but the note afterwards fails of collection, he may have the account opened.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; J. G. SWINNERTON, Judge.

Action by Susan P. Green, administratrix, etc., against Arthur Thornton. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

F. D. Nicol and P. W. Bennett, for appellant. Louttit, Woods & Lezinsky, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an action to recover the sum of $1,112.70, with interest thereon, alleged to be due plaintiff from defendant upon an account stated. The material facts of the case are as follows: In 1881 L. D. Green, plaintiff's intestate, and the defendant purchased and had conveyed to them a certain tract of land. They paid for the land $4,000, and to raise the money they borrowed from the Stockton Savings & Loan Society the sum of $3,500, for which they gave to the society their promissory note, secured by a trust deed of the property. Thereafter Green occupied and managed the land until October 25, 1884, when they sold and conveyed the same to one C. H. Bailey for $6,500. Of this sum Bailey paid to his grantors at the time $1,000 in money, and for the balance he gave them his promissory note for $2,500, bearing interest at the rate of 8 per cent. per annum, and due two years after date, and a mortgage on the land to secure its payment, and undertook and agreed to pay the grantor's note to the Stockton Savings & Loan Society, on which there was then due and unpaid the sum of $3,000. In November, 1886, Green died intestate, and in December following the plaintiff, his surviving wife, was duly appointed administratrix of his estate, and entered upon the discharge of her duties as such. On the 15th of November, 1887, Bailey filed in the court having jurisdiction of the estate his petition, stating, among other things, that by reason of some inadvertence or error the deed executed to him by Thornton and Green had never been recorded, and was lost, and that by reason of such loss he had no evidence of his title to the land purchased; that Thornton was ready and willing to execute and deliver to him a deed conveying all his interest in the said land, and that Mrs. Green, as administratrix, was ready and willing to convey to him all the interest of the estate in the said land if she should be authorized so to do by the court. Wherefore he prayed that, after notice and a full hearing as to the facts, a decree be made and entered authorizing and directing Mrs. Green, as administratrix, to execute to him a conveyance of all the right, title, and interest of the said L. D. Green, deceased, and of his estate in and to the said land. Afterwards the matter came on for hearing, and on January 7, 1888, by consent of Mrs. Green, expressed in open court by her attorney, a decree was entered authorizing and directing her to execute to Bailey the conveyance asked for, and to release one half of the mortgage upon said land "upon payment to her, as administratrix of the estate of L. D. Green, deceased, of the sum of $1,112.70, being one half of the sum now due and unpaid upon" said mortgage. The decree further directed that Bailey, before the delivery of the deed, execute and deliver to the administratrix and Thornton a written contract that he would pay the moneys due the Stockton Savings & Loan Society, as evidenced by the trust deed before mentioned. The clause above quoted was not in the decree, as it was drawn up by the attorney for petitioner, but was written in before it was signed by the attorney for Mrs. Green.

Before the petition was filed Bailey was told by one David Winders, who, as the agent of Mrs. Green, had attended to all the affairs of the estate except its law business since her appointment as administratrix, that, if he would file his petition and get deeds to the property, he (Winders) could and would help him raise money, by mortgage on the property, sufficient to pay his note to Thornton and Green and the amount due on their note to the Savings & Loan Society, and Bailey says that but for these representations he would not have applied at that time for the decree; and, while the proceedings under the petition were pending, Winders also stated several times to the defendant that, if Bailey succeeded in getting his decree and deeds, he could and would raise for him the money to pay off the entire indebtedness secured upon the land; and defendant says he relied upon these statements, and but for them he would not have made out the account sued upon. Defendant knew at that time Bailey's financial condition, and that he had no money to pay his note and mortgage, and no means of raising any except by a new mortgage on his land.

After the death of Green, the defendant always claimed and insisted that he and the decedent were partners in the purchase, management, and sale of the said land, and that the note given them by Bailey was partnership property. He also claimed that he had paid out and advanced for the partnership a considerable sum of money, and had a right to repay that sum to himself out of its assets. The plaintiff denied that any partnership had ever existed between her deceased husband and defendant, and insisted that one half of the Bailey note belonged to the estate of deceased, free and clear of all claims of defendant against it. This condition of things continued up to about January, 1888, when defendant had drawn up, and proposed to file in court, a complaint against the plaintiff here, praying for a decree establishing the existence of the partnership, and for an accounting as to its affairs. When this fact was made known to the plaintiff, she admitted that a partnership had existed, and thereupon the defendant made out the account here sued upon and filed it in court. The account was headed: "In the Matter of the Estate of L. D. Green, deceased. Arthur Thornton, surviving partner of the firm of Thornton & Green, in account with Susan P. Green, as administratrix of the estate of L. D. Green, deceased." It then credits Thornton with various sums of money paid out on account of the partnership, aggregating $967.14, and it debits him with $150, paid by Bailey as interest on his mortgage; with $405.84 "credit allowed Susan P. Green, as administratrix, as per agreement with said Susan P. Green;" and with $1,524, "one half of amount of note and mortgage due from C. H. Bailey." And it adds: "A. Thornton, debtor to balance, $1,112.70." On January 14, 1888, the court made an order as follows: "In the Matter of the Estate of L. D. Green, deceased. Arthur Thornton, surviving partner of the firm of Thornton & Green, having heretofore filed in this court his final account as such surviving partner with Susan P. Green, the administratrix of said estate, all parties interested therein this 12th day of January, 1888, appearing in open court and consenting thereto, on motion of P. W. Bennett, Esquire, attorney for said administratrix and said estate, it is ordered that the said final account be, and the same is hereby, settled, allowed, and confirmed." It turned out that Winders did not raise the money promised, or any part thereof, and Bailey did not pay to the defendant or plaintiff any part of the money due them, nor to the Savings & Loan Society any part of the money due it; but the society sold out his land under its trust deed, leaving Bailey insolvent and his note to the parties here worthless. Upon these facts the court below gave judgment for the plaintiff according to the prayer of her complaint. The defendant then moved for a new trial, and, his motion being denied, appealed from the judgment and order.

An "account stated" is defined by Bouvier to be "an agreed balance of accounts; an account which has been examined and accepted by the parties." It implies an admission that the account is correct, and that the balance struck is due and owing from one party to the others; and its effect is to establish prima facie the accuracy of the items without other proof, and to constitute a new contract on which an action will lie. Auzerais v. Naglee, 74 Cal. 60, 15 Pac. Rep. 371. It does not, however, operate as an estoppel, and it may be impeached for fraud or mistake. Judge Story says: "If there has been any mistake, or omission, or accident, or fraud, or undue advantage, by which the account stated is in truth vitiated and the balance is incorrectly fixed, a court of equity will not suffer it to be conclusive upon the parties, but will allow it to be opened and re-examined." 1 Story, Eq. Jur. § 523; and see 1 Wait, Act. & Def. p. 195. The question then is, was the defendant entitled to have the account in suit opened and re-examined? It will be observed that when the account was made out there was no claim by plaintiff that defendant was indebted to the estate in any sum whatever, and he was not in fact so indebted. He held the Bailey note, and was authorized to collect it, but, without any fault on his part, never succeeded in doing so. It was partnership assets, and, if collected, a portion of the proceeds would have belonged and been payable to the plaintiff, but defendant was under no obligation, legal or equitable, to pay her any part of it, unless and until that event should happen. He then believed, from the statements of Winders, that the note would be paid in full, and, acting on this belief, he seems to have rendered the account, in pursuance of the provisions of section 1585 of the Code of Civil Procedure, for the purpose of adjusting the partnership affairs and determining what part of the money due on the note, when paid, would go to the plaintiff. Under these circumstances, it seems neither reasonable nor just that defendant should be made to pay plaintiff money which evidently does not belong to her. We think the defendant was entitled to impeach the account, and that the pleadings were sufficient to enable him to do so. We therefore advise that the judgment and order be reversed, and the cause remanded.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; TEMPLE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded.

ODD FELLOWS' SAV. BANK v. TURMAN.
(No. 14,487.)

TRESPASS—TITLE TO MAINTAIN—POSSESSION—DEFENSES.

1. Certified transcripts of several recorded deeds, the first purporting to convey "a portion" of certain land, but not designating any particular portion, the second a "further portion," and the third the "remaining portion," offered without any showing of title in the grantors, or that the grantee had entered claiming under the said deeds, are not sufficient evidence of title to enable the grantee to maintain an action for trespass on the land.

2. Evidence of the survey of land, made for the purpose of locating a certain lake, an advertisement of the land for sale or rent, and a notification to a certain stockman to keep his stock off of "that land," is not sufficient, as to actual possession, to enable the alleged owner to maintain an action for trespass on the land.

3. The fact that defendant, in an action for trespass on land, makes the defense that the land was not fenced, does not estop him afterwards from denying plaintiff's ownership of the land.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Colusa county; E. A. BRIDGFORD, Judge.

Trespass by the Odd Fellows' Savings Bank against H. B. Turman. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Clark & Aram, for appellant. H. M. Albery, for respondent.

McFarland, J. This is an appeal by plaintiff from a judgment in favor of defendant and from an order denying a new trial. In the complaint (which was not verified) it is averred that plaintiff is, and during a certain named period was, "the owner of and lawfully in possession of" a large body of land described by legal subdivisions; and that during the said named period defendant's cattle pastured on said land, and destroyed grass, hay, etc., to plaintiff's damage in the sum of $3,000. In the answer "each and every allegation" of the complaint is denied. The court found that plaintiff was not either the owner or in possession of any part of the land described in the complaint at any time mentioned therein, and the evidence clearly warrants said finding. To prove paper title, plaintiff introduced a properly certified transcript of a recorded deed from one Maurice Dore to plaintiff, which purported to convey "a portion" of the land described in the complaint,—what portion does not appear. There was then introduced a defective certificate of another recorded deed from said Dore to plaintiff of a "further portion" of said lands, and another defective certificate of a recorded deed to plaintiff from one Fisher of the "remaining portion" thereof. This was all the evidence offered on that subject. There was no evidence tending to show that either said Dore or Fisher ever had title, or any estate or interest whatever, in any part of said land. There was no attempt to trace the title to its paramount source, and therefore no title was shown. There was no evidence that plaintiff entered upon said land, or any part of it, claiming under either of said deeds, and therefore there was no color of title shown.

There was no evidence showing that plaintiff was ever in the actual possession of the land or of any part of it. It is mostly tule land, unfenced and uninclosed. An agent of plaintiff visited the land once, and had some surveying done for the purpose of locating a certain Coon lake; and he also at one time advertised it for sale or rent, but had no offers. He also notified defendant's agent once to keep his cattle off "that land." These were the only acts done in the premises, and, of course, they did not constitute actual possession.

Appellant contends that there is some evidence of plaintiff's title to some parts of the land in certain answers of its witness Hiatt given on cross-examination, in which he says, without objection, that "the bank owns" certain mentioned small tracts. But these answers were in response to questions in cross examination, evidently, not with reference to the subject of title or ownership, but for the purpose of locating the lands claimed by appellant, and distinguishing them from lands claimed by Mr. Parks, and it was clearly so understood by both the questioner and the witness. Hiatt had testified in chief about the lands "described in the complaint," but he did not say or pretend to know anything about the title. At the end of his cross-examination he said: "I am only answering from the map; that is the only way I can answer it." The form of the answers, therefore, cannot be taken as evidence—certainly not as sufficient evidence—to establish title or ownership. The correct finding that appellant had no ownership or possession of the land renders it unnecessary to examine the somewhat complicated question as to what fence law obtains in Sutter county. The point that, because respondent made the separate defense that the lands described in the complaint were not fenced, he is estopped from denying that appellant owned them, is obviously too untenable to need discussion. Judgment and order affirmed.

San Joaquin County v. Budd et al.

(No. 14,723.)

County Officers—Designating Rooms in Courthouse for Officers—Judicial Notice.

1. Under St. 1883, p. 299, authorizing supervisors to provide "county buildings and suitable rooms for county purposes," and to manage and control the same, the power of the supervisors to designate rooms in the courthouse for the use of county officers is not exhausted by one designation, but they may assign to the district attorney rooms occupied by the judges of the superior court, though such rooms were designated on the building plans as "Judges' Chambers."

2. In an action by the county to recover possession of such rooms the court will not take judicial notice that defendants are judges of the superior court of the county.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; W. C. Van Fleet, Judge.

Action by the county of San Joaquin against Budd and another to recover possession of certain rooms in its courthouse. From a judgment in favor of defendants, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

P. W. Bennett, (T. C. Van Ness, of counsel,) for appellant. Jas. H. & J. E. Budd, (W. L. Dudley, S. D. Woods, and F. T. Baldwin, of counsel,) for respondents.

De Haven, J. This action is brought by the county of San Joaquin to recover possession of two rooms in the courthouse of that county. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and at the same time the court granted a motion to strike out a portion of the complaint, and thereupon judgment was rendered in favor of defendants. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment.

The complaint alleges, in substance, that a certain block of land in the city of Stockton was dedicated by its owner for public use for the erection thereon of the courthouse for San Joaquin, and such other public buildings as might by the proper authorities be deemed necessary, and that the plaintiff did erect thereon a courthouse, and was on the 27th of January, 1891, in the possession, and was then, and ever since has been, entitled to the possession, of said block of land and of the courthouse, and of those two rooms on the second floor thereof, each of which is designated on the plans of said courthouse as "Judges' Chambers;" and that the defendants did "on the day and year last aforesaid wrongfully and unlawfully enter into said rooms, and did oust the plaintiff therefrom," and now "unlawfully withhold the possession thereof from plaintiff." The complaint also contained this paragraph, which is the part which was stricken out on motion of defendants: "That said rooms were assigned by plaintiff for the use and occupation of the district attorney of said county, and on the 7th day of April, 1891, he demanded of defendants in his own behalf and in the name of and on behalf of plaintiff that they vacate and surrender possession of said rooms, but to vacate or surrender possession thereof said defendants refused, and still refuse."

1. The court did not err in striking from the complaint the paragraph above quoted. It was merely the statement of a matter which might be proper to be shown upon the trial of the action, but it added nothing to the ultimate and issuable facts alleged in the complaint.

2. The complaint states a cause of action. It alleges facts showing plaintiff's right to the possession of its courthouse, and of the rooms therein described, and that defendants wrongfully withhold the possession of said rooms from plaintiff. This is all that a complaint in this character of action is required to state. Payne v. Treadwell, 16 Cal. 244; Marshall v. Shafter, 32 Cal. 194. Indeed, that this complaint would generally be considered sufficient in an action to recover possession of real property is not denied, but it is argued in behalf of respondents that the court must take judicial notice of the fact that the defendants are judges of the superior court of the county of San Joaquin, and, as it is alleged that the rooms occupied by them are marked upon the plans of the courthouse as "Judges' Chambers," that it thus appears from the complaint that they are rightfully in occupation thereof, and that their occupation is the possession of the plaintiff. This seems to have been the view of the learned judge who presided in the court below, and rendered judgment for the defendants.

3. We do not think the court, in passing upon the question raised by demurrer to the complaint in this action, is required to take judicial notice of the fact that the defendants are judges of the superior court of San Joaquin county. The court takes judicial notice of the fact as to who are the judges of the superior court of that county, and of their official acts; that is, of such acts as can only be performed by a judge of that court in his official capacity. But the court can have no judicial knowledge that a person who is sued upon a promissory note, or made a defendant in an action to recover possession of real estate, and who may have the same name as a judge of the superior court, is in fact such judge. The case has, however, been elaborately argued here by both parties upon the conceded fact that the defendants are judges of the superior court, and that this action is in fact brought to recover possession of certain rooms in the courthouse, which are occupied by defendants as their judicial chambers, and, as the case must be remanded for trial, it is proper to consider it from this point of view, and pass upon the main question which has been presented in the argument of counsel.

4. It sufficiently appears from the complaint that the rooms now occupied by the defendants were originally designed to be used as chambers for the judges of the superior court, and were so marked upon the plans for the construction of the courthouse; and it is argued here that, the rooms having been constructed for this purpose, the defendants have the right to occupy them, and that the board of supervisors has no right to devote them to any other purpose. We do not think that this contention, as thus broadly stated, can be maintained. The county of San Joaquin is a public corporation, vested with certain corporate powers necessary to enable it to perform the duties which are imposed upon it as one of the political subdivisions of the state, and its corporate powers "can only be exercised by the board of supervisors, or by agents and officers acting under their authority or authority of law." County Government Act, § 2, (St. 1883, p. 299.) In defining the powers of the board of county commissioners in the state of Ohio, the supreme court of that state say: "It may be laid down as a general rule that the board of county commissioners is clothed with authority to do whatever the corporate or political entity—the county—might, if capable of rational action, except in respect to matters the cognizance of which is exclusively vested in some other officer or person." Shanklin v. Commissioners, 21 Ohio St. 583. This expresses with accuracy the powers of the board of supervisors within the several counties of this state. In addition to the general language above quoted from the county government act, that statute expressly enumerates the powers of the board of supervisors, from which it very clearly appears that these officers are made the representatives of the county for the purpose of providing necessary county buildings and suitable rooms for county purposes, and that they are to take care of, manage, and control all real and personal property belonging to the county, and necessary for public use. County Government Act, § 25, subdivisions 7-9. It is the duty of the county to erect and furnish a courthouse, and to provide necessary offices for the several county officers. In performing this duty the county acts through its board of supervisors precisely as a private corporation acts through or by its directors, and the action of such board in providing "suitable rooms for county purposes," and in designating the particular rooms which shall be occupied by the different officers, is the act of the county. And this power is not exhausted when once exercised, but is a continuing one, and the assignment of offices may be changed whenever, in the judgment of the board, public convenience will be promoted by a change. The whole matter of providing "suitable rooms for county purposes," which necessarily carries with it the power to designate the room which is suitable for the transaction of any particular part of the public business, is intrusted by law to the judgment and discretion of the board of supervisors, and the judge of the superior court has no more right to select the particular room in the courthouse which he will occupy as his chambers than has the clerk or the sheriff to choose the room which he will occupy as his office, and the law confers no authority upon him to take possession of any room in the courthouse for his chambers when such room has been assigned by the board of supervisors to any other county officer. The power of the board is necessarily exclusive. If, however, the room actually assigned for the use of the court or for the judge is not suitable for that purpose, he is not compelled to occupy it, but may proceed under the authority conferred by section 144 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and this power is amply sufficient to protect the superior court from any arbitrary or unreasonable action of the board of supervisors, without in the least interfering with their exclusive right to manage and control the public property, or with the right of other county officers to occupy such rooms in the courthouse as may have been assigned to them. Judgment reversed.

Los Angeles County v. San Jose Land & Water Co. (No. 14,589.)

Condemning Land for Highways.

Pol. Code, § 2690, (as amended March 17, 1887,) provides that the board of supervisors of a county shall by order direct the institution of proceedings by the district attorney to condemn a right of way as a public highway, and that no informality in the proceedings shall vitiate the suit, but that the order to bring suit shall be conclusive proof of their regularity, "and the said suit shall be determined by the court or jury in accordance with the rights of the respective parties as shown in court, independent of said proceedings before said board." Held, that the statute establishes a rule of evidence for this particular proceeding, leaving the owner of the lands condemned to his appropriate remedy by a direct attack on the board's action.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Lucien Shaw, Judge.

Action by Los Angeles county against the San Jose Land & Water Company to condemn a right of way for a public highway. From an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

S. R. Dunnigan and Anderson, Fitzgerald & Anderson, for appellant. Geo. M. Holton and Walter J. Hughes, for respondent.

Foote, C. This action was brought in the superior court of the county of Los Angeles for the purpose of condemning the right of way for a proposed public road over the lands of the defendant corporation. It was instituted under an order made by the board of supervisors of the county (plaintiff here) under section 2690 of the Political Code, as amended March 17, 1887, which is in this language: "If any award of damages is not accepted within ten days of the date of the award, it shall be deemed as rejected by the landowners. The board must by order direct proceedings to procure the right of way to be instituted by the district attorney of the county under and as provided in title seven, part three, of the Code of Civil Procedure, against all nonaccepting landowners, and when thereunder the right of way is procured the road must be declared a public highway, and opened as therein provided. In such suit no informality in the proceedings of the board shall vitiate the suit, but the said order of the board directing the district attorney to bring suit shall be conclusive proof of the regularity thereof; and the said suit shall be determined by the court or jury in accordance with the rights of the respective parties as shown in court, independent of said proceedings before said board." The appellant contends that the proceedings before the board of supervisors leading up to this proceeding were void, and that, therefore, the superior court has no jurisdiction to hear the present action, notwithstanding the existence of the statute just quoted; the contention being that if the action of the board of supervisors cannot be attacked collaterally in this, a different proceeding, the statute in question is unconstitutional, because it provides for the taking of private property without due process of law. If these proceedings necessarily had the effect of taking away the property of the appellant without affording any opportunity in any other legal way for the appellant to prevent this taking by showing that the board of supervisors had not proceeded in a legal way to lay out the road for the public use for which the land in controversy is needed, there would be much force in the plaintiff's position. But such is not the necessary result of this proceeding; and all that this statute does in effect is to establish a rule of evidence for this particular proceeding, leaving the landowner to his appropriate remedy of a direct attack on the action of the board before the order shall be made declaring the land taken "a public highway, and open," as by law provided. The object of the law plainly is not to allow, in this proceeding, a collateral attack on the action of the board of supervisors in another and distinct proceeding, formally had before them as a quasi court. This amounts, as before said, to nothing more than the establishment of a rule of evidence, and leaves the appellant to his appropriate remedy for a review of what he claims the unauthorized proceedings of that board. The case cited in 40 Cal. (Damrell v. San Joaquin Co., p. 155) is not in point here. That was a proceeding by certiorari to review the alleged void action of the board of supervisors of San Joaquin county, and in a proper proceeding would be authority, but not in a proceeding under the statute. This view of the matter necessarily disposes of all the other points made by the appellant, and the order denying a new trial alone appealed from ought to be affirmed, and we so advise.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; HAYNES, C.

NEVADA BANK OF SAN FRANCISCO v. STEINMITZ, County Treasurer.[1]

RAILROAD COMPANIES—MUNICIPAL AID—UNILATERAL CONTRACT—NONCOMPLETION OF TRACK—RATABLE ISSUE OF BONDS—REPEAL OF AID LAW.

1. The fact that there was no promise or obligation on the part of a railroad company receiving municipal aid to build a road contemplated by the aid is no objection to the validity of the bonds issued in pursuance of such aid, where the railroad in question has been actually built. Per Morrison, C. J.

2. Laws 1870 authorize counties to aid in the construction of railroads by the issue of county bonds, payable within twenty years," and provide that the board of supervision shall submit to the qualified electors of the county "the question whether such railroad aid shall be granted." An affirmative vote in pursuance of such statute authorized the board to issue such aid bonds upon such terms as might appear to them most advantageous to the county, the bonds to be delivered to the county at a specified rate for every mile of completed track. The termini were specified in the submission, but the road was built over a portion only of the distance between them. Held, that an issue of the bonds by the board in proportion to the amount of completed track was within their powers and valid. Myrick, McKee, and Thornton, JJ., dissenting.

3. In such case, the fact that all parties interested recognized the validity of the bonds, and raised no objection to the power of the board to issue them for a period of more than four years, was a circumstance to be taken into consideration in determining their validity. Per Sharpstein, Ross, and McKinstry, JJ.

4. The validity of railroad aid bonds issued after the repeal of the railroad aid enabling act of 1870, but under a contract entered into and partly performed prior to the repeal, was not affected thereby.

In bank.

Petition by the Nevada Bank of San Francisco for a writ of mandate to compel Charles Steinmitz, treasurer of the county of Santa Cruz, to pay the interest on certain railroad bonds. Writ granted.

McAllister & Bergin, for petitioner. William D. Storey and Joseph H. Skirm, for respondent.

MORRISON, C. J. By an act approved April 4, 1870, the legislature authorized the several counties of this state to aid (under certain conditions and qualifications) in the construction of railroads by the issue of county bonds payable within 20 years, and bearing interest not to exceed 7 per cent. per annum. The second section of the act provides that before the granting of such aid the board of supervisors of the county proposing to grant such aid shall submit to the qualified electors thereof the question whether such railroad aid shall be granted, and directs that a notice of the election as therein provided for shall be given. It further provides that no such aid shall be granted "unless a majority of the electors voting at such election shall cast their votes in favor of such aid." In pursuance of the provisions of the act referred to the board of supervisors of the county of Santa Cruz, at a regular meeting held on the 25th day of September, 1872, passed and duly entered in its minutes the following order: "Whereas, the board of supervisors of Santa Cruz county, state of California, propose that said county shall aid in the construction of a railroad of not less than a three-foot gauge, and beginning at or near the Pajaro depot, on the Southern Pacific Railroad, in the county of Monterey, and running thence in the most practicably direct route through the county of Santa Cruz, crossing the Pajaro river near Watsonville, and crossing the San Lorenzo river between the county road leading to Soquel and the bay of Monterey, and thence along or near the coast to the boundary of said county, near the southeast corner of the Point New Year's ranch, by the issue of county bonds, payable within twenty years, and bearing interest, payable semiannually, at the rate of seven (7) per cent. per annum, to the amount of six thousand dollars per mile, but not exceeding in the aggregate the sum of two hundred and forty thousand dollars, such aid to be in lieu of the aid of one hundred thousand dollars heretofore authorized to be granted in the construction of a railroad connecting the town of Santa Cruz with the Southern Pacific Railroad; and whereas, the Santa Cruz & Watsonville Railroad Company have agreed that the contract entered into by said company with the said county, dated January 18, 1872, and entered on the records of said board, in volume 3, page 184, and following, shall be deemed canceled in case the railroad aid herein proposed shall be granted: Now, therefore, it is ordered, and notice is hereby given, that at the next general election, to be held on the 5th day of November, 1872, there shall be submitted to the electors of Santa Cruz county the question whether the board of supervisors of Santa Cruz county, in lieu of the aid of one hundred thousand dollars, heretofore authorized to be granted in the construction of a railroad connecting the town of Santa Cruz with the Southern Pacific Railroad at or near the town of Watsonville, and upon the cancellation of the said contract of the said county with the Santa Cruz & Watsonville Railroad Company, shall be authorized to grant, upon terms which appear to them advantageous to the county, the aid of the county of Santa Cruz in the construction of a railroad of not less than a three-foot gauge, on the route hereinbefore described, to an amount of not exceeding in the aggregate the sum of two hundred and forty thousand dollars, in the bonds of Santa Cruz county, as proposed by said board, to be issued at the rate of not more than six thousand dollars per mile for every mile of main track actually constructed. All ballots cast in favor of said proposition shall contain the words, 'Railroad Aid, Yes;' all ballots cast against said proposition shall contain the words, 'Railroad Aid, No.' Said election shall be held in all the election precincts in said county, * * *"—which order was published for the period of thirty days in two newspapers printed and published in the county of Santa Cruz, in accordance with such notice. On the 5th day of November, 1872, a general election was held in the county of Santa Cruz, and at such election a majority of the electors voting cast their votes in favor of granting aid to the railroad mentioned in said order, and on the 11th day of that month the board of supervisors, after canvassing the votes, published and declared that a majority of the electors voting at such election cast their votes in favor of granting the railroad aid mentioned in said order, and thereupon caused the proper record thereof to be entered in the minute book of its proceedings. On the 15th day of June, 1873, the board of directors of the Santa Cruz Railroad Company (the same being a corporation duly organized and existing under the laws of this state) passed a resolution authorizing the president of the company to apply to the board of supervisors for aid in the construction of its road at the rate of $6,000 per mile in county bonds, and on the 4th day of August, 1873, the board of supervisors of the county of Santa Cruz and the Santa Cruz Railroad Company executed the following agreement: "This contract, made and entered into on the fourth day of August, A. D. 1873, by and between the county of Santa Cruz, in the state of California, acting by and through the board of supervisors of said county, as the party of the first part, and that certain corporation, organized, acting, and existing under and by virtue of the laws of said state, and known, designated, and called the 'Santa Cruz Railroad Company,' as the party of the second part, witnesseth, that the board of supervisors of said county having, by an order duly made on September 25, 1872, and recorded at large in volume 3, pages 236, 237, 238, of the minutes of the proceedings of said board, proposed that said county shall aid in the construction of a railroad of not less than a three-foot gauge, the route of which road is definitely described in said proceedings as beginning at or near the Pajaro depot on the Southern Pacific Railroad; thence running in the most practicably direct route through the counties of Monterey and Santa Cruz, crossing the Pajaro river near Watsonville, and crossing the San Lorenzo river between the county road leading to Soquel and the bay of Monterey; and thence along or near the coast to the boundary of said county near the southeast corner of the Point New Year's ranch,—by the issue of county bonds, payable within twenty years, and bearing interest, payable semiannually, at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, to the amount of six thousand dollars per mile, but not exceeding in the aggregate the sum of two hundred and forty thousand dollars; such aid to be in lieu of the aid of one hundred thousand dollars heretofore authorized to be granted in the construction of a railroad connecting the town of Santa Cruz with the Southern Pacific Railroad. And the board of supervisors of said county, under and in pursuance of an act of the legislature of said state, approved April 4, 1870, and entitled 'An act to empower the board of supervisors of the several counties of the state to aid in the construction of a railroad in their respective counties,' and of the act of April, 4, A. D. 1870, supplemental thereto, having at the election held in said county on the 5th day of November, A. D. 1872, of which election at least thirty days' notice was given by publication once a week in a newspaper printed and published in said county, which notice stated the day on which, and the places where, such election was to be held in said county, and the amount of bonds of said county to be issued for railroad aid, and definitely described the route of the railroad for which aid was proposed, submitted to the qualified electors of said county the question whether such railroad aid shall be granted by said county to aid in the construction of a railroad on the route hereinbefore described; and at such election a majority of the electors voting at such election having cast their votes in favor of such railroad aid, and the result of said election, after a full and fair canvass by said board, having been declared by said board to be in favor of granting such railroad aid, and the sum of two hundred and forty thousand dollars, authorized by the said votes as aforesaid to be granted in and to such railroad, being less than five per cent. of the value of the taxable property of said county, and no aid whatever to any railroad ever having been granted by said county; and a certain agreement, dated January 18, A. D. 1872, between said county and the board of supervisors thereof, and the Santa Cruz & Watsonville Railroad Company, having been fully and forever canceled and annulled, and said county released and discharged from all liability thereunder, and covenants therein; and the said party of the second part having been heretofore duly organized as a corporation under the laws of said state for constructing and maintaining a railroad on the entire route first hereinbefore mentioned and described, and proposing to construct on said route, first, the section of such railroad between a point at or near said Pajaro depot and a point on the westerly side of said San Lorenzo river, and within the corporate limits of the town of Santa Cruz, which point last referred to is hereafter to be located by said party of the second part; and said party of the second part having solicited the said board to grant the aid of said county in the construction of such railroad, and the terms offered by said party of the second part appearing to said board to be advantageous to said county, and it appearing that said county will be greatly benefited by the construction of such railroad, or any part thereof: Now, therefore, this contract witnesseth that in consideration of the premises and of the agreements herein named, to be done and performed by said party of the second part, the said party of the first part has agreed and hereby does agree with said party of the second part to issue, deliver, and donate unto said party of the second part, in aid of the construction of such railroad, bonds of the said county of Santa Cruz in amounts and at the times and upon the terms as herein stated. Said bonds, as herein provided, shall be payable in gold coin to said party of the second part and to the holders of such bonds within twenty years from the date of their issue at the office of the treasurer of said county, and shall bear interest in like coin at the rate of seven per cent. per annum, and the installments of interest shall be payable semiannually on the first Mondays of January and July of each year on coupons to be issued and delivered with such bonds, and each of such bonds shall be of the denomination of not less than one hundred dollars, nor more than one thousand dollars, signed by the chairman of said board and by the treasurer and clerk of said county, and under the seal of said county, the interest coupons to be signed by the treasurer and clerk of said county. Such bonds are to be prepared for signing in the following form, to wit: 'Number ——. State of California. ——— dollars. Bond of the county of Santa Cruz,'" etc. The contract further provides that when five miles of the road are completed, and a construction train has been run over the same, there shall be issued to the company bonds of the county to the amount of $30,000, and upon the construction of every mile of the track thereafter, and the passage of a construction train over the same, there shall be issued to the railroad company bonds of the county to the amount of $6,000. The contract then proceeds to provide for a notice to be given of the construction of the road as it progressed, for an examination and inspection of the same, for an acceptance thereof by the county, and for the issue of bonds as the road was built, at the rate of $6,000 per mile. There are numerous other clauses in the contract, which it is unnecessary to notice for the purposes of this opinion.

[1] This case, filed November 17, 1882, is now published by request, with others, in order that the Pacific Reporter may cover all cases in volume 64, California Reports.

It appears from the evidence in the case that the railroad company commenced work on the first section of its road, and prosecuted the work thereon with reasonable diligence until the same was completed from the city of Santa Cruz to the Pajaro depot; that the company built a bridge over and across the San Lorenzo river; that the road was constructed in the manner provided for, and in accordance with the contract; that a construction train was run over the road; that it was inspected by the board of supervisors; that it was duly accepted, and the board of supervisors, on the 9th day of December, 1874, ordered that $30,000 of the bonds of the county be issued to the company. It further appears that on or about the 11th day of December, 1874, a suit was commenced by one William H. Patterson in the district court of the twentieth judicial district against the board of supervisors of the county of Santa Cruz, praying for an injunction to restrain and enjoin the defendants from issuing to the railroad company any bonds on account of the construction of said road, and thereupon an injunction was issued in pursuance of the prayer of the complaint. The case of Patterson v. Supervisors was afterwards tried upon its merits, and on the 23d day of February, 1876, a decree was entered therein declaring that the proceedings of the board were legal and valid, that the issuance of the bonds should not be in any manner restrained or enjoined; and thereupon the injunction previously issued was dissolved. After the judgment of the twentieth district court, dissolving the injunction referred to above, —that is to say, on or about the 25th day of February, 1876,—the board of supervisors of Santa Cruz county issued and delivered to the Santa Cruz Railroad Company $30,000 of bonds, each of which was in the following form: "In pursuance of an act of the legislature of the state of California, entitled 'An act to empower the board of supervisors of the several counties of the state to aid in the construction of a railroad in their respective counties,' approved April 4, 1870, and of an act supplemental thereto, approved April 4, 1870, and in accordance with the terms of a contract entered into by the board of supervisors of said county on the 4th of August, 1873, with the Santa Cruz Railroad Company, which said contract is entered upon the minutes of the board of supervisors in volume 3, pages 279, 280, 281, 282, 283, 284, 285, 286, the county of Santa Cruz owes and will pay at the office of the county treasurer in the town of Santa Cruz, state of California, to the Santa Cruz Railroad Company, or the holder of this bond, within twenty years from the date of these presents, the sum of one thousand dollars in United States gold coin, with interest thereon at the rate of seven per cent. per annum in like gold coin, from the date hereof until paid; interest payable semiannually on the first Mondays of January and July of each year, on the surrender to said county treasurer of the coupon for said interest." The coupon attached to each of the bonds is in the following form: "Coupon No. 41. On the 23d day of February, A. D. 1896, the county of Santa Cruz will pay to the Santa Cruz Railroad Company, or bearer, at the county treasurer's office, ten and twenty-one one-hundredths dollars in United States gold coin, interest due on bond No. 1."

On the 20th day of March, 1875, and at divers times between that date and the 15th day of November of that year, the Santa Cruz Railroad Company presented and filed with the board of supervisors written notices and communications informing them of the completion of 14 additional miles of the road, and thereupon proceedings were regularly taken by the board to inspect and examine the same, and after such examination and inspection the following order was passed: "It is therefore ordered by the board of supervisors of the county of Santa Cruz that there be issued and delivered to the Santa Cruz Railroad Company bonds of said county of Santa Cruz to the amount of eighty-four thousand dollars, in sums of one thousand dollars each, payable within twenty years of their date, in United States gold coin, and bearing interest in like coin at the rate of seven per cent. per annum from their date, and interest payable semiannually on the first Mondays of January and July of each year, in pursuance of the terms of said contract between the county of Santa Cruz and the Santa Cruz Railroad Company, and that said bonds be signed by the chairman of this board and by the county treasurer and county clerk, and under the seal of said county, and the interest coupons to be signed by said treasurer and said clerk. It is further ordered that each of the bonds issued to the said railroad company under said contract shall be of the denomination of one thousand dollars." In pursuance of the above order, bonds were issued to the Santa Cruz Railroad Company to the amount of $84,000. These bonds were in form similar to the bonds for $30,000 previously issued to the railroad company. All of these bonds were, within three months from the issuance thereof, sold and disposed of by the railroad company, and on the 2d day of August, 1879, they were purchased and paid for by the plaintiff, the Nevada Bank of San Francisco, in the ordinary course of business, at the rate of 95 cents on the dollar, and were purchased under the belief that the same were legal and valid. On the 3d day of January, 1881, the coupons on the bonds which fell due on the 1st of that month were presented to the defendant, the treasurer of the county of Santa Cruz, and payment thereof was demanded, which was refused by the defendant, although he at that time had sufficient funds on hand, specially provided by law for that purpose, to pay said coupons; and this is an application to the court for a peremptory writ of mandamus to compel the defendant, as treasurer of said county, to pay such coupons. There are other facts presented by the pleadings and report of the referee to whom this case was referred for the purpose of taking and reporting the facts therein, but we deem it unnecessary to consider them.

The question presented for our decision is simply this: Are the bonds in the hands of the plaintiff, claiming the same as a bona fide purchaser for value, valid and binding upon the county of Santa Cruz? The act of April 4, 1870, as appears from its title, as well as from its clearly expressed object, was intended to "empower the board of supervisors of the several counties of the state to aid in the construction of a railroad in their respective counties," and the only restrictions imposed upon the board were that the bonds to be issued for such aid should not exceed 5 per cent. of the value of the taxable property of the county; and further, that the question of granting such aid should be submitted to the qualified electors of the county in pursuance of section 2 of the act. The question of granting such aid was submitted to the voters of the county of Santa Cruz, and the proposition was for a road "beginning at or near Pajaro depot on the Southern Pacific Railroad in the county of Monterey, and running thence in the most practicably direct route through the county of Santa Cruz, crossing the Pajaro river near Watsonville, between the county road leading to Soquel and the bay of Monterey, and thence running along or near the coast to the boundary of said county, near the southeast corner of Point New Year's ranch;" and the order was: "Now, therefore, it is ordered and notice is hereby given that at the next general election to be held," etc., "there shall be submitted to the people the question whether the board of supervisors shall be authorized to grant, upon terms which may appear to them to be advantageous to the county, the aid of the county of Santa Cruz, as follows: When five miles of said first section of said railroad shall have been constructed, and a construction train run over the same, there shall be issued and delivered to said party of the second part, by the said party of the first part, bonds of said county to the amount of thirty thousand dollars; and upon the construction of every mile of track thereafter of such railroad, and the passage of a construction train over the same, there shall be issued and delivered, as last aforesaid, to the said party of the second part, bonds of said county to the amount of six thousand dollars; and so on until the construction of said railroad is completed;" and it was provided in the proposition submitted to and adopted by the vote of the people that bonds should be issued at the rate of not more than $6,000 for every mile of main track actually constructed.

It is claimed on behalf of defendant—First, that the contract was a unilateral one, and therefore not binding upon the county; second, that the board of supervisors had no power to enter into a contract for the construction of a railroad which did not extend over the entire route from Pajaro depot on the south to Point New Year's ranch on the north; and, third, that the act of 1870 was repealed before the bonds were issued

If the contract did not contain any stipulation on the part of the railroad company to build the road, or to do any other act, we can see no good reason why the party of the first part should not be bound by its promise or agreement, provided the railroad company, acting upon such promise or agreement, proceeded to construct the road in accordance with the conditions set forth in the contract. It may be that the county could have withdrawn its promise of aid at any time before work was done on the faith of the promise; but after the work was done, and the contract was executed, the county could not escape from its liability on the ground that the company did not in the first instance obligate itself to construct the road. If A. promise B. to pay him a stipulated sum for a certain service, and B. renders the service without any contemporaneous promise to do so, can it be doubted that A. will be bound by his promise? The following authorities are referred to in support of the point that the contract was binding on the county after performance by the company even if it was unilateral. Barnes v. Perine, 9 Barb. 211; Robertson v. March, 3 Scam. 198; Chit.

Cont. 64; Train v. Gold, 5 Pick. 379; White v. Baxter, 71 N. Y. 254. But is it true that the railroad company did not agree or promise to do anything on its part? The contract contains the following agreement or promise by the company: "And the said party of the second part [the company] has agreed and hereby does agree to and with the said party of the first part to build, construct, and finish such last-named bridge [across the San Lorenzo river] and to lay the track of said railroad from the easterly bank of said last-named river to a point on the westerly side thereof within three hundred feet of said bay in three months after said bonds of said county to the amount of ninety thousand dollars shall have been issued and delivered to said party of the second part." There is also a clause in the contract to the effect that the aid is granted in lieu of a former aid of $100,000, which is surrendered and canceled by the express terms of the contract. Here we find a sufficient consideration, if any were necessary, for the promise on the part of the county.

The second point made on behalf of the defendant involves an attack upon the contract, on the ground that the board of supervisors had no power to make it, because it did not provide for and the Santa Cruz Railroad Company was not bound under it to construct the road along the entire route. In this connection it is proper to notice the fact that the act of April 4, 1870, does not provide for a contract between the county and the railroad company, but simply empowers the county to aid in the construction of railroads upon certain terms. The aid authorized by the law and intended by the parties was to be granted as the work progressed, in order to assist and enable the company to pay for the work and construct the road, and it never was contemplated that the entire work should be completed and paid for by the company before the bonds should be issued. Kenicott v. Supervisors, 16 Wall. 466. This would not be aiding the company in the construction of the road, but would simply be reimbursing the company, in whole or in part, its money expended in building the road. This view is fortified by the proposition submitted to the electors, which was that the county should aid the railroad company in the construction of its road by issuing and delivering to it bonds "at the rate of not more than six thousand dollars per mile for every mile of main track actually constructed." The bonds should have been issued for every mile when constructed, (after the completion of the first five miles,) and it is fair to presume that they would have been so issued if the board had not been enjoined by the order of the twentieth district court. The Bank of Nevada purchased the bonds for value, without notice of any infirmity in them, and the only question is one of power in the board to issue them. Cromwell v. County of Sac, 96 U. S. 51; 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 515, and authorities there cited. "If the board did not have the power to issue the bonds there could be no such thing as a bona fide holder of them, as any purchaser would be held to have notice of the fact, where there was a total want of authority." Township of East Oakland v. Skinner, 94 U. S. 258. "The following doctrines are too well settled to be any longer open to question: A bona fide purchaser of negotiable paper for value before maturity takes it freed from all infirmities in its origin, unless it is absolutely void for want of power in the maker to issue it, or its circulation is by law prohibited. Municipal bonds, payable to bearer, are subject to the same rules as other negotiable paper." 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 113, and authorities there cited. Speaking further on this subject, the same author says: "The supreme court of the United States has upheld the rights of the holders of municipal securities with a strong hand, and has set a face of flint against repudiation." Id. § 518. "It [the supreme court of the United States] has adopted, when necessary to protect the bona fide holders of such securities, liberal construction of statutes and charters authorizing the creation of such debts. Against such holders it has given no favor to defenses based upon mere irregularities in the issue of the bonds or noncompliance with preliminary requirements, not going to the question of power to issue them." Id. § 515.

It is claimed in the case now under consideration that there was a want of power on the part of the board of supervisors to make any contract or to issue any bonds for a portion of the road, and that is the only ground upon which the question of power can arise. There is no charge of fraud or unfair dealing on the part of the board, and the most that can be said against its action is that it provided, in the first place, for the construction of that section of the road lying between the city of Santa Cruz and the Pajaro depot. In this we can perceive no just cause of objection or complaint, for that was the most important section of the road; and its completion brought a large portion of the county of Santa Cruz into direct communication with the Southern Pacific road, and thereby opened a lengthy line of travel north and south with other portions of the state. It does not appear that there was not an intention on the part of the board of supervisors to extend the road in a northerly direction from Santa Cruz to its northerly terminus, and, after appropriating one half of the $240,000 of the bonds to the first section of the road,—about one half of the entire route,—there remained to be issued a corresponding amount of bonds to aid in the construction of the other half of the railroad. It remains only for us to say that in our opinion the bonds were not issued without power, that they were valid when issued, and are good and binding upon the county in the hands of the plaintiff.

There is but one other question to be determined, and that relates to the effect of the act of January 14, 1874, repealing the act of April 4, 1870. This question has been passed upon in several cases. It is found in the report of the referee that the Santa Cruz Railroad Company commenced work on its road, under the contract between it and the county, on the 25th day of October, 1873, and prosecuted the same with reasonable diligence; but the repealing act was not passed until January 14, 1874. In view of the facts of this case the validity of the bonds was not affected by the repeal of the act of April 4, 1870. Town of Concord v. Savings Bank, 92 U. S. 630; Steamship Co. v. Joliffe, 2 Wall. 450; Montgomery v. Kasson, 16 Cal. 189. Let the writ issue.

Sharpstein, J., (specially concurring.) The only objection to the validity of the bonds which seems to us to merit any serious consideration is that, after a majority of the electors voting upon the proposition to issue bonds to aid in the construction of a railroad upon a certain specified route between two certain specified points had voted in favor of granting such aid, the board of supervisors entered into an agreement whereby said board agreed to issue bonds to the amount of $6,000 per mile for the construction of a railroad on said route for a distance less than the entire distance between the termini mentioned in the proposition submitted to said electors. And that objection is founded upon the hypothesis that it was the understanding of the electors who voted upon the proposition that in consideration of the aid granted the entire road should be constructed. There is but one way in which we can arrive at the intention of the electors who voted upon the proposition to grant aid, and that is by an inspection of the proposition itself. The proposition voted upon, as stated in the notice of the election, was substantially as follows: That the board of supervisors should be authorized to grant, (in lieu of the aid of $100,000, previously authorized to be granted in the construction of a railroad connecting the town of Santa Cruz with the Southern Pacific Railroad,) upon terms which might appear to said board advantageous to said county, the aid of said county "in the construction of a railroad on the route" described as "beginning at or near the Pajaro depot, on the Southern Pacific Railroad, in the county of Monterey, and running thence in the most practicably direct route through the county of Santa Cruz, crossing the Pajaro river near Watsonville, and crossing the San Lorenzo river between the county road leading to Soquel and the Bay of Monterey, and thence along or near the coast of the boundary of said county near the southeast corner of the Point New Year's ranch, * * * to an amount of not exceeding in the aggregate the sum of two hundred and forty thousand dollars, in the bonds of Santa Cruz county, as proposed by said board, to be issued at the rate of not more than six thousand dollars per mile for every mile of main track actually constructed." The vote was in favor of aiding in the construction of a railroad on a route "beginning at or near Pajaro depot, and ending at the boundary of said county, near the southeast corner of the Point New Year's ranch." And the board of supervisors was authorized "to grant, upon terms which to them" might "appear advantageous to the county," the aid of the county in the construction of a railroad on that route, in the bonds of the county, "to be issued at the rate of not more than six thousand dollars per mile for every mile of main track actually constructed," until the aggregate of the bonds so issued should amount to $240,000.

Now, it is not claimed that so much of the road as has been actually constructed was not constructed on the route designated in the proposition which was submitted to the electors of the county. But it is claimed that the board of supervisors was not authorized to agree to issue bonds at the rate of $6,000 per mile for any number of miles less than the whole number between the terminal points of the route. The board, however, was expressly authorized to grant said aid upon terms which might appear to it to be advantageous to the county; and if it appeared to it to be advantageous to the county to aid in the construction of 19 miles and no more of the road constructed on the route designated, it is not the province of this court to review the decision of the board upon that question. We are bound to assume that it appeared to the board to be advantageous to the county to have no more than 19 miles of that road constructed, at an expense of $6,000 per mile to the county, until we are convinced that it appeared otherwise to said board. The board was not bound to issue bonds at the rate of $6,000 per mile for every mile of railroad which might be constructed between terminal points mentioned in the proposition to grant aid. But it was authorized to issue them at the rate of $6,000 per mile for every mile of main track actually constructed. And whether it issued them at the rate of $6,000 per mile for a part of the distance or for the entire distance, it was issuing them in aid of the construction of a railroad on the route designated in the proposition upon which the electors had voted. By aiding in the construction of 19 miles of railroad on the route designated the county was aiding pro tanto in the construction of it from one to the other of the terminal points mentioned in said proposition. If it was the intention of the electors voting upon the proposition to grant the aid of the county in the construction of a railroad upon the route specified, that said aid should not be granted except upon the condition that a railroad should be constructed the entire length of the route, it must be admitted, we think, that they have failed to express that intention; and if they have it is no part of the duty of this court to supply the omission. It is our duty to construe the contract which the parties have made, not to make one for them.

The construction which we have put upon the vote of a majority of the electors who voted upon the proposition to issue bonds in aid of the construction of said railroad is in accord with that which the board of supervisors practically put upon that vote; and the people of said county acquiesced in that construction for a considerable period of time by offering no resistance to the issuing of the bonds, and by paying the interest upon them semiannually for a period of more than four years, three of which preceded the purchase of said bonds by the petitioner herein. It is not necessary to invoke the doctrine of "municipal decision" or of estoppel, of which it is one of the forms, to the extent that it has been applied by the supreme court of the United States to cases involving the validity of municipal bonds, in order to sustain the validity of these bonds. In a late treatise on public securities the author says: "It has often happened in the cases which have come before the supreme court of the United States that the municipalities which sought to evade the force of the bonds issued on their behalf had received the proceeds of the bonds, enjoyed the benefits of the improvements made by them, paid the interest for many years; and these circumstances, as well as the doctrine of municipal decision, have influenced the court in their determinations." And then adds: "It is not, however, against these decisions, when these different elements are combined, that we make our protest." Burroughs, Pub. Sec. p. 341. In addition to those enumerated in the above extract there is in this case another very important element, and that is that it was made a condition precedent to the issuing of any bonds to aid in the construction of said railroad that a certain contract by which said county had agreed with the Santa Cruz & Watsonville Railroad Company to aid it to the extent of $100,000 "in the construction of a railroad connecting the town of Santa Cruz with the Southern Pacific Railroad at or near the town of Watsonville" should be canceled, and it appears by a recital in the agreement between the board of supervisors and the Santa Cruz Railroad Company that said contract with the Santa Cruz & Watsonville Railroad Company was "fully and forever canceled and annulled, and said county released and discharged from all liability thereunder and covenants therein." That liability amounted to within $14,000 of the whole amount of the bonds held by the petitioner. And it is not even suggested that the liability so canceled can be restored, so as to place the parties in the same conditon that they were in prior to its cancellation. Does not that present a case for the application of the principle of estoppel? If that principle can be applied to a municipality, it is difficult to conceive of a case to which it could be applied more properly than to the one at bar. Here a majority of the electors voted in favor of a proposition which will at least admit of the construction which all of the parties interested in it practically put upon it for a period of four or five years by issuing the bonds and paying interest thereon, and now, after said bonds, which are negotiable, have passed through several hands, this court is asked to hold that such construction was erroneous, and that the petitioner, who paid their full market value, should have made that discovery before purchasing them, although it does not appear that any taxpayer, supervisor, treasurer, or legal adviser of the county made it until some time afterwards. That which it is now claimed constituted a condition precedent to the power to issue the bonds is certainly not clearly expressed in the proposition submitted to the electors, and for which a majority of them voted; and it seems to us inexplicable that, if such a condition had been supposed to exist, the board of supervisors should have been permitted to issue the bonds in utter disregard of it, when any taxpayer, in behalf of himself and all other taxpayers of the county, could have intervened and prevented the issue of them. And it is still more inexplicable to us that under such circumstances the interest on the bonds should have been paid for a period of four or five years without a word of protest from any taxpayer, so far as we are advised. "They had an opportunity, before innocent third persons could be injured or committed to the acts of their public agents, to enjoin their proceedings and protect themselves. They did not seek that protection; but now, when they have received all the fruits of the contracts of their agents from third persons who have acted upon their recognition of the authority of their agents, they ask the privilege of denying this recognition, and thus escape from their obligations. It is too late for them to do so as against innocent third persons. They are concluded not simply by the acts of their public agents, but by their own." State v. Van Horne, 7 Ohio St. 327. If the construction of the power conferred upon the board of supervisors for which the respondent contends was clearly the correct one, we might be compelled to hold that the petitioner was chargeable with notice of the want of authority in the board of supervisors to enter into the agreement which they entered into with the railroad company. But it is by no means clear that that construction is the correct one, and it is clear that during a period of four or five years all parties interested acted as if it was not the correct one, and we think that in a case like this that circumstance is entitled to great weight.

McKinstry, J., concurred.

Ross, J., (specially concurring.) I concur upon the second ground discussed in the opinion of Mr. Justice Sharpstein, and for the reasons by him given.

Myrick, J., (dissenting.) Under the act of April 4, 1870, (St. 1869-70, p. 746,) a vote was had authorizing the granting of aid, and a contract had been made between the board of supervisors of Santa Cruz and the Santa Cruz & Watsonville Railroad Company, by which aid to the amount of $100,000 was granted to that company to assist in the construction of a railroad from the town of Watsonville to the town of Santa Cruz. For some reason the work did not progress. On the 25th of September, 1872, the board of supervisors made an order for an election to be held upon the proposition of granting aid for the construction of a railroad from a point on the line of the Southern Pacific Railroad at or near the Pajaro depot, thence through the county of Santa Cruz to the northern line of the county near Point New Year's ranch; said aid to be $6,000 per mile, and not exceeding the aggregate of $240,000, interest-bearing bonds of the county to be issued therefor; said aid to be in lieu of the aid of $100,000 theretofore authorized to be granted. In pursuance of this order an election was held, and the result was in favor of the proposition. Thereafter, on the 15th of June, 1873, the Santa Cruz Railroad Company made its application for aid. On the 18th of June, 1873, the articles of incorporation of the Santa Cruz Railroad Company were filed, such incorporation being for the purpose of constructing, conducting, and maintaining an iron railroad within the counties of Monterey and Santa Cruz, commencing at a point at or near Pajaro station, on the Southern Pacific Railroad, in the county of Monterey, and running thence to and through the county of Santa Cruz to the northern boundary of Santa Cruz county at or near the south boundary of the Rancho Puntadel Ano Nuevo, (Point New Year's ranch,) the estimated length of said railroad being 40 miles. On the 4th of August, 1873, the board of supervisors received from the Santa Cruz & Watsonville Railroad Company a release of the $1,000 aid, and on the same day executed a contract with the Santa Cruz Railroad Company, in which was recited the before-mentioned proposition for aid in the construction of a railroad beginning at or near the Pajaro depot, and thence running in the most practicable direct route through the counties of Monterey and Santa Cruz to the boundary of Santa Cruz county near the southeast corner of the Point New Year's ranch, by the issuance of bonds, the same to be in lieu of the $100,000 before authorized; the submission of the proposition to the voters of the county; the election and the vote in favor of the aid; the release of the $100,000 aid; the incorporation of the Santa Cruz Railroad Company for the purpose of constructing and maintaining a railroad on the entire route; and the solicitation of the company for aid in the construction of such railroad. The contract then proceeded to declare that the county would be greatly benefited by the construction of said railroad, or any part thereof, and provided for the issuance of bonds at the rate of $6,000 per mile as the road should be completed in sections specified; but provided that the western terminus of the work to be done thereunder should be at a point within the corporate limits of the town of Santa Cruz. The company was authorized to commence its work at a point near the town of Santa Cruz and prosecute the same easterly to Pajaro station. It should be noticed that the town of Santa Cruz is about midway between the two ends of the road, as stated in the proposition submitted to the voters. No provision was made in this contract for the construction of a road beyond Santa Cruz, nor was any reference made thereto, except by the recitals above stated; on the contrary, it is perfectly evident from the contract that the board of supervisors on the one hand, and the railroad company on the other, intended that the same should apply only to that portion of the route between Pajaro and Santa Cruz. The work of construction so progressed that on the 7th of December, 1874, the board of supervisors made an order for the issuance of bonds to the amount of $30,000. At this point one Patterson brought a suit against the board of supervisors for the purpose of restraining the issuance of the bonds, and such proceedings were had that on the 23d of February, 1875, judgment of nonsuit was entered upon the ground that the plaintiff had failed to prove a sufficient case. Thereafter, in 1876, the road having been constructed from Pajaro to Santa Cruz, bonds were issued to the Santa Cruz Railroad Company,—$30,000 on the 25th of February, and $84,000 on the 11th of March. The bonds on their face refer to the act of 1870, and recite that they are issued "in accordance with the terms of a contract entered into by the board of supervisors of said county on the 4th day of August, 1873, with the Santa Cruz Railroad Company, which said contract is entered upon the minutes of the board of supervisors in volume 3, pp. 279, 280, 281, 282, 283, 284, 285, 286." On the 7th of August, 1879, the plaintiff purchased the bonds through a broker, having no knowledge of the then holder, paying therefor 95 per cent. of the par value. No road has been constructed over any part of the projected route between the town of Santa Cruz and the northern boundary line of the county, nor has such construction been or attempted to be provided for.

This proceeding is a petition for a writ of mandate requiring the respondent, as county treasurer, to pay the coupons on the bonds held by petitioner. The petitioner claims as well that the bonds were properly issued, and are a legal charge upon the county, as that, it being a bona fide holder for value, payment cannot be disputed. In our opinion, the question of the rights of bona fide holders of bonds does not arise and is not for consideration in this case. The bonds on their face refer to the statute authorizing the granting of county aid, and to the contract between the board of supervisors and the railroad company. Therefore the bonds are as though the statute and the contract were written, word for word, therein. The statute authorized the granting of county aid. The election was held thereunder, and the matter submitted was, shall aid be granted for the construction of a railroad from Pajaro to the northern line of the county? Upon that question, and that question only, the people voted to grant the aid. For that purpose, and that purpose only, the board of supervisors were authorized to issue bonds. There was no vote upon the granting of aid for any less distance. The contract was for "one section" only,—from Pajaro to Santa Cruz,—about one half the entire distance voted upon. It cannot be pretended that it is or has been the intention of the railroad company to complete the road. It is manifest that it was the intention of the parties who conducted the transaction on the part of the board of supervisors and the railroad company to take advantage of a vote which had been had for granting aid for the construction of the road for the whole distance, construct the road for only half of the distance, obtain the issuance of bonds for that half at the rate of $6,000 per mile, ($120,000 for the 20 miles, that probably being the only profitable part to build or operate,) and then omit to proceed with the further construction. The contract, which, by being referred to, is a part of each and every bond, refers also to the vote of the people in favor of aid for the road the entire distance, and then, after so referring, assumes to authorize the railroad company to construct but the part, the track-laying to commence at Santa Cruz and extend to Pajaro. No word is written or act provided for having in view any other or further construction. Such transactions are not fair dealing; and of such, in this case, holders of the bonds are bound to take notice. It is a question of power. The board of supervisors had no power to issue bonds to aid in the construction of any quantity or distance of road less than the whole. It acted under a limited and special power of attorney. Possibly bonds might have been issued for miles as the work progressed, but the holders of such bonds would be under the burden of providing for or requiring the entire construction.

The supreme court of the United States in Township of East Oakland v. Skinner, 94 U. S. 255, says: "We have held that there can be no bona fide holding where the statute did not in law authorize the issue of the bonds. The objection in such case goes to the point of power. There is an entire want of jurisdiction over the subject. It is not the case of an informality, an irregularity, fraud, or excess of authority in an authorized agent. Where there is a total want of authority to issue the bonds, there can be no such thing as a bona fide holding." As was said above, although there was power to issue bonds in a certain case, viz., for the construction of the entire distance, yet there was no power to issue in aid of the construction of a less distance. That it was the intent of the railroad company to build, and of the board of supervisors to have built, a part only, is clearly manifest from the proceedings. The board declared, (see contract between the board and the railroad company:) "It appearing that said county will be greatly benefited by the construction of said railroad or any part thereof." The board had not power to declare any benefit from a part. The people had by their votes declared the extent of the line of the road, and the board had no more power to diminish its length than to increase the amount of aid. The intent to avoid compliance with the law is apparent upon the face of the documents referred to in the bonds, and the purchaser was bound to take notice. The bonds were not, like a bill of exchange or promissory note, "a courier without luggage," but these transactions were tied to them, and could not be shaken off. The supreme court of the United States, in School Dist. v. Insurance Co., 103 U. S. 710, said: "As the bonds recite that they were issued under this act, [an act which the court held not to give authority for issuing the bonds in question,] and that the vote was taken under it, we cannot see that power, purposed to be exercised under other and very different circumstances, can be invoked to give validity to an act which is void by the authority under which it professed to be acting." It has been repeatedly urged that the holders of bonds have innocently invested their money, and should, as innocent holders of public securities, be protected. They are not, however, the only persons to be considered. Taxpayers are equally innocent. Taxpayers are not to be subjected to extraordinary burdens, or even ordinary burdens, except by law. To this case may be applied the language used by Justice FIELD, concurred in by Chief Justice WAITE and Justices GRIER and MILLER, in dissenting from the judgment of the court in Rogers v. Burlington, 3 Wall. 668: "In all such cases the mode becomes the measure of the power. * * * This is not a case where the doctrine of estoppel has any application. It is not a case where the purchaser of the bonds was misled by any recitals of conformity to law. Here the statute and the ordinance of the city of Burlington, under which authority to issue the bonds was assumed to exist, are both printed in full in the indorsements upon the bonds; and the ordinance is also referred to on their face. But if this were not so, the case would not be changed, as the statute did not authorize the issue of the bonds. No formality of execution and no extent of recitals could give validity to instruments thus issued." There are even stronger objections against the validity of the bonds involved in the case at bar than those considered in the case above referred to. The length of time which elapsed after the making of the contract and the issuance of the bonds before the purchase of petitioner may not be a controlling consideration, but it is certainly significant in one respect. The contract was made August 4, 1873, and the bonds were issued in February and March, 1876. The petitioner did not purchase until about three years and a half thereafter, to wit, August 7, 1879. During all that period no step had been taken by the railroad company or the board of supervisors for carrying out the will of the people as expressed in granting the aid. The petitioner is not in a position to say it was not fully advised of all the proceedings. While it had the proposed purchase of the bonds under consideration, it caused to be examined the act of April 4, 1870, the popular vote upon the question of extending the aid, the contract between the board of supervisors and the Santa Cruz Railroad Company, and it had the bonds before it. It also caused to be examined an action then pending by the railroad company against the board of supervisors for the further issuance of bonds, which action was being resisted upon the ground, among others, that no vote had been had for the granting of aid for any less distance than the whole. The writ should be denied.

SAMSON v. SAMSON, (DAVIS, Intervener.)[1]

LIMITATIONS—DISABILITIES — INFANCY —CONTESTING PROBATE—EFFECT OF DECREE.

A decree setting aside the probate of a will, at the suit of an heir arrived at full age, will not inure to the benefit of other heirs, who permit the time allowed them, after removal of their disabilities, for objection to such probate to pass without instituting a contest thereof.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Fannie Reis Samson against Fannie M. Samson to set aside the probate of a will. Jacob Z. Davis intervenes, claiming an interest in the estate involved by virtue of a judgment against defendant. From a judgment for plaintiff, intervener appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Mastick, Belcher & Mastick, for appellant. P. B. Ladd, S. Heydenfeldt, and Wilson & Otis, for respondent.

Ross, J. This is an appeal from a judgment made and entered November 26, 1880, revoking the probate of a will which had been admitted to probate in the year 1870. The revocation was had upon proceedings initiated on the 26th of July, 1880, by and on behalf of a minor child of the deceased, under and by virtue of that provision of the statute which saves to infants and persons of unsound mind a period of one year after their respective disabilities are removed within which to contest the validity of a will. The deceased left surviving him a widow and four minor children. Shortly after his death the widow presented to the proper probate court a document purporting to be the last will and testament of the deceased, together with a petition praying its admission to probate. An order was duly made by the court, fixing a day for hearing the petition and proving the will, and directing notice to be given and the proper citations to be issued and served. Citations were duly issued and served upon the minor children, and the court appointed an attorney to represent them at the hearing. At the time appointed proof was taken, and, with the consent of the attorney for the minor heirs, the court admitted the document to probate as the last will and testament of the deceased, and appointed the widow executrix, she being named in the will as executrix and sole devisee, the children being by name expressly excluded from any share in the estate. Letters testamentary were afterwards issued to the widow, the estate administered, and finally, in 1875, about five years after the administration was begun, a final decree of distribution was entered by which all of the property of the estate remaining undisposed of was distributed to the widow, and the administration was then brought to a close. No further step was taken in the matter of the estate until July 26, 1880, when one of the children, then 17 years of age, filed a petition in the court of probate for the revocation of the will upon the ground that at the time of the execution of the instrument the deceased was non compos mentis, and therefore incompetent to make a will. It is said for the appellant that the order made by the probate court in 1870, admitting the document to probate as the last will and testament of the deceased, is a conclusive determination of its validity, since all of the heirs and parties in interest were then before the court, and the court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter. It is not necessary to determine how this would be if it appeared that at that time a contest was made on behalf of the heirs, to which the provisions of the statute in relation to new trials and appeals would have applied, for it does not appear that any contest arose until the filing of the petition on behalf of Fannie Reis Samson on the 26th of July, 1880, which was within the time allowed her by section 1333 of the statute for that purpose. Meanwhile, however, the other heirs had permitted one year after the removal of their respective disabilities to pass without instituting any contest; and the point is made that as to them, at least, the decree of probate is conclusive. The position, we think, must be sustained. We see no difficulty in avoiding the probate so far as the interests of the contesting heir are concerned, and permitting it to stand so far as concerns the heirs who have lost their rights by lapse of time. It must be remembered that, as the probate court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the parties, its order admitting the document to probate is not void, but voidable merely. In this connection we quote the language of the surrogate in Bailey v. Stewart, 2 Redf. Sur. 227: "It is quite clear to my mind, where a petition shows a case conferring jurisdiction, the surrogate has authority to act in the premises, and it is not true to say that the subsequent discovery of persons who were entitled to an interest in the estate as heirs would render the decree void. Such a state of facts would only render the decree inoperative as to the person so discovered to be entitled. Suppose, as an illustration, that a testator should die, leaving, as is supposed, but three children, and upon that assumption the will should be probated, and many years thereafter it should turn out that a fourth child, supposed to be dead, was living, can it be seriously pretended that such a discovery would render a probate void? If so, most disastrous consequences might result to the estate and to those who had become possessed of it. The most that could be said in such a case would be that the probate might be avoided so far as the interests of the heir not cited are concerned, and that the probate for that purpose would be set aside, if at all, on appeal to the discretion of the surrogate." Cause remanded, with directions to the court below to modify the judgment in accordance with the views expressed in this opinion.

Thompson v. Samson et al.[1]

Infants — Removal of Disabilities — Invalid Probate of Will—Rights of Purchaser.

Where probate of a will is had, and the estate is distributed afterwards under the will, an heir who, after removal of his or her disabilities, obtains a decree vacating the probate, cannot follow the property devised in the hands of a bona fide purchaser for value from the distributee. Action by John D. Thompson against Fannie M. Samson and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

P. D. Ladd, S. Heydenfeldt, and Wilson & Otis, for appellants. Mastick, Belcher & Mastick, for respondent.

Ross, J. Antonio B. Samson died on the 28th of July, 1870, leaving surviving him a widow and four minor children. Shortly after his death the widow presented to the proper probate court a document purporting to be the last will and testament of the deceased, together with a petition praying its admission to probate. An order was duly made by the court fixing a day for hearing the petition and proving the will, and directing notice to be given and the proper citations to be issued and served. Citations were duly issued and served upon the minor children, and the court appointed an attorney to represent them at the hearing. At the time appointed proof was taken, and upon the proof taken, and with the consent of the attorney for the minor heirs, the court admitted the document to probate as the last will and testament of the deceased, and appointed the widow executrix; she being named in the will as executrix and sole devisee, and the children being by name expressly excluded from any share in the estate. Letters testamentary were afterwards issued to the widow, the estate administered, and finally, in 1875, about five years after the administration was begun, a final decree of distribution was entered, by which all of the property of the estate remaining undisposed of, including the real property here in controversy, was distributed to the widow; and the administration was then brought to a close. Subsequent to this the widow borrowed of Thompson, the plaintiff in the present action, $16,000, and to secure its repayment mortgaged the property to him. The mortgage was foreclosed, the property sold pursuant to a decree of foreclosure and sale, Thompson bought it, and in due time received from the sheriff a deed conveying to him all of the interest of the mortgagor therein. The regularity of the probate proceedings and of the proceedings in the foreclosure suit are not questioned, but it appears that during the pendency of the foreclosure suit, that is to say, in the year 1880, one of the children of the deceased, Samson, who was then a minor, by a guardian duly appointed, filed in the probate court a petition praying the revocation of the document which ten years before had been adjudged to be the last will and testament of the deceased, upon which petition, after proceedings regularly had, the probate court found that the deceased was non compos mentis at the time of making the alleged will, and therefore, on the 26th day of November, 1880, entered a decree annulling the order made in 1870 admitting the document to probate, and adjudging that the same was not the last will and testament of the deceased Samson. In the case entitled Samson v. Samson, 30 Pac. Rep. 979, (No. 7,577, just decided,) we have held that the decree thus rendered in 1880 must be modified so as to be limited to the protection of the rights of the contesting minor, and cannot be permitted to extend to the heirs who slept upon their rights and became barred by the lapse of the statutory time allowed them for such contest. But the question in the present case is, what is the effect of the revocation upon the rights of a purchaser from the distributee of the estate?

On the part of the heirs it is contended that, when the probate of the will was revoked, and it was determined that the document purporting to be a will was in fact not a will, every step in the probate proceedings, from the admission of the document to probate to and including the final distribution of the estate, became absolutely void and of no effect, and that any and all conveyances made by the distributee of the estate became likewise of no effect. The result of sustaining this proposition is, of course, to hold that no purchaser at an executor's sale, and no purchaser from any heir, legatee, or devisee, made even after final distribution, can ever be secure in his purchase until the expiration of one year after every infant and person of unsound mind who may be interested in the estate shall have been relieved of their respective disabilities. If this is the law, of course we must so declare it, however disastrous the consequences may be. But is it the law? It is true that there is a provision of the statute saving to infants and persons of unsound mind, one year after their respective disabilities are removed, within which to contest the probate of a will. But the statute also makes provision for the presentation to the proper probate court of a petition for the probate of a document purporting to be the will of a deceased person, for a hearing of the petition after due notice, the establishment of the will by proper proof, its admission to probate, and thereafter for the proper administration of the estate, and its final distribution to the person or persons entitled thereto; the statute declaring the decree of distribution to be "conclusive as to the rights of heirs, legatees, or devisees, subject only to be reversed, set aside, or modified on appeal." Section 1666, Code Civil Proc. These various provisions of the statute must be construed together, and effect given them in accordance with legal principles. The fundamental error on the part of appellant's counsel is in not keeping in mind the distinction between proceedings that are void and those that are voidable merely. If administration should be had upon the estate of a man supposed to be dead, but who is in fact alive, the entire proceedings would be utterly null and void, in however strict compliance they might be with the statutory requirements; and this, because of the absence of the necessary subject-matter for the exercise of jurisdiction. A case of this sort was before us recently, entitled Stevenson v. Superior Court, 62 Cal. 60. Of course, where the proceedings are absolutely void, all rights and titles dependent upon them must fall. But not so when the proceedings are only voidable. In the case at bar there is no question but that the probate court, throughout the proceedings culminating in the decree of distribution, had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the parties in interest, and that all the proceedings in the matter of the estate, to and including the entry of the decree of distribution, were in accordance with the provisions of the statute. That being so, it is plain that the decree of distribution was not void. At most, it was only voidable. Whether the instrument propounded as a will was executed in the manner required by law, and was what it purported to be,—the last will and testament of the deceased,—was a fact the probate court was called upon to determine in the exercise of the jurisdiction it had acquired over the subject-matter and over the parties in interest; and when that court decided that it was, and proceeded to administer the estate, its acts, and those of the executrix under its authority and pursuant to the statute, were valid and binding as to all dealings with third parties had in good faith and for value. Fitch v. Miller, 20 Cal. 383; Stevenson v. Superior Court, supra; Fisher v. Bassett, 9 Leigh, 119; Andrews v. Avory, 14 Grat. 236; Monell v. Dennison, 17 How. Pr. 426. Precisely the same reason that protects a purchase consummated from an executor or administrator, before his administration is revoked or superseded, protects the purchaser from the distributee of the estate. When, as in the case of Samson, the probate of a will has been annulled upon a contest initiated by an heir subsequent to an entry of a decree of distribution, the heir may undoubtedly pursue the property, and perhaps its proceeds, in the hands of the distributee, but, for the reasons already given, he cannot follow the property into the hands of one who bought in good faith and for value from the executor, administrator, or distributee prior to the revocation, and at a time when the proceedings appeared and were valid and binding. Judgment affirmed.

COMMON CARRIERS — INJURIES TO PASSENGERS — CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE — DECLARATION OF PLAINTIFF — COMPARISON OF HANDWRITING — INSTRUCTIONS.

1. The lessors of a steamboat employed in carrying passengers, having no control over its operation or management, are not liable for the negligence of the lessees, by which a passenger was injured.

2. Declarations of a passenger that he was himself to blame for an accident occurring to him were properly received in evidence, though made some time after the injury occurred. Thornton, J., dissenting.

3. It is error to permit a party to write his signature in the presence of the jury, to enable them, by comparison of handwritings, to appreciate his nervous condition at the time of signing a release of all claims for damages for injuries received by him through the negligence of a common carrier.

4. In an action against a steamboat owner for injuries to a passenger received when standing near the gangway, an instruction that it was not contributory negligence for plaintiff to be there, "unless such location would have been considered by a man of ordinary prudence dangerous under the circumstances, and unless the employes of the boat had given plaintiff sufficient warning to enable him to avoid it," conveyed no clear idea of what constitutes contributory negligence, and should not have been given.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco.

Action by Peter Gulzoni against W. C. Tyler and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

E. S. Pillsbury, for appellants. George Pearce, for respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J. The court erred in sustaining objections to the introduction of evidence by the defendants to prove that, at the time when the plaintiff received the injuries complained of the defendants were not managing, controlling, or running the steamer on which the plaintiff was injured, but that the same was run, managed, and controlled by the California Steam Navigation Company. Such evidence was relevant to a material issue in the case. The plaintiff alleged that said steamer was employed by the defendants in carrying passengers, etc., and that said "defendants so negligently and unskillfully conducted themselves in the management of the said boat, and through the negligence and unskillfulness of themselves and their servants, the plaintiff was injured." This and all other allegations of the complaint were denied by the defendants in their answer, and any evidence having a tendency to prove that they did not employ said steamer in carrying passengers, nor, at the time when the plaintiff received his injuries, have the management or control of it, but that the same was employed at that time in carrying passengers, and was managed and controlled by another person or corporation, was clearly admissible. The ground upon which respondent's counsel claims that these rulings were correct is that the boat was registered as belonging to the defendants, and, although not conclusive, it was prima facie evidence that they were and continued to be her owners, until it was shown that they had ceased to be, and that the defendants made no attempt to prove a change of ownership; and that nothing short of this could relieve them of liability for damages caused by the negligence of those who run, managed, and controlled the boat. The rule, as stated in Shearman and Redfield on Negligence, (section 501,) is that if the owner of property lets or lends it, and transfers the entire possession and control of it to another, the owner is not responsible for the wrongful use or mismanagement of it by the transferee. Whoever had the exclusive possession, management, and control of the boat, its officers and men, was alone responsible for its mismanagement; and whether rightfully or wrongfully in such possession the liability would rest on them alone. Under the rule respondeat superior, this must be so. If the defendants were owners of the boat, but had not the possession, control, or management of it themselves, or by their agents, servants, or employes, they cannot be held responsible for the negligence or mismanagement of whoever had the exclusive possession, control, and management of it. The evidence of what the plaintiff said when asked whether he blamed anybody on the boat should not have been stricken out. Evidence of what he said in regard to the occurrence was admissible for the defense. If he expressed an opinion as to who was to blame, the defendants were entitled to have the benefit of it. It was error to permit the plaintiff to write his name in the presence of the jury for the avowed purpose of having the jury compare, and then permitting them to compare, his signature, written in their presence, with his signature to a release signed by him about the time of his receiving his injuries, in order "to show the nervous condition of the witness at the time of the accident." We know of no rule which would sanction a comparison of handwritings for such a purpose. Besides, if there was a material difference between the handwriting of the plaintiff at the different dates, there was, at least, a liability that some of the jurors might have been led to doubt the genuineness of the signature to the release, which was not denied. In one of the instructions the court substantially charged the jury that the plaintiff had a right to be near the gangway, and it was not contributory negligence for him to be there, "unless such location would have been considered by a man of ordinary prudence, dangerous under the circumstances, and unless the employes of the boat had given plaintiff sufficient warning to enable him to avoid it." And if he had "sufficient warning to enable him to avoid" the danger, was it prudent for him to remain there? Would a prudent man have remained after having been warned of the danger, even if it was not otherwise apparent to him? The instruction is to the effect that if a man of ordinary prudence would have considered it dangerous to be there, it was not contributory negligence for the plaintiff to be there, unless warned of the danger by the employes of the boat; and even then it was not contributory negligence for him to remain there unless a man of ordinary prudence would have considered it dangerous to do so. Under such an instruction, an ordinary jury could hardly be expected to see very clearly what would constitute contributory negligence. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

ROSS, MYRICK, and MCKINSTRY, JJ., concurred.

THORNTON, J. I concur in the foregoing opinion, except as to the second point ruled in it. I do not think that the evidence of what the plaintiff said many hours after the happening of the event, by which he was injured, was admissible in evidence. The remark of plaintiff was not an admission of a fact. It was an inference or opinion drawn from a number of facts, and so far as we are informed by the statement or bill of exceptions, from which we get all our information on the subject, it was not based on plaintiff's knowledge of all the facts touching the manner in which he was hurt, but upon the statements of others, which might not have been true. It does not appear that plaintiff knew or could have known all the facts of the occurrence alluded to. It was most improbable that he did know them. In my opinion, the remark of the plaintiff that he was to blame, not being an admission of a fact, should not have been allowed to go to the jury.

WHITTAKER v. TUOLUMNE COUNTY. (No. 14,767.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 31, 1892.)

LICENSE TAX—LEGALITY—ACTION TO DETERMINE—RIGHT TO SUE COUNTY.

Code Civil Proc. § 1050, providing that "an action may be brought by one person against another for the purpose of determining an adverse claim which the latter makes against the former for money or property upon an alleged obligation, * * *" does not authorize the maintenance of an action against a county to determine the legality of a license tax sought to be imposed on plaintiff by such county, since a political subdivision of the state cannot be sued except as specially authorized by statute.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Tuolumne county; J. F. ROONEY, Judge.

TEMPLE, C. This action was brought for the purpose of determining an adverse claim, which it is alleged the defendant makes against the plaintiff for $200, under an ordinance imposing a license tax upon persons engaged in the business of raising, grazing, herding, and pasturing sheep. Plaintiff contends that the ordinance is void, and the defendant's claim against plaintiff and the license tax unfounded, and he asks for a judgment so declaring. The right to maintain such an action is supposed to be found in section 1050 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which reads as follows: "An action may be brought by one person against another for the purpose of determining an adverse claim which the latter makes against the former for money or property upon an alleged obligation, and also against two or more persons for the purpose of compelling one to satisfy a debt due to the other, for which plaintiff is bound as a surety." This section does not support the contention. The state and its political subdivisions cannot be sued except as specially authorized by statute, and general language creating new remedies or prescribing procedure have never been held to authorize such actions. See Mayrhofer v. Board, 89 Cal. 110, 26 Pac. Rep. 646, where the subject is discussed and numerous cases cited. I think the suit ought to have been dismissed, with costs, but, as the judgment is only that the defendant recover its costs, I advise that it be affirmed.

PROMISSORY NOTE—ACTIONS—EVIDENCE—BREACH OF WARRANTY—DAMAGES AS SET-OFF—FAILURE OF CONSIDERATION.

1. In an action on a nonnegotiable promissory note, it appeared that the note was given for a machine purchased of a manufacturing company, and made payable to plaintiff bank. The president of the bank was also president and a managing agent of the manufacturing company, and knew that the note was given for the machine. The note was given to and held by plaintiff simply as collateral security for overdrafts of the manufacturing company. Defendants alleged in the answer want of consideration, warranty of the machine, failure of warranty, and that plaintiff knew that neither it nor said company had ever paid any consideration for the note; also that the two corporations conspired to cheat and defraud defendants, and both made false and fraudulent representations in regard to said machine, on which defendants relied; that defendants offered to return the machine to said company, but it refused to accept it or to return said note. Held, that evidence offered by defendants of the dealings between them and said company, as to the terms of sale, warranty, consideration, the knowledge of the president as to the character of the machine, and of other facts tending to prove the allegations of the answer, was competent and material, and should have been admitted.

2. Where, in such action, it appeared that the note was sent by defendants to said president of both corporations, and he deposited it with plaintiff as collateral security under an arrangement between the corporations that it should be so deposited, the note is not invalid for lack of delivery.

3. In such action, it is error to exclude evidence that would have made more explicit the proof that such note was the property of the manufacturing company, although evidence of such fact had been introduced.

4. In such action it appeared that one of defendants signed the note only as an accommodation to a partnership composed of the two other defendants and a person who did not sign the note, and who was not a party to the suit; that the machine was purchased for the benefit of the partnership, and the vendor was not a party to the suit. Defendants in the answer alleged special damages on account of fraud and breach of warranty; that a certain sum was paid on the machine; and asked judgment therefor. Held, that defendants were not entitled to recover the money paid, or to recoup damages for breach of warranty by way of set-off to plaintiff's demand, though it is the original payee, since the accommodation maker has no right of action for the same.

5. In such case defendants may show failure of consideration, and a rescission of the contract for fraud and breach of warranty, and the exclusion of evidence tending to show such facts is erroneous.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; ANSEL SMITH, Judge.

Action by the Stockton Savings & Loan Society against E. E. Giddings, W. R. Giddings, and L. M. Giddings, as executrix of the estate of E. Giddings, deceased, on a promissory note. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed.

C. P. Sprague and Nicol & Orr, for appellants. W. L. Dudley and J. G. Swinnerton, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This appeal is from the judgment, and was taken within 60 days after its rendition. The action is upon a nonnegotiable promissory note, made by the defendants first sued, and payable to plaintiff. Since suit was commenced, one of the original defendants, E. Giddings, has died, and the defendant L. M. Giddings, his executrix, has been substituted. Several separate defenses are pleaded or attempted to be pleaded in the answer. They all deny the allegations of the complaint. In the second they admit making the note, but deny that it was ever delivered to plaintiff, and aver that they believed at the time of its execution that a corporation known as the Stockton Combined Harvester & Agricultural Works was the payee named therein, and that neither they nor either of them received any consideration therefor, except a promise made by that corporation which has not been kept or performed. By the third defense they aver that plaintiff is a corporation, and that at the time of the execution of the note one L. U. Shippee was its president and one of its managing agents, and was also at the same time president and one of the managing agents of the corporation known as the Stockton Combined Harvester & Agricultural Works. That at the same time a partnership, consisting of defendants E. E. Giddings, W. R. Giddings, and one James Sibley engaged in farming in Tulare county, was solicited by the last-named corporation (which, for brevity, I will call the Agricultural Works) to contract for the manufacture of a machine known as the "Shippee Combined Harvester and Shippee and Grattan Improvements." That the partners knew nothing of the machine save through the representations of the agents of the corporation, who made certain representations as to its value and efficiency, which induced the partners to contract for the manufacture of one of the machines, in which contract the corporation warranted that the machine would do good work, and was reasonably fit for the use for which it was purchased. The partners were to pay $1,800 for the machine, and did then pay the sum of $579.33 to the Agricultural Works. That the machine when delivered failed to perform good work, whereby defendants have been damaged in the sum of $3,000. That plaintiff well knew when it received the note that neither plaintiff nor the Agricultural Works had ever paid any consideration for the note. That the note was indorsed as collateral security to plaintiff for debts due it from the Agricultural Works. That such debts had all been paid, and that the other corporation, the Agricultural Works, was solvent and able to pay all its debts. That E. Giddings signed the note simply as an accommodation to the partnership, and, in case of recovery here, the partnership, including Sibley, who did not sign the note, will be held liable for any sum recovered. In the fourth defense very nearly the same facts are averred, so far as relates to the Agricultural Works and the other parties to the note, and that the contract of sale and the note were procured through the fraudulent representations of the Agricultural Works, and that the machine delivered was of no value whatever for any purpose. In the fifth defense the same matters are again alleged, but it is charged that the two corporations combined, conspired, and confederated together to cheat and defraud the partners named; that both and each of them made the false and fraudulent representations in regard to the machine which the partners agreed to purchase, relying upon and believing the false and fraudulent representations; that the machine was of no value for any purpose, and that, immediately upon discovering this fact, the vendees offered to return the same to the vendor, which then agreed to return the promissory note to the makers, and to repay the amount paid, provided said machine was not made to work satisfactorily within five days; that the partners, in pursuance of this contract, and the employes of the vendor, for five days then attempted to make the machine work, but wholly failed so to do, and such efforts proved the machine to be wholly valueless; wherefore the partners again offered to return it, but the Agricultural Works refused to accept it, or to return the note, or to refund the money, and has ever since refused to accept a return of the machine. They also set out specially damage suffered in consequence of the fraud and breach of warranty, and ask judgment for a surrender of the promissory note, the refunding of the money, and that the Agricultural Works be brought in to answer their cross complaint; that Sibley be permitted to intervene; and for general relief.

The case was tried with a jury. After the plaintiff rested, defendants proved by the cashier of the bank and by L. U. Shippee, who was president of both corporations, that the note was deposited in the bank by Shippee, and indorsed by him thus: "L. U. Shippee, Pres't S. C. H. and A. Works." The only consideration on the part of the bank was the indebtedness of the Agricultural Works, and debts thereafter to accrue; in other words, the overdraft. As long as the note remained there, it was security for any money the Agricultural Works might owe, an arrangement having been made between the two companies by which all such notes belonging to the Agricultural Works were to be deposited there to secure the overdraft of the corporation. That Shippee knew that the note was for money due the Agricultural Works for the harvester. A series of questions were then asked the witness Shippee, by which the defendants attempted to prove all the allegations in their answer. Each was objected to as immaterial and incompetent. All the objections were sustained, each ruling was excepted to, and all are brought here for review. In effect they were: If the note was not delivered to the Agricultural Works instead of to the bank. If it was not the property of the Agricultural Works. What were the terms of the sale? If certain representations were not made and warranties given, and if Shippee did not know at the time of each. If he did not know that the harvester was worthless, and as to the alleged offer to redeliver and the refusal. What the consideration was. Certain letters written by agents of the bank, and also of the Agricultural Works, were offered, tending to prove some of the same matters, but all were excluded. The questions were put in various forms, and each of the defendants was offered as a witness to prove the facts alleged in defense, but the court declined to receive their evidence, remarking that it intended to exclude all evidence as to dealings between defendants and the Agricultural Works.

The question is, was the proposed evidence competent, and, if so, was it material? I cannot agree with the contention that the evidence which defendants attempted to elicit, supposing the questions would have been answered favorably to them, would have shown that the note was void for lack of delivery. The theory of defendants was that the note was intended for the Agricultural Works, and was given in payment for the machine. It is admitted that it was sent to Shippee for that corporation, and by him deposited with the plaintiff as collateral security for the overdrafts of the Agricultural Works. It appears that an arrangement existed between the two corporations by which plaintiff was to take all the notes of the other as security for overdrafts. Presumably the bank was also to collect the notes. When, therefore, the note was made payable to the bank, it received it simply as agent of the Agricultural Works, and as collateral security for existing indebtedness and for money thereafter to be advanced. The note was therefore not invalid for lack of delivery. That the note was the property of the Agricultural Works, and was held by the bank only as security, sufficiently appears from the testimony of the president and cashier of the bank.

The evidence sought to be drawn out by the questions which were ruled out would have made the proof more explicit and satisfactory, and should have been admitted. This would not have been to vary or add to the terms of the instrument. It will not be controverted that a contract made in the name of an agent may not ordinarily be shown, either by the principal or the other party to the contract, to be nevertheless the contract of the principal; and the Code, in putting the burden upon the payee of a note to disprove the sufficiency of the consideration, throws the door open upon that subject. It is contended by respondent that the consideration of the note was solely the credits given to the Agricultural Works. The defendants sought to show that the consideration was not the overdraft, but the purchase of a machine with a warranty, and that the warranty had failed, and the machine was worthless; that the consideration of the note had wholly failed. This evidence was clearly admissible if material to any issue in the case. That the pleadings are sufficient to raise the question will hardly be disputed, if it be admitted that these defendants are all in a position to raise it. Sibley, one of the parties to the contract of sale, did not sign the note, and is not a party to this suit. The vendor and warrantor is not a party to the suit. The plaintiff was not a party to the sale. One of the payors in the note, who is also one of the defendants sued, was not a party to the sale, but signed the note merely as surety. If the surety in his defense can take advantage of the failure of consideration under these circumstances, it is plain that the absence of Sibley from the record is not fatal to the right of defendants to make this defense. This point will therefore be passed. The absence of the Agricultural Works from the record only raises the question as to what defenses may be urged against the indorsee. The plaintiff is certainly in no better position than it would be if the note had been given to the Agricultural Works, and by it indorsed to plaintiff. I doubt if its position is as favorable as it would have been as indorsee. If making the bank payee is evidence of immediate notice to the makers of the interest of the bank, it must also have the effect to place the bank in the position of payee as to such defenses as can only be made as against the original payee. The note, however, is not commercial paper, and it seems to me the bank holds it subject to all infirmities and to all defenses that might have been made if it were held by the Agricultural Works, not including, of course, possible defenses which might have accrued from subsequent transactions between the payors and the Agricultural Works, or claims against it subsequently acquired by assignment. It was shown that the bank did not credit the Agricultural Works with the amount of the note. The transaction, therefore, did not amount to novation.

That the surety could not maintain a counterclaim is clear, for he could not bring an independent action upon the warranty, as he was not a party to it. Chase v. Evoy, 58 Cal. 348; Roberts v. Donovan, 70 Cal. 108, 11 Pac. Rep. 599. It would naturally seem that the liability of a surety could not be greater than that of the principal, and that the Agricultural Works ought not to be enabled to recover in this way the price of a worthless machine in violation of its express contract. But, if it be necessary to consider the defense in the nature of a recoupment, it cannot be done. The difficulties in the way of such a defense are well stated by Judge SELDEN in Gillespie v. Torrance, 25 N. Y. 306. The suit was against the accommodation indorser of a note given for timber sold with a warranty, a breach of which was attempted to be set up in defense. The learned judge remarks that if the defense be regarded as a failure of consideration, in whole or in part, the surety can undoubtedly urge the defense, but he proceeds to argue that the claim is to recoup the damages for a breach of the contract of warranty; that often the damages might amount to more than the claim, and it is optional with the vendees when they are sued for the price to recoup or to bring an independent action for damages; that, (before the Code,) if he elected to recoup, he could not recover for a balance in his favor. He therefore concludes that such damages constitute a counterclaim, and not a mere failure of consideration, and, not being due to defendant, he cannot set it up. He cannot elect for the vendee whether to plead it as a defense or bring another action to recover it. If he could, he might bar the right of the parties to the warranty to recover damages for its breach, for there could not be two recoveries. The right would exist where the note of the surety was for only a small part of the purchase price, and would amount to a practical release of the vendor of the greater part of his liability. In conclusion the learned judge says: "In the case which was shown on the trial, there would seem to be a strong equity in favor of the defendant to have the note canceled or reduced, by applying towards its satisfaction the damages which appear to be due Van Pelt for the breach of warranty. It is, however, an equity, in which Van Pelt is interested to as great, and possibly to a greater, extent than the defendant, and cannot be disposed of without having him before the court, so that his rights, as well as those of the defendant, may be protected." There are many other cases to the same general effect, while the cases of Wade v. Scott, 7 Mo. 509, and Scroggin v. Holland, 16 Mo. 419, seem to be the other way. The difficulties in the way of this defense, as stated by Judge SELDEN, seem to me insurmountable, and they are not diminished by the Code provision, (section 438, Code Civil Proc.)

This reasoning, of course, applies only to the claim on the part of the defendants of a right to recoup damages for the breach of warranty by way of set-off to the plaintiff's demand. As to the defense of fraud more may be said. It is sometimes said that fraud vitiates the contract, but ordinarily that only means that a party may avoid the contract on that ground, but, if he does not elect to do so, he is bound by his contract, and in such case the surety cannot set it up as a defense. If the claim be for damages on account of fraud, the surety cannot avail himself of the defense, for the reasons already given. The surety may always avail himself of the defense of failure of consideration, in whole or in part, and it seems to me it would necessarily follow that he may avail himself of the fact that the sale has been rescinded on any ground whatever which would authorize the rescission. Under our Code, (section 1786, Civil Code,) a breach of warranty entitles the buyer to rescind. In the case of Gillespie v. Torrance, supra, it was assumed that no such right existed. On this point, therefore, that case is not authority here. The answer sets up facts which if true would constitute a rescission, and the questions which were ruled out called for evidence which would have tended to make out such defense. To such practice I can see no possible objection. If a contract has been canceled as between the original parties, there remains no consideration for the promise of the surety, except in the case of commercial paper which has passed into the hands of an innocent holder. We are not considering here what might be the consequences in another case. This suit is between the original parties to the contract. It would seem to follow that the court erred in excluding the evidence, as well as in instructing the jury to find for the plaintiff. I advise that the judgment be reversed and a new trial awarded.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed and a new trial ordered.

GOLDBERG v. THOMPSON et al. (No. 13,945.)

SWAMP LANDS—SUITABLE FOR CULTIVATION.

1. Const. art. 17, § 3, providing that state lands which are "suitable for cultivation" shall be granted only to actual settlers, applies to swamp lands granted as such to the state by congress, but which afterwards became dry and fit for cultivation. Fulton v. Brannan, 26 Pac. Rep. 506, 88 Cal. 454, followed.

2. In a contest between two persons over the right to purchase such lands, the court will not ignore the character of the land, and the question of residence or settlement by the parties, merely because such questions are outside of the issues made by the pleadings, but will decide against both parties, if neither is entitled to purchase; a party being required to allege and prove a complete case in order to prevail.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Tulare county; W. W. Cross, Judge.

Action by Joseph Goldberg against George Thompson and others in the nature of a contest to purchase state lands. From a judgment denying both plaintiff and defendants the right to purchase, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Chas. E. Wilson and T. M. McNamara, for appellant. W. B. Wallace and Garber & Bishop, for respondents. J. S. Clack, amicus curiæ.

Beatty, C. J. This is a contest over the right to purchase state land, referred by the surveyor general to the courts for determination. Pol. Code, § 3414. The superior court decided that neither party had a right to purchase, and plaintiff appeals from the judgment, contending that it is not supported by the pleadings and findings. The land in controversy was "swamp and overflowed" on September 28, 1850, and as such passed to the state under the congressional grant of that date. Subsequently, and prior to plaintiff's application to purchase, it became, by the operation of natural and other causes, dry and fit for cultivation, but plaintiff has never been a resident or settler upon it. These facts bring the case within the decision in Fulton v. Brannan, 88 Cal. 454, 26 Pac. Rep. 506, and McNee v. Lynch, 88 Cal. 519, 26 Pac. Rep. 508, in which it was held that sections 2 and 3 of article 17 of the constitution apply to lands of this class which have become fit for cultivation before application to purchase, and forbid their sale to any but actual settlers. Appellant contends that the findings of the superior court, as to fitness for cultivation and want of settlement, being outside the issues made by the pleadings, must be disregarded. But the rule invoked has no application to this class of cases, in which each party is an actor, and must allege and prove a complete case in order to prevail. If land is of the class which can be sold only to residents, and neither contestant is a settler, the court cannot ignore the character of the land and the question of residence, because it is convenient to the parties to do so. On the contrary, it must decide against both, if neither is entitled to purchase. Garfield v. Wilson, 74 Cal. 178, 15 Pac. Rep. 620, and cases there cited. The judgment is affirmed.

Mahoney v. Bostwick. (No. 14,638.)

Mortgages—Absolute Deed—Improvements—Equity.

1. In a suit by a grantor to have a deed absolute on its face declared a mortgage, and to compel a conveyance to plaintiff on payment of amount due, a finding by the court that the instrument is a mortgage, based on conflicting evidence and not resting on the uncorroborated testimony of plaintiff himself, will not be disturbed.

2. Where defendant wrongfully entered under such deed and ousted plaintiff, he is liable to plaintiff for the full rental value during such wrongful possession, and is not entitled to any credit for improvements made, even though it may appear that plaintiff would himself have made the same improvements had he not been ousted.

3. Where plaintiff gave such deed to secure advances and loans, and subsequently gave defendant a mortgage on future crops as further security for such "sums as he might thereafter advance to plaintiff to farm or improve said premises, and as additional security" for the amount already advanced, such subsequent advances under the mortgage are not proper items of credit against plaintiff's claim for rent, the mortgage under which they were advanced not constituting them a lien on the land.

4. The maxim that he who seeks equity must do equity has no application where the demand of defendant is based on a contract separate from that which forms the subject of plaintiff's action.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Stanislaus county; M. K. Harris, Judge.

Action by W. H. Mahoney against I. S. Bostwick. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Baldwin & Campbell, W. L. Dudley, and L. J. Maddux, for appellant. Stonesifer & Minor, (W. E. Turner, of counsel,) for respondent.

De Haven, J. The complaint in this action alleges, among other matters, that in August, 1884, plaintiff was the owner of the land therein described, and at that date he executed to one William Inglis a deed thereof, as security for money then advanced by said Inglis to pay off a debt due from plaintiff to the Stockton Savings & Loan Society, and which indebtedness was a lien on said land; that upon February 5, 1885, the defendant by agreement, with plaintiff, paid to said Inglis the amount then due from plaintiff to Inglis, and plaintiff, in consideration thereof, caused said Inglis to convey to defendant the land which had theretofore been conveyed by plaintiff to Inglis, and that at the time it was agreed between plaintiff and defendant "that said deed, though an absolute conveyance on its face, * * * should be treated and considered as a mortgage of said lands" to secure the payment to defendant of the amount so paid by him to Inglis, at the request of plaintiff. The complaint further alleges that thereafter the defendant repudiated the agreement under which he received the deed from Inglis, and claimed that the same was an absolute conveyance, and on October 6, 1885, he ousted plaintiff from the possession of said land, and has ever since withheld the possession thereof from plaintiff, and has kept and enjoyed all the rents and profits thereof. The prayer of the complaint is that the deed from Inglis to defendant be declared a mortgage to secure the repayment of the money loaned by defendant to plaintiff, and the interest thereon; and that the court ascertain the value of the rents and profits of the land while in possession of defendant, and credit the amount thereof upon the indebtedness which the deed was intended to secure, and that upon payment of the balance due defendant he be required to convey such land to plaintiff. The answer of defendant contained a specific denial of all these allegations, and also pleaded a former judgment in an action between the same parties as at bar. The court below found all of the allegations of the complaint to be true, and also that plaintiff's cause of action was not barred by the former judgment referred to in the answer, and thereupon gave judgment in accordance with the prayer of the complaint, in which judgment the defendant was charged with the rental value of the land during the time he was in possession of the same, and was not allowed the value of certain improvements which he had placed thereon, or the amount of certain money advanced by him to plaintiff for the purpose of carrying on and improving the farm. The defendant appeals from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial. There were many exceptions taken during the trial and preserved by the defendant in the bill of exceptions, which forms a part of the record before us, but only the grounds upon which he mainly relies for a reversal of the judgment and order require discussion here.

1. The appellant insists with great earnestness that the finding of the superior court that the deed executed to defendant by Inglis was in fact intended as a mortgage is not sustained by the evidence. But in our view the evidence upon this material issue was conflicting in a substantial degree, and, such being the case, under the rule which has often been declared by us, the finding of the trial court as to the fact must be allowed to stand. We fully agree with appellant that in actions of this character the presumption of law, independent of proof, is that the instrument is what on its face it purports to be,—an absolute conveyance, —and that this presumption should be allowed to prevail unless the evidence offered to show that the deed was in fact intended as a mortgage is entirely plain and convincing. Henley v. Hotaling, 41 Cal. 22; Cadman v. Peter, 118 U. S. 73, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 957; Coyle v. Davis, 116 U. S. 108, 6 Sup. Ct. Rep. 314; Whitsett v. Kershow, 4 Colo. 419; 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1196. But whether the evidence is of such character and strength as to produce this conviction is a question for the trial court to determine. Brison v. Brison, 90 Cal. 329, 27 Pac. Rep. 186. That court ought always to be governed, in weighing the evidence and reaching its conclusion as to the facts, by this rule, which requires the plaintiff in an action like this to present a case free from doubt, and, unless the evidence is such as to leave in the mind of the trial judge a clear and satisfactory conviction that the instrument which in form is a deed was intended by all the parties thereto as a mortgage, the finding should be against the plaintiff. But we cannot say from the record which is before us that the superior court disregarded this rule in making its findings. The finding that the deed was a mortgage does not rest upon the uncorroborated testimony of the plaintiff himself.

2. It is claimed by appellant that the court erred in admitting evidence as to the rental value of the land, and in charging him with such value. In support of this contention, it is argued by appellant that he should only have been charged with the actual or net profits which he derived from the use and occupation of the land. It is unnecessary, in passing upon the question thus presented, to determine what would be the basis upon which the account should be taken, in the absence of an express agreement as to the method, in the case of a mortgagee in possession with the consent of the mortgagor, and occupying himself, and not by a tenant. In this case the appellant's mortgage gave him no right to the possession of the mortgaged premises, and he did not take possession with the consent of the plaintiff. Upon this point the court finds that appellant wrongfully entered upon the premises and ousted the plaintiff from the possession thereof, and in such a case it is very clear to us that the appellant is liable to be charged for rents and profits, precisely the same as any other disseisor would be, and he is not entitled to any accounting to determine how much he may have actually realized from this wrongful occupation, after deducting the necessary expenses of carrying on the farm.

3. The court did not err in refusing to credit defendant with the value of the checks, ditching, and fencing placed by him on the premises while he was wrongfully in possession and holding adversely to plaintiff. The possession of defendant, and all that he did upon the land, were acts hostile to the title of plaintiff, and plaintiff is not required in this action, upon any principle of law or equity, to account to defendant for the value of the improvements thus made by him. It is claimed, however, that the fences were built with the knowledge and consent of plaintiff. It does appear from the evidence that plaintiff intended to do this fencing, and that defendant, before plaintiff was ousted from possession, had delivered upon the land a part of the lumber which was afterwards used in the construction of the fence. If it should be assumed that this lumber was furnished by the defendant at the request of plaintiff, and that plaintiff had accepted the same and intended to build this fence with it, still this would not be sufficient to prove the fact contended for, that defendant, after he took possession, constructed this fence for plaintiff, and with his consent. The fence was constructed by defendant for himself, and in the assertion by him of a right to exercise dominion over the land upon which it was erected adversely to plaintiff, and plaintiff cannot be made to pay for it, although it may appear that he would himself have built it if he had not been ousted from possession. If defendant has any right to recover from plaintiff the value of the lumber which was delivered on the land by defendant, while plaintiff was in possession, such right cannot be asserted here, as it was not furnished upon any agreement that the price thereof should constitute a lien upon the land, and the payment thereof to be deemed as secured by the mortgage deed held by the defendant.

4. The court below found that, after defendant received from Inglis the deed already referred to, plaintiff executed to defendant a mortgage upon the crops to be raised upon the land during the year 1885, "as a further security to defendant for the payment to him (defendant) of such sum or sums as the defendant might thereafter advance to plaintiff, to farm or improve said premises, and as additional security for the payment by plaintiff of the amount paid by the defendant to Inglis" for plaintiff; and the court further found that defendant did advance to plaintiff "about the sum of eleven hundred dollars, for the purpose of farming and permanently improving said premises," and that plaintiff delivered to defendant all the grain raised on the ranch for the purpose of repaying the same, and the interest on the other loan made by plaintiff to defendant. The court does not find that the $1,100 referred to was repaid defendant, or that the grain delivered to him was sufficient for that purpose, and the appellant insists that he is entitled to a credit for the amount of this debt, whatever it may be, in his account with plaintiff in this action, and that the court erred in not ascertaining the amount, and providing in its judgment that the same should be paid before defendant is required to reconvey to plaintiff. We do not think the court committed any error in this respect. This indebtedness was not, by agreement of the parties, made a lien upon the land, but, on the contrary, the money seems to have been advanced by defendant upon an independent security; that is, upon a mortgage upon the growing crops. The general rule is that the mortgagee cannot require as a condition of redemption the payment of any other debt not a lien upon the land. Jones, Mortg. § 1083. It is argued, however, that as the plaintiff is here seeking the aid of a court of equity, he should be compelled to do equity; but this maxim of equity jurisprudence only applies when the relief sought by plaintiff, and the right demanded by defendant, belong to or grow out of the same transaction. It has no application where the demand of the defendant is based upon a contract separate and distinct from that which forms the subject of the plaintiff's action. 1 Pom. Eq. Jur. §§ 385, 387. The other matters referred to in the briefs of counsel do not require special discussion.

Judgment and order affirmed.

MOFFITT v. BULSON. (No. 14,721.)

MORTGAGES—HOMESTEAD—CONSIDERATION—FORECLOSURE—EVIDENCE.

1. Plaintiff agreed orally to sell to defendant certain lands, part of which plaintiff had filed upon under the "Homestead Act," but for which he had not yet made final proof or payment. Afterwards plaintiff conveyed to defendant all the lands except the homestead tract, and defendant executed to plaintiff a note and mortgage for a balance of the purchase money. Held, in an action to foreclose the mortgage, that the contract was entire, and, being void because it embraced the homestead lands, the mortgage executed in pursuance of it could not be enforced.

2. In such action, the fact that the contract is void because not in writing, and because it was afterwards merged in the deed executed by plaintiff to defendant, does not prevent defendant from showing by parol evidence that the consideration for the mortgage was illegal.

3. Where, in such action, the answer complains of failure by plaintiff to convey to him the homestead lands, and discloses the facts showing the consideration for the mortgage to be illegal, it is not error to refuse to enforce it on the ground that the answer does not set up illegality of consideration.

4. The fact that plaintiff, before the action was commenced, acquired the homestead land by certificate of purchase, gives him no right of action on the mortgage.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Plumas county; G. G. CLOUGH, Judge.

Action by James Moffitt against A. E. Bulson for foreclosure of a mortgage. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. T. Hogan, (Reddy, Campbell & Metson, of counsel,) for appellant. Goodman & Goodman, for respondent.

HAYNES, C. This action was brought to foreclose a mortgage made by respondent to appellant. The note and mortgage were made March 5, 1888, the note being for $5,000, payable in annual installments of $500, together with annual interest on the principal unpaid at 10 per cent. per annum. The answer alleged that on December 22, 1886, plaintiff was in the possession and actual occupancy of a certain ranch known as the "Moffit and Rable Ranch," containing 560 acres, 80 acres of which he had filed upon under the "Desert-Land Act." That another part of said ranch, containing 160 acres, plaintiff had filed upon under the "Homestead Act;" and that plaintiff had title in fee to the remaining 320 acres, but had not made final proof or payment for either of said tracts of government land; and that plaintiff also owned certain personal property then upon said ranch, consisting of horses, farming implements, furniture, etc. That on said 22d day of December, 1886, plaintiff and defendant made an oral contract whereby plaintiff agreed to sell to defendant the whole of said ranch and personal property for the sum of $10,000, and to convey to defendant said 320 acres to which he had title, and deliver said personal property, and to put defendant in possession of the whole of the ranch, upon the payment of one half of said purchase money, at which time defendant was to execute to plaintiff his promissory note for the remaining $5,000, and a mortgage upon the 320 so conveyed to him, to secure said note, and that plaintiff further agreed to obtain title as soon as possible to said tracts of government land, and, as soon as he had done so, to convey them to defendant. That on March 5, 1887, he paid plaintiff $5,000. That plaintiff then conveyed to him said 320 acres, and delivered to him the possession of all said ranch and personal property, and defendant made and delivered said note and mortgage upon which this suit was brought. That on the 24th of March, 1887, plaintiff made final proof and payment upon said homestead entry, and obtained his certificate of purchase thereof, and on September 24, 1888, he made final proof and payment under his desert-land entry, and obtained a certificate of purchase of the same. He further alleged that prior to March 5, 1888, and at sundry times afterwards, he demanded of plaintiff a conveyance of said desert-land and homestead tracts, but that plaintiff then and ever since refused to convey the same. It also appeared from the complaint, as well as from the answer, that on August 4, 1888, defendant paid on the note and mortgage $1,040.66. The court found upon all the issues raised by the answer in favor of defendant, and as conclusions of law found that the contract was entire; that it was illegal, so far as it related to the homestead land; that plaintiff and defendant were equally in the wrong in entering into said contract; that the consideration of said note and mortgage could not be enforced; and that the action should be dismissed, without costs. The appeal is taken from the judgment dismissing the action upon the judgment roll alone.

That a contract to sell and convey lands taken up under the homestead laws, made before final proof, is illegal and void is not disputed. U. S. Rev. St. § 2262. The learned counsel for appellant contend, however, that the oral agreement was void under section 1624, subd. 5, Civil Code, as well as illegal under subdivisions 1, 2, § 1667, Id. Upon these propositions they contend that as all the negotiations, including the offer of defendant to purchase, and the acceptance of the offer by plaintiff, were oral, the execution of the deed by plaintiff, and of the note and mortgage by defendant, on the 5th of March, 1887, not only eliminated the illegal element from the agreement, but that the execution of these instruments constituted the only contract between the parties, and superseded the oral negotiations or stipulations concerning the matter or subject referred to which preceded or accompanied their execution, and that what the subject-matter of the contract was is to be ascertained from the deed and mortgage. Citing Civil Code, § 1625. There is no doubt of the correctness of counsel's contention in a case to which section 1625 of the Civil Code applies; but that section has never been construed to prevent a defendant who has been sued on a promissory note, whether secured by mortgage or not, to show by parol evidence a want or failure or illegality of consideration. Section 1962, Code Civil Proc., enumerates all the conclusive presumptions of law, and section 1963 of the same Code provides: "All other presumptions are satisfactory, if uncontradicted. They are denominated 'disputable presumptions,' and may be controverted by other evidence. The following are of that kind: * * * (21) That a promissory note or bill of exchange was given or indorsed, for a sufficient consideration. * * * (39) That there was a good and sufficient consideration for a written contract." See, also, Civil Code, §§ 1614, 1615. Subdivision 2, § 1962, Code Civil Proc., excepts from the conclusiveness of a written instrument the recital of a consideration. The deed executed by the plaintiff to defendant is not in the record, and it cannot be presumed that it contained any recital or provision not necessary to its operation as a conveyance of the parcel of land conveyed thereby. Even if it did, it would not be conclusive; for, while "the general rule of law is that recitals in a deed bind all persons who are parties or privies thereto, it does not extend to that which is mere description, or an averment that is not essential." Osborne v. Endicott, 6 Cal. 153; Ingersoll v. Truebody, 40 Cal., at page 610; Rhine v. Ellen, 36 Cal. 362. These cases conclusively show that "the grantee may prove by parol that the consideration was wholly different from that expressed in the deed, and depends upon conditions which had not happened, and might never happen." If, therefore, neither a promissory note nor a deed excludes parol evidence of the consideration, it is difficult to conceive any reason or rule of law which could have precluded the court from receiving oral testimony showing the contract to have been entire, and that a single consideration existed for the transfer of all the property. Section 1625 of the Civil Code did not change the law in relation to written instruments. In Davenport v. Mason, 15 Mass. 90, the court, after reciting the general rule that parol evidence is inadmissible to contradict or vary the terms of a deed, added: "But parol evidence may be admitted to establish an independent fact, or to prove a collateral agreement incidentally connected with the stipulations of a deed or other written contract." See, also, McCrea v. Purmort, 16 Wend. 460. In the case at bar the only connection between the deed and the facts proved by parol and found by the court was incidental, and in no way tended to change or contradict any part of the deed essential to its operation as such. The facts that on the same day plaintiff delivered the personal property, and also put defendant in possession of both the tracts of government land, as well as that conveyed by the deed, were quite sufficient to show a prior agreement relating thereto, and were sufficient acts of part performance to have made oral testimony of the terms of such agreement competent as a basis for the specific performance of it. Pom. Spec. Perf. §§ 107, 115. Indeed, the contention of counsel, if carried to its logical conclusion, would defeat the equitable ground of relief based upon part performance of an oral agreement, at least in cases where more than one parcel of land was agreed to be conveyed, after one of them had in fact been conveyed. The court, so far as its legal right to do so was concerned, properly found that the contract was entire, and upon this record that finding can be questioned upon no other ground. Counsel's contention that the findings do not support the judgment, and that the answer does not state facts sufficient to constitute a defense, are based upon the ground already discussed, viz., that the deed, note, and mortgage superseded the oral negotiations which preceded, and that oral evidence of the original verbal contract could not be received or considered. It is, however, further urged that the answer does not set up either illegality or want of consideration, but, on the contrary, complains of the nonperformance of the contract on the part of the plaintiff. The answer alleges the facts from which the several conclusions mentioned may be drawn, and in a pleading they would be mere conclusions of law, not necessary to be alleged. If the answer had not alleged that one of these tracts of land was taken up under the "Homestead Act," no illegality would have appeared, and the defense would have been nonperformance of the contract on the part of the plaintiff. The court, however, found the contract to be entire, and so within section 1608 of the Civil Code, which provides: "If any part of a single consideration for one or more objects or of several considerations for a single object is unlawful, the entire contract is void." If the illegal element had not been introduced into the oral contract of December, 1886, defendant might have successfully insisted upon a specific performance of that contract; but, if that contract was illegal, no action can be maintained upon unexecuted portions of it, and upon that ground, also, plaintiff's action could not be maintained. The subsequent acquirement of the land by certificate of purchase did not confer a right of action. Ladda v. Hawley, 57 Cal. 51. No error appearing upon the record, I advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; BELCHER, C.

SMITH v. DORN et al. (No. 14,655.)

PLEADING—AMENDMENT—ANSWER AFTER—CORPORATIONS—ACTION BY STOCKHOLDER—SPECIAL MEETING OF DIRECTORS—DEFECT OF PARTIES—OBJECTION WAIVED.

1. Where plaintiff is permitted, when a case is called for trial, to sign an amendment to the complaint, which amendment had been previously filed and answered, it is not error to refuse to permit defendants to answer anew, especially when no substantial right of defendants is affected, and they are not injured thereby, and are permitted afterwards to file an amended answer to the amended complaint.

2. In an action by a stockholder to set aside a sale of property of a corporation by the directors on the ground of fraud it appeared that it was recited in the resolution authorizing the sale, and also in the deed, that the sale was made because the corporation was unable to pay its debts. The complaint negatived these recitals, and alleged specifically the means and ability of the corporation to meet its indebtedness, and these allegations were denied in the answer. Held, that the issues raised by the pleadings were material, and evidence pertinent thereto offered by plaintiff was properly admitted.

3. Where, in such action, it appears that any demand on the corporation, or on its controlling directors, for the remedy sought, or any remedy for the alleged wrongs, would have been useless, and this is, in substance, stated in the complaint, plaintiff, as a mere stockholder, is entitled to maintain the action without having first sought a remedy through the board of directors.

4. The by-law of a corporation relating to the manner of calling special meetings of the board of directors, and Civil Code, § 320, provide that notices calling such meetings shall be given on "the order of the president, or, if there be none, on the order of two directors." Held that, while there was a president of the board competent to act, a special meeting thereof called by two directors, on the refusal of the president to make the call, was illegal, and the action of a majority of the directors at such meeting in declaring the offices vacant, and electing new officers, and authorizing them to sell the corporate property, was void.

5. Where the question of defect of parties defendant is not raised by demurrer or answer, the objection is presumed to be waived.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; JOHN L. CAMPBELL, Judge.

Action by J. H. Smith against D. S. Dorn and the Southern California Motor Road Company to set aside a sale of the corporate property of said company to the defendant Dorn. There was a judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Chas. N. Fox, for appellants. Rolfe & Freeman, Paris & Fox, and W. J. Curtis, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. The Southern California Motor Road Company is a corporation organized in this state, which on April 15, 1890, owned a railroad leading from the city of San Bernardino to the city of Riverside, in the county of San Bernardino, in this state, with equipments and other real and personal property. At a specially called meeting of its directors, held on the 15th day of April, 1890, it was resolved to sell the road and equipments, with all other property of the corporation, to the defendant D. S. Dorn; and accordingly, on the same day, a deed was executed to Dorn, purporting to convey to him all the roads, franchises, rights of way, equipments, lands, and personal property of the corporation, including all debts owing and money belonging to the corporation; and possession of all the tangible property was then given to Dorn. The plaintiff, as a mere stockholder of the corporation, brought this suit to set aside and cancel the deed to Dorn on the grounds of fraud, and that the special meeting of the board, at which the sale of the property is claimed to have been authorized, was not called according to law; and therefore that the directors who acted at that meeting were not lawfully assembled as a board. Judgment was rendered in favor of the plaintiff, and the defendants have appealed from the judgment, and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

1. When the case was called for trial, and after the amended complaint and the answer thereto had been read, plaintiff's counsel discovered that the amended complaint had not been signed by plaintiff or his attorney, and thereupon asked leave to sign the same, to which counsel for defendants objected, except on the condition that defendants should be allowed to demur to the complaint as thus amended.

The court overruled the objection. Counsel for defendants then asked leave to answer or demur to the complaint as signed by counsel, but stated no other ground for their motion than that the signing of the complaint was an amendment thereof, without which it would have been totally invalid, and therefore that defendants had a legal right to answer it anew. The court denied this motion. Counsel for appellants contend that this action of the court was error, for which the judgment should be reversed. While I think the court did not err, it is enough to say that its action did not affect any substantial right of the defendants, and that defendants were not thereby injured. Code Civil Proc. § 475; Lattimer v. Ryan, 20 Cal. 630. After the close of plaintiff's evidence in chief, the defendants, by leave of the court, did file an amended answer to plaintiff's amended complaint before they introduced any evidence whatever, and upon this amended answer the case was tried.

2. The resolution authorizing the sale of the corporate property to Dorn recited, among other things, that the corporation is indebted in the sum of about $50,000, in addition to its bonded indebtedness of $150,000, and "is unable to meet the same, and has no prospects of being able to liquidate said demands from its own resources;" and the deed to Dorn, which is set out in the complaint, contains substantially the same recitals. The complaint negatives these recitals by an allegation "that it is not true that said corporation had no means at its command to meet said outstanding indebtedness, as stated in said instrument of conveyance to defendant D. S. Dorn;" and then proceeds to show that for the purpose of paying said indebtedness the corporation had previously levied an assessment amounting to $31,350, which must have been paid or the delinquent stock sold on the 16th day of April, 1890, (the day after the execution of the deed to Dorn;) and that the owners of a majority of the stock were ready, able, and willing to pay that assessment, and would have paid it on April 16, 1890, if the assessment had not been repealed and annulled, as it was, by a resolution of the directors at said special meeting of April 15th; and further alleged that the delinquent stock would have been sold on April 16th, so that the full amount of the assessment would have been paid, and applied to the debts of the corporation; and also alleged that no sale of the property of the corporation was necessary for the payment of corporation debts, as all such debts could and would have been paid by means of assessments on the stock, etc. All these allegations were denied by the defendants' in their amended answer. Each of several distinct questions asked witnesses for plaintiff, pertinent to the issues thus taken upon these allegations, was objected to by counsel for defendants on the ground that it was "irrelevant and immaterial to any of the issues in this cause." Appellants insist that the court erred in overruling these objections.

The questions certainly were relevant to issues expressly raised by the answer of defendants, and I think those issues were material. The recitals in the resolution authorizing the sale of all the property of the corporation, and in the deed to Dorn, were evidently intended to justify or excuse that sale on the ground that the debts of the corporation could not otherwise be paid, and to repel any imputation of bad faith to those directors who passed the resolution authorizing the sale. Under these circumstances, after having properly set out the deed in his complaint, it was proper and material that the plaintiff should negative those recitals, and aver that the debts of the corporation could and would have been paid by assessments and other means than by a sale of all the corporate property. These averments of the circumstances under which the sale was ordered were proper specifications or constituent parts of the fraud charged. Fraudulent acts are generally characterized as such by circumstances which are required to be specially alleged in a pleading charging the fraud.

3. It is contended for appellant that, as a mere stockholder, plaintiff is not entitled to maintain this action, because it does not appear that he ever sought or demanded a remedy for the wrongs complained of through the board of directors. But it is alleged in the complaint that the board consisted of seven members, four of whom participated and assisted in the acts complained of, and have ever since controlled the action of the board, "and therefore it would be useless to make a demand of said corporation, or of the board of directors thereof, to bring this action, or any action, to set aside the instruments or pretended conveyance to the said D. S. Dorn;" and these allegations are not denied. Besides, the answer of the corporation shows that any demand upon it, or upon its controlling directors for the remedy sought by this action, or any remedy for the wrongs alleged, would have been useless. Therefore no such demand was necessary. Parrott v. Byers, 40 Cal. 620; Moyle v. Landers' Adm'rs, 83 Cal. 580, 23 Pac. Rep. 798; Ashton v. Dashaway Ass'n, 84 Cal. 70, 22 Pac. Rep. 660, and 23 Pac. Rep. 1091.

4. It is claimed that several of the findings of fact are not justified by the evidence, particularly the seventh finding, which is as follows: "That R. W. Button and E. J. Gilbert, who executed the instrument of conveyance referred to in the pleadings to the defendant D. S. Dorn, as president and secretary, respectively, of said corporation, had not, nor had either of them, any power or authority to execute the same, nor to sell or convey the property of said corporation." This finding necessarily results from probative facts found by the court, or admitted by the pleadings: (1) It is admitted that Button and Gilbert had no other authority to sell the property of the corporation than such as was conferred by the resolution of the special meeting of directors held on April 15, 1890. (2) The only bylaw of the corporation providing the manner of calling special meetings of the board of directors is, in substance, nearly identical with section 320 of the Civil Code, as follows: "All special meetings of the directors shall be called by special notice in writing to each director, either delivered in person one day before the time of meeting, or depositing in the United States post office at San Bernardino, postage prepaid, addressed to the directors at their last-known places of residence or post office address, two days before the time of meeting. Such notice shall be given upon the order of the president, or, if there be none, on the order of two directors, by the secretary, or by any person or persons selected by the president or directors calling such meeting." (3) At the time said special meeting was called, and at the time it convened, the board of directors was composed of seven members, viz., J. W. Hall, Joseph Brown, R. B. Taylor, R. W. Button, H. W. Button, S. H. Ferris, and Wilson Hays. At the same times Hall was president of the board, Brown was vice president, and J. N. Young was secretary. (4) On or about April 12, 1890, Director R. W. Button successively requested the president, the vice president, and the secretary to call a special meeting of the board, but did not state to either of them for what purpose, nor any reason for calling such meeting. Each of these officers declined to make the call requested. Thereupon the two directors—R. W. Button and H. W. Button—called a special meeting for April 15th, at 10 o'clock A. M., at the office of the company, and served written notice thereof on each of the other directors; but the notice did not state any purpose for which the meeting was called. (5) On April 15th, at the appointed time, four directors, viz., the two Buttons, Ferris, and Hays, met and proceeded to business in the absence of the other three, and also in the absence of the secretary, and without the minute book of the board. They first passed resolutions declaring the offices of president, vice president, and secretary vacant, and elected R. W. Button president, Ferris vice president, and E. J. Gilbert secretary. They next resolved that a former order of the board of February 28, 1890, levying an assessment on stock, "be, and the same is hereby, repealed and annulled." At this point the following entry appears in the minutes of the meeting: "The hour having arrived for the meeting of the stockholders, the directors' meeting did, on motion, suspend until after the said stockholders' meeting." The only business which appears to have been done by this stockholders' meeting was the adoption of a resolution purporting to ratify the action of the directors, in declaring the officers of president, vice president, and secretary vacant, and in filling the vacancies as above stated. (6) At 3 o'clock P. M. of same day, and after the adjournment of the stockholders' meeting, the directors reconvened. At this time the directors Hall, Brown, and Taylor were present in the office attending to other business, but took no part in the business of the directors' meeting, except to protest against the whole proceedings thereof. The only business transacted at this afternoon meeting of directors was the adoption of the resolution purporting to authorize the sale of all the property of the corporation to the defendant D. S. Dorn, of which the following is a copy: "Whereas, this corporation is largely indebted to various persons outside of any indebtedness which may be claimed to exist against this company by reason of any issue of bonds of the corporation heretofore made; and whereas, said outside indebtedness will aggregate in the neighborhood of not more than fifty thousand dollars; and whereas, the corporation is unable to meet the same, and has no prospects of being able to liquidate said demands from its own resources; and whereas, D. S. Dorn has agreed to assume said indebtedness outside of said bonded indebtedness as aforesaid, on the execution to him of a conveyance and grant of all the property in this corporation: Now, therefore, resolved that this corporation execute to said D. S. Dorn, upon his executing to this company a written assumption of the indebtedness of this corporation to the extent and as heretofore set forth, a written grant, conveyance, and transfer absolute, in fact and in terms, of all property, real and personal, choses in action, franchises and demands, of this corporation, and the president of this corporation, R. W. Button, is hereby authorized to execute such conveyance and transfer, which shall bear date April 15, 1890."

It seems clear that the directors were not lawfully assembled as a board at the time they adopted this resolution, and that for this reason the court properly found that the resolution was not a corporate act, and did not confer upon R. W. Button or E. J. Gilbert power or authority to convey the property of the corporation to the defendant Dorn. While there was a president of the board competent to act, the directors (Button) had no authority to call the meeting at which the resolution was adopted; this being the effect of both the by-law and section 320 of the Civil Code. The assumptions of counsel that it was the duty of the president to call a meeting whenever requested to do so by a director, and that the president's refusal, under any circumstances, to comply with such request makes it lawful for any two directors to make the call, are unwarranted by authority or reason. Neither the by-law nor the Code will bear this construction. The bare delegation of power to make the call implies that the exercise of the power shall be discretionary. Whether there may be a remedy for an abuse of this discretionary power is not involved, since there is no evidence of such abuse in this case. It appears that the president was not informed of any reason why the call should be made. Section 303 of the Civil Code provides that "a corporation may, by its by-laws, where no other provision is specially made, provide for (1) the time, place, and manner of calling and conducting its meetings." If the by-law in this case is not valid, it is only because another provision to the same effect is made by section 320 of the Civil Code as to the applicability and authority of which there can be no question. Beach, Priv. Corp. § 308. Section 308 of the Civil Code provides that "a majority of the directors is a sufficient number to form a board for the transaction of business, and every decision of a majority of the directors forming such board, made when duly assembled, is valid as a corporate act." And it follows that no decision or act, made or done by any number of the directors, while not duly assembled as a board, is a valid corporate act. Gashwiler v. Willis, 33 Cal. 11; Ditch Co. v. Zellerbach, 37 Cal. 544-596; Alta Silver Min. Co. v. Alta Placer Min. Co., 78 Cal. 629, 21 Pac. Rep. 373; Thompson v. Williams, 76 Cal. 153, 18 Pac. Rep. 153; Manufacturing Co. v. Vassault, 50 Cal. 534; Reilly v. Oglebay, 25 W. Va. 36; Beach, Priv. Corp. §§ 272, 273; Spelling, Priv. Corp. § 392. The evidence is clearly sufficient to justify all other findings excepted to.

5. It is claimed that there was a defect of parties defendant; that those directors who were charged with fraud, as being interested in the sale sought to be annulled, should have been made parties defendant. But, as this point was not made by demurrer nor by answer, it must be deemed to have been waived. Besides, the defense by the corporation was conducted and controlled by those directors who were charged with fraud; and they were at liberty to make every defense, on behalf of the corporation, to the charge of fraud, which they could have made if they had been parties. But, however this may be, the judgment of the court does not depend upon a finding of fraud. It is well sustained by the finding that Button and Gilbert had no authority to execute the deed to Dorn, and, indeed, there is no finding of fraud, as an ultimate fact. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: TEMPLE, C.; BELCHER, C.

JONES v. DURRER. (No. 14,863.)

LANDLORD AND TENANT—WHEN RELATION EXISTS—BREACH OF COVENANTS—ACTION FOR POSSESSION.

1. Where the owner of a ranch "lets the same" by a covenant in writing for a term of years, for a share of the produce, with certain conditions as to the sale by the tenant of the stock and produce and division of the proceeds, the fact that such covenant constitutes a tenancy in common as to the produce does not destroy the relationship of landlord and tenant as to the land, and the lessor may sue for possession for condition broken. Walls v. Preston, 25 Cal. 59, and Smith v. Schultz, 26 Pac. Rep. 1087, 89 Cal. 526, followed.

2. Where such lessor accepts rents from his tenant after covenants broken, he may still maintain an action for possession for renewed breaches occurring thereafter.

3. Where a suit for forfeiture of the lease was brought by the lessor, who thereafter accepted rents and dismissed his suit without prejudice, such action is not a waiver by the lessor of his right in a subsequent action to insist on the forfeiture of the lease, and to re-enter.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; W. H. GRANT, Judge.

Action by Laura Jones against Frank Durrer. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

McKune & George and Henry C. Ross, Jr., for appellant. R. T. Devlin and Armstrong & Platnaur, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. This action of unlawful detainer was brought to recover possession of a tract of land alleged to have been leased by the respondent and plaintiff to the defendant, for damages for its detention, and that an alleged lease be declared forfeited. The grounds claimed in favor of the plaintiff's recovery are that the defendant had forfeited his right to possession by virtue of certain conditions contained in the lease, and that plaintiff's right of recovery was complete. The main ground upon which the defendant resists plaintiff's claim seems to be that he insists that the agreement set out in the complaint is not such as creates the relation of conventional landlord and tenant. The instrument in question is lengthy, so much so as to preclude its insertion here, but we have given it very thorough examination, and are satisfied that it comes strictly within the rule laid down in Walls v. Preston, 25 Cal. 59, and in Smith v. Schultz, 89 Cal. 526, 26 Pac. Rep. 1087. It is a letting for a share of the produce of the land, and the increase of certain hogs, cattle, fowls, etc. It provides certain conditions as to the cultivation of certain lands in corn, for the grubbing of other lands and putting it in alfalfa for the year 1891, for the making of butter and cheese, etc., "the party of the first part to own one half of all such produce and one half of all the increase of said stock;" how, when the butter made is fit for market, the party of the first part "shall in his discretion be entitled to one half, to be delivered to her, or the parties may sell together and divide the proceeds;" how, as to the increase of cattle kept on the ranch, "there shall annually be a count taken thereof, and the same shall be branded in the private brand of each or any common brand, at the option of the party of the first part;" that the taxes on the "common property shall be paid by both." The owner of the land, the party of the first part, "lets the same," with certain exceptions, to the party of the second part, the defendant here, for a period commencing in March, 1890, and ending on the 1st of October, 1894. The party of the second part is to take possession of the premises, which he did immediately, and is to take care of the same in a good husbandlike manner "for and during the whole of said term," and at the end of the term return them to the party of the first part in as good condition as he "now receives them, reasonable wear and tear and damages by the elements excepted;" also certain conditions as to the sale from the farm of certain steers. Admitting the contention of the appellant that there is constituted under this agreement a tenancy in common of the parties, as to the produce of the farm or the greatest part thereof, yet under the views expressed in Walls v. Preston, supra, and affirmed in Smith v. Schultz, supra, there is no necessary inconsistency between that relation as to the crops, and that of a tenancy of the land by the appellant. It was said in the case first mentioned, at page 66: "There certainly is no rule of law so absolute in its nature as to prevent the occupant of land, under a contract which constitutes him a tenant in common with the owner in the crops, from having an entire control over the premises during the term, if the party so agree, as a tenant covenanting to pay a money rent would have. In other words, from being a tenant of the land under a lease, and at the same time a tenant in common of the crop or some part of it." It being established that as to the land the agreement in question was a lease to continue for a term of several years unless forfeited by condition broken, it becomes necessary to determine if the evidence sustains the findings that any of such conditions were broken. Of this we entertain no doubt. But the appellant insists that there was a waiver of the right to insist upon the breach of conditions, and to re-enter by the landlord, because of the reception of rent after the covenants were violated and known to be violated by the lessor. It may be conceded, without deciding, that the evidence does show that produce and increase of turkeys and a share of the butter and some money, paid upon what account not appearing, were received by the respondent as claimed. It may be further conceded that under some circumstances such reception would be conclusive that the lessor had elected to waive the right to re-enter under the forfeiture clause of the lease. It may be also conceded that notwithstanding these receptions of rent were during the time from the 15th of October, 1890, until the 20th of January, 1891, when the plaintiff had instituted an action claiming a forfeiture of the lease, which was dismissed without prejudice on the 20th of January, 1891, and the present action instituted, nevertheless such action brought would not have the effect of a nonwaiver of the right to insist on the forfeiture of the lease, and to re-enter, under the rule announced in section 497, 2 Tayl. Landl. & Ten. And it may be admitted there is no difference in principle in receiving a nominal sum from the tenant, and receiving produce from the farm and increase from the fowls, when the title is vested in the landlord as tenant in common; and yet from the fact that certain of the covenants broken by the tenant were continuing in their nature, and violations of the same have taken place since the reception of rent by the plaintiff, it must be held here that there was no waiver of the breaches thereof, and of the right to re-enter and maintain the present action. Tayl. Landl. & Ten. § 500; McGlynn v. Moore, 25 Cal. 384.

It appearing, among other things, from the third finding, that at the date of the bringing of the action, and continuously afterwards, defendant refused and still refuses to sell the butter and cheese produced on the farm together, and divide the proceeds thereof as he covenanted that he would do, and that certain steers which defendant covenanted to sell and remove from the farm during the current year of 1890 had not been sold, but still remain on the farm, these renewed breaches since the reception of rent are sufficient, without mentioning others which perhaps exist of the same nature, to remove from the case any question of waiver so as to defeat the plaintiff's right to maintain the action. These seem to be the principal points made for the reversal of the judgment and order denying a new trial, and we do not perceive that, with reference to them and others made and not necessary to be determined, any prejudicial error has been committed. We therefore advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: HAYNES, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. KING.[1]

CRIMINAL LAW—FORMER CONVICTION—ADMISSIONS OF DEFENDANT.

Pen. Code, § 1025, provides that where defendant is charged in the indictment with having suffered a previous conviction of felony he must be asked, at the time of pleading, whether he has suffered such conviction, and that his affirmative answer shall be conclusive of that fact. Held, since the repeal of that section, that it is necessary that such previous conviction be charged, that defendant plead thereto, and that the plea be passed upon by the jury, notwithstanding an admission of such previous conviction by defendant when improperly asked by the clerk as to the fact.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county.

Information against John King for grand larceny. From a conviction, defendant appeals. Reversed.

J. H. Smith and Thos. F. Barry, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Marshall and Dist. Atty. Gibson, for the People.

McKEE, J. The defendant was convicted of petit larceny upon an information which charged him with the commission of grand larceny, and with having suffered a previous conviction for felony. At his arraignment he admitted that the charge of a previous conviction was true; and upon the verdict rendered against him, and his admission of the former conviction, the court sentenced him to imprisonment in the state prison for a term of five years. The sentence was imposed under subdivision 3, § 666, of the Penal Code. By the provisions of that section, when a defendant in a criminal case is convicted of grand or petit larceny, after having suffered a previous conviction for felony, the court in which the conviction is had is authorized to punish him by imprisonment in the state prison not exceeding five years. A conviction for petit larceny and a former conviction for grand larceny, therefore, subject a party to be punished as for a felony. Such legislation has been held constitutional. Ex parte Gutierrez, 45 Cal. 429; Plumbly v. Com., 2 Metc. (Mass.) 413. The increased punishment is not regarded as a part of the penal consequences of the first offense, but applies exclusively to the last as aggravated by the repetition of the same offense. But although the information against the defendant contained a charge of a previous conviction of grand larceny, there was not, at the time the information was made and filed, or when the defendant was arraigned upon it, any existing law which required the court to ask the defendant whether he had suffered such a previous conviction, and permitted him to answer that he had or had not. Before April 9, 1880, there was a section of the Penal Code which provided that, "in charging in an indictment the fact of a previous conviction of a felony, * * * it is sufficient to state, 'that the defendant, before the commission of the offense charged in this indictment, was [giving the title of the court, etc.] convicted of a felony.'" Section 969, Pen. Code, 1873–74. There was also a section which provided as follows: "When a defendant, who is charged in the indictment with having suffered a previous conviction, pleads either guilty or not guilty of the offense for which he is indicted, he must be asked whether he has suffered such previous conviction. If he answer that he has, his answer shall be entered by the clerk in the minutes of the court, and shall, unless withdrawn by consent of the court, be conclusive of the fact of having suffered such previous conviction in all subsequent proceedings. If he answer that he has not, his answer shall be entered by the clerk in the minutes of the court, and the question whether or not he has suffered such previous conviction shall be tried by the jury which tries the issue upon the plea of 'not guilty,' or, in a case of a plea of 'guilty,' by a jury impaneled for that purpose. The refusal of the defendant to answer is equivalent to a denial that he has suffered such previous conviction. In case the defendant pleads 'not guilty,' and answers that he has suffered the previous conviction, the charge of previous conviction shall not be read to the jury, nor alluded to on the trial." Section 1025, Pen. Code, 1873–74. The court below proceeded against the defendant under the last section. When the defendant appeared for arraignment he was asked by the court whether he had suffered the previous conviction charged in the information, and he answered that he had, but that he was not guilty of the subsequent offense with which he was charged. According to the section referred to, that made but a single issue to be tried by the jury, namely, the guilt or innocence of the subsequent offense. But both sections, 969 and 1025, were absolutely repealed on April 9. 1880, (Amendments to Penal Code, pp. 15, 19,) and there was no substituted legislation which authorized the proceeding which was taken against the defendant as to the charge against him of the previous conviction. The question asked him at the time of his arraignment was therefore illegal. He was not legally bound to answer it; and his answer could not be used against him as the equivalent of a verdict of guilty, upon which, in connection with a verdict of petit larceny, he could be adjudged guilty of felony and punished.

[1] This case, filed November 26, 1883, is now published, by request, with others, in order that the Pacific Reporter may cover all cases in volume 64, California Reports.

Manifestly, the legislature intended that a previous conviction of grand larceny, followed by a subsequent commission of the same offense, or of petit larceny, should constitute an aggravated offense, for which the offender ought to be punished as for a felony. But the charge of the previous conviction which entered into and made part of the aggravated offense was one to which the accused had the right to plead, and for which he had the right to be tried as in other cases. It is true that section 1158 of the Penal Code provides: "Whenever the fact of a previous conviction of another offense is charged in an indictment or information, the jury, if they find a verdict of guilty of the offense for which the defendant is indicted or informed against, must also find whether or not he has suffered such previous conviction, unless the answer of the defendant admits the charge," etc.; but that exception to the rule requiring the trial of an issue of fact having been swept away by the repeal of the section of the Code which required such an answer to be made, the defendant stood for trial upon his plea of "not guilty," and he could be tried only upon the issue raised by that plea, and be convicted only by a verdict of the jury that tried him. No person accused of a public offense can be required, by an unauthorized question asked him at his arraignment, to criminate himself, (section 688, Pen. Code;) nor can he be tried or convicted under the provisions of a law which has been repealed; nor can he be convicted unless by the verdict of a jury accepted and recorded by the court, or upon a plea of "guilty," etc., (section 689, Id.) Where, therefore, a person who has been convicted of a public offense, punishable by imprisonment in the state prison, commits another offense after such conviction, it is necessary, since the repeal of sections 969 and 1025 of the Penal Code, in proceeding against him by indictment or information, not only to charge the facts of the previous conviction and subsequent commission of crime, but to prove them. The defendant must plead to both charges; and, upon the issue raised by his plea, both must be proved on his trial, and be passed upon by the jury. There is no other mode of proving the facts. "A more severe penalty is denounced by the statute for a second offense; and all the facts to bring the case within the statute must be established on the trial." (Johnson v. People, 55 N. Y. 514;) and the jury must, by their verdict, find the charge of a previous conviction true or not true, (section 1158, supra.) Until there is such a verdict there can be no judgment of conviction upon the charge, and no punishment for an offense of which there has been no conviction. Being convicted only of petit larceny, the defendant was punishable, under section 490 of the Penal Code, by fine or by imprisonment in the county jail, or by both, within the limits fixed by the law; but he was not punishable as for a felony under subdivision 3, § 666, supra. The judgment pronounced was therefore erroneous.

Judgment reversed, and cause remanded, with directions to the court below to pronounce sentence within the limits prescribed by section 490 of the Penal Code.

PEOPLE v. FAHEY.[1]

FELONIOUS ASSAULT — CHARACTER OF WEAPON — JURISDICTION OF SUPERIOR COURT.

1. An assault with a brickbat weighing five pounds is within Pen. Code, § 245, which makes "an assault upon the person of another with a deadly weapon or instrument, or by any means or force likely to produce great bodily injury," punishable by confinement in the state prison or county jail.

2. The offense charged being a felony, the fact that it includes a possible misdemeanor, of which the superior court has no jurisdiction, does not deprive that court of jurisdiction to try and determine the offense charged.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Merced county.

Information against William Fahey for felonious assault. A demurrer to the indictment was sustained, and the state appeals. Reversed.

Atty. Gen. Marshall and Dist. Atty. Farrar, for the People. S. W. Geis and R. H. Ward, for respondent.

MCKEE, J. To an information charging the defendant with having committed the crime of "an assault by means likely to produce great bodily injury, to wit, with a brickbat weighing about five pounds," a demurrer was filed upon the grounds that the court had no jurisdiction of the offense charged, and that the complaint did not conform to the requirements of sections 950–952 of the Penal Code, and the court sustained the demurrer on the ground that it had no jurisdiction of the offense charged. This was error. Section 245 of the Penal Code provides that "every person who commits an assault upon the person of another with a deadly weapon or instrument, or by any means or force likely to produce great bodily injury, is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison or in a county jail not exceeding two years, or by fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, or by both." The offense charged was therefore a felony, of which the court had jurisdiction, (section 5, art. 6, Const.,) and the fact that the offense charged included within it a lesser offense, of which the defendant might be convicted, or that the court, in the exercise of its discretion, could inflict punishment within the limits prescribed by law upon any conviction which might be rendered in the case, in no way affected the jurisdiction of the court to try and determine it. Judgment reversed, and cause remanded for further proceedings, with direction to overrule the demurrer.

Ex parte KELLOGG.[2]

CONTEMPT—EXAMINATION BEFORE REFEREE—FAILURE TO DELIVER PROPERTY LIABLE TO LEVY.

An execution debtor, on examination before a referee, disclosed his possession and ownership of personalty liable to levy. During a continuance of the proceeding, while the referee had under advisement a motion for an order directing the debtor to deliver such property to the sheriff, the debtor delivered the property to another creditor in satisfaction of a debt. Held, that the debtor was rightly adjudged guilty of contempt.

In bank. Application by Calvin W. Kellogg for writ of habeas corpus. Writ denied.

Cowdery & McCutchen, for petitioner. I. B. L. Brandt, opposed.

ROSS, J. The petitioner claims to be illegally restrained of his liberty by the sheriff of the city and county of San Francisco, and seeks to be discharged on habeas corpus. The facts appear to be these: In 1882 one Rankin recovered a judgment in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco against the petitioner and others for the sum of $1,800, or thereabouts, on which execution was issued and placed in the hands of the sheriff. The execution having been returned wholly unsatisfied, an order was duly made by the court pursuant to section 714et seq. of the Code of Civil Procedure, requiring the petitioner to appear before a referee named, at a time and place specified, to answer concerning his property. Pursuant to that order the petitioner appeared before that referee on the 25th of June, 1883, and his examination was thereupon commenced. Pending the examination an alias execution upon the judgment was issued and placed in the hands of the sheriff. The next day—June 28th—the petitioner and the sheriff with the execution again appeared before the referee, and the examination of the petitioner continued, during which petitioner testified to his ownership and possession of certain articles of jewelry. Thereupon counsel for Rankin moved the referee for an order directing petitioner to deliver the property to the sheriff, to be applied towards the satisfaction of the execution. The referee took the motion under advisement, and continued the further hearing until July 2d, at which time, upon the request of petitioner, it was further continued until the next day, July 3d. During the last continuance petitioner delivered the property to one Cassin, to whom he claimed to have been indebted; and when, on July 3d, he, together with the other parties interested, appeared before the referee to receive his ruling upon the motion addressed to him, and the referee had made the order asked, petitioner responded by saying that he could not comply with the order for the reason that he had already turned the property over to Cassin. Upon these facts being brought to the notice of the superior court, that court cited petitioner to appear at a time and place stated, and show cause why he should not be punished for contempt in refusing to obey the order directing him to deliver the property to the sheriff, to be applied towards the satisfaction of the execution against him. At the time and place stated in the order to show cause petitioner duly appeared with his counsel, and answered the allegations against him, whereupon the court took proof, and from the evidence and papers in the case found the facts already detailed, and, further, that the delivery of the property by petitioner to Cassin was at his (petitioner's) own suggestion, and was made in anticipation of and for the purpose of defeating the order Rankin had asked for, and that to accomplish his purpose to defeat the process of the court petitioner had procured upon his own motion a delay in the proceedings, pending which he voluntarily and contumaciously disabled himself from complying with the order he anticipated being made, and, finally, that his acton "was but a bold attempt to defeat the order of the referee, duly and properly made, and cause the plaintiff's proceedings to be barren of any result." Finding such facts, the superior court rightly adjudged petitioner guilty of contempt, and imposed upon him appropriate punishment. Sections 128, 1209, Code Civil Proc.; Galland v. Galland, 44 Cal. 478; Myers v. Trimble, 3 E. D. Smith, 612. Writ dismissed, and petitioner remanded.

COMBINATION LAND CO. v. MORGAN et al.

(Nos. 14,345, 14,346.)

APPEAL—NUNC PRO TUNC ORDERS—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—SUFFICIENCY—SALE OF LAND—VENDOR'S LIEN—LIABILITY OF SECOND PURCHASER.

1. A nunc pro tunc order of a trial court, amending a former order, and made after the first order is appealed from, does not supersede the latter, but takes effect as of the date of the first order; and an appeal from the nunc pro tunc order is not necessary to give the supreme court jurisdiction of the case.

2. Plaintiff prefaced his specifications in the bill of exceptions with the statement that "the evidence introduced on said trial is insufficient to support said decision, and said decision is against law in the following particulars." Held, that the bill was not insufficient because it embraced two distinct grounds of motion, when it appeared from the specifications following the statement that the real ground of attack upon the decision was insufficiency of the evidence.

3. Where the purchaser of real estate receives notice that his vendor has not paid therefor, before he pays the purchase money, he takes the land subject to the prior vendor's lien to the extent of the purchase money unpaid by him, although he had no knowledge of such lien at the time he purchased.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; JOHN R. AITKEN and GEORGE PUTERBAUGH, Judges.

Action by the Combination Land Company against A. C. Morgan and Clara Foltz to foreclose a vendor's lien upon certain lands. From a judgment for plaintiff against defendant Foltz, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Noah Hodge, (George Fuller, of counsel,) for appellant. Hunsaker, Britt & Goodrich, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. In this case the plaintiff gave one notice of appeal from the judgment and from the order denying its motion for a new trial, and one transcript of the record would have sufficed for both appeals, but two transcripts of the same record have been filed,—one labeled "Transcript on appeal from the judgment," numbered 14,346, and the other labeled "Transcript on appeal from order refusing new trial;" numbered 14,345, thus apparently making two cases of what is practically one. All errors assigned and referred to in the argument are presented by the appeal from the order, and to that I shall confine my attention.

The objections urged by the respondent to the right of the appellant to be heard on this appeal are untenable. The order denying a new trial was made and entered June 21, 1890, and the notice of appeal designates it as of that date. After the appeal had been taken and perfected, the appellant, on the 19th of January, 1891, obtained a nunc pro tunc order of the superior court amending its order of June 21, 1890, by adding a recital, to the effect that the motion for a new trial was based and submitted on a bill of exceptions filed at the date of the hearing. The contention of the respondent is that the last order superseded the first, and was and is the only order denying a new trial, and that it never has been appealed from. We think, on the contrary, the second order merely corrected the first, and took effect as of the date of the order corrected. In legal effect there was but one order. The new trial was denied June 21, 1890, and the time for appealing began to run at that date. Another objection of the respondent to the consideration of the errors assigned (which relate solely to the sufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings) is that the bill of exceptions contains no specifications of the particulars in which the evidence is alleged to be insufficient. The plaintiff, in framing his bill of exceptions, prefaced his specifications with this statement: "Plaintiff says that the evidence introduced on said trial is insufficient to support said decision, and said decision is against law in the following particulars." The respondent claims that, because this statement embraces two distinct grounds of motion, he was not apprised by the following specifications whether the attack upon the decision was on the ground of insufficiency of the evidence to sustain it, or on the ground that it was against law. But we think that whatever view may be taken as to the distinction between a decision against evidence and a decision against law, and however ambiguous the expression above quoted may be held to be, the specifications by which it was followed in this bill of exceptions were amply sufficient to remove the ambiguity, and apprise the defendant that the real ground of attack upon the decision was insufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings of the court, to the effect that he was a bona fide purchaser without notice and for a valuable consideration.

The case, as presented, entitled the appellant to a hearing on the merits. The material facts are as follows: In December, 1887, the defendant Clara Foltz and the respondent, Morgan, agreed together that they would purchase from the plaintiff a small tract of land known as the "Sorrento." The price of the tract was $3,351.50. Foltz and respondent agreed that each would contribute one half of the purchase money; that Foltz should make the purchase, take a conveyance of the land in her own name, and hold a half interest in trust for respondent. In pursuance of this agreement, respondent gave Foltz his half of the purchase money, and she procured the conveyance to be made to herself. But she did not pay the entire purchase price in cash. There was a balance of $574.84, for which she gave her promissory note. Subsequently she and respondent agreed to make an exchange of lands; that is to say, respondent agreed to sell her a house and lot valued at $5,300, for which she was to pay by assuming a mortgage thereon, amounting to $2,400, by conveying the Sorrento,—her half interest therein being valued at $1,250,—and by making up the balance in money. In pursuance of this agreement she paid $1,000 in cash, conveyed the Sorrento to respondent, and gave him her note for the balance of $650. He placed her in possession of the house and lot, but retained the title as security for the payment of her note. Her conveyance of the Sorrento was made May 9, 1888, and it is found by the superior court, upon evidence which is sufficient to sustain such finding, that up to this date respondent had no notice of the fact that she had not paid to plaintiff the full purchase price of said tract at the date of her purchase; but before the respondent made any conveyance to her of the house and lot, and while he still held the title as security for her note, he was fully informed that there was still due from her to the plaintiff, upon the purchase price of the Sorrento, the amount of her note for $574.84.

This action is to foreclose the vendor's lien of the plaintiff on the Sorrento for said amount. The defendant Foltz suffered judgment by default. Her codefendant, the respondent, Morgan, defended upon the ground that he was a bona fide purchaser for value. The evidence, as above stated, is sufficient to sustain the finding of the court that he purchased in good faith, without any previous knowledge of the fact that his vendor had not fully paid her vendor, the plaintiff. But this is not sufficient to make out his defense. It was also necessary for him to show that he had paid for the land before he received notice of the vendor's lien, and this he had not done. The only payment he was to make was by conveyance of the house and lot which he exchanged for the Sorrento, and that he had not done before notice. The fact that he had placed Mrs. Foltz in possession was immaterial, so long as he held the title as security for the balance due. If, upon receiving notice of the amount of her indebtedness to plaintiff, he had paid it, there is no doubt that he could have enforced repayment from her. The amount so paid would simply have been deducted from the valuation placed on her interest in the Sorrento, leaving her indebted to him on the house and lot that much more, secured, like her note for $650, by the title which he held, and its collection enforceable by the same means. The authorities cited in the appellant's brief amply sustain the proposition that notice before payment is equivalent to notice before purchase, and that, when there has been a partial payment before notice to a second vendee of the original vendor's lien, he is affected pro tanto as to the residue. It is unnecessary to repeat these citations here. There is no direct and explicit finding that respondent paid for the Sorrento before notice of plaintiff's lien, nor is there any general finding which very clearly embraces such fact, though finding 3 was perhaps intended to embrace it. If the fact is not found, the judgment is erroneous; if it is found, the finding cannot be sustained. Upon either hypothesis, the appellant is entitled to a new trial. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Marin county; E. B. Mahon, Judge.

A. L. Rhodes, for appellant. E. M. Wilson, Craig & Meredith, and S. L. Rogers, for respondents.

McFarland, J. This action was brought against a large number of defendants to compel each of them to convey to plaintiff the legal title to the undivided one fifth of the part of a certain tract of land which each defendant claims to hold. Judgment was rendered for the defendant, and plaintiff appeals from the judgment upon the judgment roll alone, there being no bill of exceptions or statement. The answer of the defendants sets up several valid defenses; the findings of the court fully support those defenses; the conclusion of law is that the plaintiff should take nothing by his complaint, and that defendants should be dismissed with their costs; and the conclusion of law is amply warranted by the findings of fact. Moreover, the answer avers that the alleged causes of action stated in the complaint are barred by the provisions of several named sections of the Code of Civil Procedure, between sections 318 and 343; and the court finds that they were barred by the sections named. And as there is no evidence before us, and nothing in the record inconsistent with the finding as to the statute of limitations, this finding is itself conclusive of the case against appellant. We do not deem it necessary to state here the facts of this case, which extend over a period of more than 30 years. Counsel for appellant seems to contend only for these two propositions: First, that the grantee of the legal title from one who held it subject to some trust can never, under any circumstances, hold it adversely to the beneficiary; and, second, that although a beneficiary has fully settled with the trustee, and has completely and finally released and discharged him from all the obligations of the trust, such discharge cannot inure to the benefit of a bona fide purchaser of the title from the trustee. Neither of these propositions can be maintained. Appellant does not point out any specific error committed by the trial court, and we see no reason, either in law or equity, for disturbing the judgment. The judgment is affirmed.

Smith et al. v. Westerfield et al.

Distribution of Estates — Appeal — Time of Taking — Review — Right to Jury Trial — Cross-Examination.

1. An appeal from a judgment of heirship and final distribution cannot be considered unless taken within 60 days after the entry of such judgment, as required by Code Civil Proc. § 1664.

2. Where defendant, some days before trial, orally demanded a jury, plaintiff making no objection, and the day before trial defendant withdrew his demand, whereupon plaintiff served written demand, and at the opening of the trial asked for a jury, and defendant objected to a jury and to the submission of issues thereto, on the ground that no special issues had been settled, the overruling of defendant's objections, where the issues to be tried were made by the pleadings, and where the court itself found on all the issues submitted, was not prejudicial error; Code Civil Proc. § 1717, providing that, "if no jury is demanded, the court must try the issues; if, on written demand, a jury is called by either party, and the issues are not sufficiently made up" by the pleadings, the court, on due notice, must frame the issues and submit the same, with the evidence, to the jury for a verdict.

3. Errors apparent on the face of a judgment will only be reviewed on appeal therefrom, and cannot be considered on an appeal from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

4. Where a witness in her direct examination neither referred to a certain subject nor to anything connected therewith, she cannot be interrogated thereon in her cross-examination.

5. A ruling that incompetent evidence contained in a certain register is admissible is not prejudicial error where the record does not show that the register, though offered, was read to the jury.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Nevada county; Stanley A. Smith, Judge.

Proceeding for the distribution of the estate of William Westerfield, deceased. From the decree, Charles Westerfield and others appeal. Affirmed.

J. M. Walling and Jas. A. Stidger, for appellants. T. S. Ford and A. D. Mason, for respondents.

FOOTE, C. This contest arises on a cross petition for a decree of distribution of the estate of William Westerfield. The court below seems to have treated the matter as requiring incidentally, before final decree of distribution, under the provisions of section 1664, Code Civil Proc., that the question of heirship of the parties contestant should be determined, and did by its decree make such determination, and that "the plaintiffs, Mary B. Smith, Emma Danuser, Charles Westerfield, and Fred Westerfield, are the lawful heirs at law of, and the only heirs of, William Westerfield, deceased, and as such are entitled to inherit his estate, share and share alike." Afterwards a decree of final distribution was made, based upon the decision in this proceeding. No appeal is prosecuted from this last decree. But an appeal has been taken from the judgment or decree determining the question of heirship, and from an order denying a new trial. The appeal from the judgment cannot be considered, for the reason that the appeal was not taken until more than 60 days after the entry of the judgment. Sections 1664, 1715, Code Civil Proc.; In re Backus' Estate, (Cal.) 30 Pac. Rep. 796.

The point is made by the respondent that the notice of motion for a new trial is not sufficient, and that, therefore, the motion must necessarily have been properly denied. The motion was made upon the minutes of the court, and that which seems to us to be a statement on motion for a new trial, under section 661, Code Civil Proc. Respondent argues that the notice of motion does not show a sufficient statement of the grounds of the motion, and shows no sufficient specification of errors of law occurring at the trial and excepted to, and no sufficient specification of the particulars wherein the evidence was insufficient to justify the decision, nor any specification that the decision is against law. We have examined the notice with minute attention, and, while it is not in the form which would have rendered it most commendable, it is sufficient. It becomes necessary, then, to look into the statement with a view to determine if any errors were committed by the trial court in denying the motion for a new trial. Appellant claims that the court below committed error in submitting special issues to the jury upon the question of heirship, under section 1717, Id.; and that, as no written demand was made for a jury, the court erred in allowing one to be called and try the issues joined. The Code provision referred to provides as follows: "If no jury is demanded, the court must try the issues joined. If on written demand a jury is called by either party, and the issues are not sufficiently made up by the written pleadings on file, the court, on due notice to the opposite party, must settle and frame the issues to be tried, and submit the same, together with the evidence of each party, to the jury, on which they must render a verdict. Either may move for a new trial upon the same grounds and errors, and in like manner, as provided in this Code for civil actions." It appears from the statement that the defendants and appellants some days before had orally demanded a jury to try the issues raised. Plaintiffs made no objection, and the defendants did not put their demand in writing, but the day before that on which the trial commenced they withdrew their demand for a jury. The plaintiffs thereupon filed and served a written demand for a jury to try the special issues. At the opening of the court on the first day of the trial, plaintiffs asked for a jury in accordance with their written demand. The impanelment of the jury was objected to by the defendants, as well as the submission of the issues joined, because it was claimed that no special issues had been framed or settled. The court overruled this objection, for the reason that the issues to be tried were made up by the written pleadings filed. We perceive no prejudicial error in these acts of the court, particularly in view of the fact that the record shows that the court itself found upon all the issues submitted to the jury. Estate of Moore, 72 Cal. 339, 13 Pac. Rep. 880.

As to the point made that, in the form as made, the judgment was not authorized by law, we do not perceive how that can be considered on the appeal from the order denying the motion for a new trial; for errors apparent on the face of the judgment roll will only be reviewed on an appeal from the judgment, which appeal, as we have seen, is not before us. Thompson v. Patterson, 54 Cal. 543.

It is further assigned for error that on the cross-examination of Mary B. Smith, one of the plaintiffs, she was not allowed to answer the following question: "Question. When did you learn about the date your father came to the United States, and the vessel upon which he and your mother came?" The objection made was that it was not cross-examination, and irrelevant and immaterial, and that it was not founded upon a proper predicate that her father came to this country. It does not appear that the witness on the examination in chief had testified as to any of the matters referred to in the question, or anything connected therewith; hence we see no error in the ruling. Other questions were asked this witness in relation to the date on which her father and mother came on a vessel to the United States, and the name of such vessel, which were not allowed to be answered, on objection that they were not cross-examination, or the answers to which were on motion stricken out. We perceive no error in these rulings; the matters called for were not of a character proper to be adduced on cross-examination. So, also, the question asked the same witness with reference to whom she heard her mother say was the minister by whom she was married to the father of the witness, and the place where they were married, was improper, for it was not as to anything connected with what the witness had testified to in chief.

We perceive no error in the ruling excluding answers to other questions asked on cross-examination of this witness, or striking such answers out on motion of plaintiffs' counsel. As to the evidence contained in the great register of the county, to the offer of which in evidence defendants objected, it does not appear, although offered, and the court ruled that it was admissible, that it was read to the jury as evidence, and that makes it doubtful, at least, that it was so read. Page v. O'Brien, 36 Cal. 559. Therefore on the record it is not shown that error was actually committed, even if it would not have been permissible to read it to the jury. We have carefully examined the other alleged matters of error claimed to have been prejudicial to the defendants, but we do not agree with their contention in that behalf, and advise that the appeal from the judgment be dismissed, and the order refusing a new trial be affirmed.

We concur: Haynes, C.; Temple, C.

Per Curiam. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the appeal from the judgment is dismissed, and the order denying a new trial will stand affirmed.

Bradford v. Parkhurst. (No. 14,745.)

Sale of Real Estate—Purchase Money—Action to Recover Back—Abandonment of Contract.

1. Where time is of the essence of a contract for the sale of land, a failure by the vendor to tender a deed until after the time limited for performance does not constitute an abandonment of the contract so as to enable the purchaser to maintain an action to recover the part of the purchase money paid.

2. Where the purchaser of real estate refuses to pay the balance of the purchase money according to contract, he cannot recover back the money he has paid, while the vendor is willing and able to perform his part of the contract.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. Harris, Judge.

Action by Ward Bradford against D. W. Parkhurst to recover back the part of purchase money paid on a contract for the sale of land. From a judgment for defendant and an order refusing a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Geo. B. Graham, for appellant. Church & Cory, for respondent.

Temple, C. This appeal is from a judgment and an order refusing a new trial. The action is for money had and received for plaintiff's use, and for interest on "divers sums forborne by plaintiff to defendant at his request." The statement shows that between January 9 and March 31, 1888, defendant executed to plaintiff and his assignors seven contracts for as many distinct parcels of land. The contracts are alike, and are in the form of receipts for specified sums of money, part of the purchase price, followed by a recital as follows: "Leaving a balance * * * to be paid on said purchase, which by the terms of this sale is to be paid in three equal payments, with interest at the rate of ten per cent. per annum till paid, in like gold coin, within six, twelve, and eighteen months from date hereof. If paid as above stated, with all taxes, assessments, and charges of every nature that are or may be levied thereupon before the final payment and costs of conveyance, the above-named W. Bradford will be entitled to a deed for the above-described lot; otherwise this agreement becomes null and void, and the amounts now paid, together with all improvements on said land made, shall be forfeited. * * * If forfeited, the said W. Bradford shall thereafter be, and he hereby consents to be, tenant of D. W. Parkhurst, liable to be dispossessed upon three days' notice," etc. The contracts are signed only by the vendor. It was not shown, or attempted to be shown, that defendant had failed or refused to perform any part of his contract. On the other hand, it appears from the evidence that plaintiff, after having made the first payment, on being asked whether he intended to perform, said that he would make no more payments, and "I will see my attorney, and would like to see you get it." The evidence also shows that defendant tendered to plaintiff a deed in pursuance of the contract, but the tender was after the time limited for performance, and appellant contends that, time being of the essence of the contract, the tender was not effectual, and that defendant was in default; in short, that there had been a mutual abandonment and rescission of the contract, under the rule laid down in Cleary v. Folger, 84 Cal. 316, 24 Pac. Rep. 280. As that case has been overruled on this point by the recent case of Newton v. Hull, 90 Cal. 487, 27 Pac. Rep. 429, this contention must fail.

Now if we concede the law to be as appellant contends, that the contract could not have been enforced by defendant, because the agreement of the plaintiff was not put in writing, it does not follow that this suit can be maintained. Although defendant might not have been able to maintain an action for the purchase money, he was compelled to accept the money when tendered as payment upon the contract. This follows necessarily if it could have been enforced by plaintiff. The payment was founded upon a valuable consideration, and the consideration has not failed.

Appellant relies upon Drew v. Pedlar, 87 Cal. 443, 25 Pac. Rep. 749, as sustaining his position. But that case does not go to the extent of holding that a vendee can elect to consider the contract at an end, and recover what he has paid, when the vendor has not abandoned the contract. On that point that decision is explained by the more recent case of Phelps v. Brown, (No. 13,277,) filed August 9, 1892, 30 Pac. Rep. 774, as follows: "When a contract of sale and purchase of lands is abandoned or rescinded by the parties, the vendee, though in default, may recover back installments paid of the purchase money, less the actual damage to the vendor occasioned by his breach of the contract." This proposition cannot be controverted. It is old law. Palmer v. Temple, 9 Adol. & E. 508. The debatable point before these decisions was whether, in all cases when one party to a contract declines to go on with it because some material condition precedent has not been performed by the other party, he thereby abandons it so as to entitle a recovery for sums paid. No such question is involved here. The payments were made in part consideration for a conveyance, which the plaintiff can have whenever he chooses to comply with his contract. I advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

NEW TRIAL—STATEMENT—DEMURRER.

1. Code Civil Proc. § 659, subd. 3, provides that, if a notice of motion for a new trial designates that the motion will be made upon a statement of the case, on the grounds of insufficient evidence and errors of law, the statement must specify wherein the evidence is insufficient, and the particular errors relied upon, otherwise it must be disregarded on the hearing of the motion. Held, that if the statement on which such a motion was made does not make the specification required, the motion should be denied.

2. The overruling of a demurrer to a cross complaint, which makes the issue identical with that raised by the original pleadings, does not prejudice the party demurring.

Action by W. G. Millan against Christopher Hood to enforce a trust in land. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

John M. Fulweiler and Ben. P. Tabor, for appellant. A. L. Hart and F. P. Tuttle, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to enforce an alleged trust in land. Judgment for defendant, from which, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, the plaintiff appeals.

1. The notice of intention to move for a new trial stated, as the grounds upon which the motion would be made, only insufficiency of the evidence to justify the findings, and errors in law committed at the trial. It further stated that the motion would be made "upon a statement of the case." But the statement of the case, which was thereafter made and allowed by the court, contains no specifications of any particular in which the evidence is insufficient to justify the findings, nor of any error in law committed by the court. Therefore, in obedience to section 659 of the Code of Civil Procedure,[1] the trial court must have disregarded the statement, and consequently did not err in denying the motion for a new trial.

2. The plaintiff demurred to the following addition to the answer of defendant, on the ground that the same does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action against the plaintiff: "And further answering, and for a cross complaint, the defendant avers: (1) That he now is, and for a long time prior to the commencement of this action he was, the owner, in the possession and entitled to the possession of all that certain real estate described in the complaint, and particularly described as follows, to wit: The east half of the southwest quarter, and the southeast quarter of the northwest quarter, of section 13, in township 14 north, range 9 east, Mount Diablo base and meridian; (2) that the plaintiff herein claims some interest in said property adverse to the said defendant, but that said claim of plaintiff is without any right whatever, and that the said plaintiff has not any estate, right, title, or interest whatever in said land or premises, or any part thereof." The court overruled the demurrer, and thereupon plaintiff's counsel, who was present in court at the time, asked the court to allow him 20 days' time in which to answer the so-called cross complaint, and the court granted his request, but, plaintiff having failed to answer within 20 days, the clerk entered his default. Thereupon the plaintiff moved the court to open the default, and for leave to answer the alleged cross complaint, on the grounds that the default "was improperly entered, and, if properly entered, was the result of mistake, inadvertence, and excusable neglect." The motion was presented and heard on affidavits, and the proffered answer to the cross complaint. The court denied the motion, and plaintiff excepted. This motion, with the affidavits, proposed answer, minutes of the court, and other facts upon which it was heard, are made to appear by a bill of exceptions, settled and allowed before the trial, which may be considered on the appeal from the judgment. It is contended by counsel for appellant that the court erred in overruling the plaintiff's demurrer to the so-called cross complaint, and also in denying plaintiff's motion to open the default and to allow the plaintiff to file his proposed answer.

So far as the averments in the alleged cross complaint are material, they are mere repetitious facts alleged in the answer or in the complaint. They tendered no issue not made or tendered by the answer. They might have been stricken out without necessitating any change in the trial of the case. All the averments of the so-called cross complaint were redundant, superfluous, and, upon motion, should and probably would have been stricken out, (Code Civil Proc. § 453; Mora v. Le Roy, 58 Cal. 8;) yet the plaintiff could not have been injured by them, since, so far as they were not mere repetitions of material parts of the answer which constituted a valid defense, they affirmed only that plaintiff claimed the property in question adversely to defendant, which he expressly admitted in his proffered answer to the alleged cross complaint, and which is in perfect accord with his complaint, and there is in his said proffered answer no denial of any averment of the alleged cross complaint, except the averment that defendant is the owner of the property in controversy, and the issue made by this denial is identical with an issue raised by the pleadings independently of the alleged cross complaint. Were it deemed necessary, the action of the court probably might be justified on other grounds, furnished by the bill of exceptions; but, conceding that the court erred, it is sufficiently apparent that plaintiff's cause could not have been prejudiced thereby. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

[1] Code Civil Proc. § 659, provides that when a notice of motion for a new trial states that the motion will be made on a statement of the case, and "designates as the ground of the motion the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict or other decision, the statement shall specify the particulars in which such evidence is alleged to be insufficient; when the notice designates as the ground of the motion errors in law occurring at the trial and excepted to by the moving party, the statement shall specify the particular errors upon which the party will rely. If no such specifications be made, the statement shall be disregarded on the hearing of the motion."

LILLIS et al. v. EMIGRANT DITCH CO. (No. 14,509.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 9, 1892.)

DIVERSION OF WATER—RES ADJUDICATA—QUESTIONS DETERMINED—ADMISSIONS BY PLEADING—EVIDENCE.

1. Suit was brought to restrain a ditch company from diverting water from a slough. Defendant alleged that it had acquired a prescriptive right to divert, by means of a ditch of certain dimensions, about 100 cubic feet per second. The court found merely that defendant had acquired the right to divert sufficient water to fill such a ditch without specifying the number of feet which might thus be diverted or the capacity of the ditch. Held, that this was not an adjudication, under Code Civil Proc. § 1911, as to the number of feet which might be diverted, since the same did not appear on the face of the judgment, or as necessarily included therein, but only as to the right to divert a certain indeterminate amount, and defendant, therefore, was not confined in a subsequent action denying its right to take more than 40 feet, to the amount alleged in the previous action, but was entitled to prove its right to take a greater amount.

2. The fact that the capacity of the ditch several miles from the point of diversion was shown by uncontradicted testimony to have been much less than at the point of diversion would not impair the testimony as to its capacity at the point of diversion, where it appeared that much of the water was taken from the ditch before it had gone such distance.

3. The failure of the court to find upon the claim of plaintiffs that defendant had no right to divert any of the waters, except at times when there was more than 500 feet, could not be regarded as error, where the only evidence as to the said claim was the finding to that effect made by the court in the former action, and which, as being outside the issues in such action, could not have any greater effect as evidence than would any other declaration of the court.

4. An allegation in the complaint, stating that the court had, in the former action, determined defendant's right to divert a certain amount of water sufficient to fill its ditch, and that it had found defendant to have continuously diverted that amount, carried with it an admission that the court was right, and did not allow any contradiction of the plaintiffs by showing that a part of the water was taken down some distance into the ditch, and then returned through a waste way; nor was the effect of the admission qualified by a previous allegation that defendant had never permanently diverted more than 40 feet per second; for such allegation, being contradictory to that of which the court had rendered its determination, was to be taken as against the plaintiffs, and of the lesser weight.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. HARRIS, Judge.

Action by Lillis and others against the Emigrant Ditch Company. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Brown & Daggett and Daggett & Adams, for appellants. W. D. Tupper, for respondent.

HARRISON, J. The plaintiffs brought this action against the defendant to obtain a judgment declaring that the defendant is not entitled to divert from the channel of Cole slough any greater quantity of water than 40 cubic feet per second, or to divert from said channel any water whatever, except at times when there is more than 500 cubic feet of water per second passing down the channel, and by the head of defendant's ditch; and that the defendant be perpetually enjoined from diverting any water from said channel, except at such times and in such an amount. In their complaint the plaintiffs allege as grounds for such judgment that, in an action brought by them in the superior court of Tulare county, in October, 1883, against the defendant, for the purpose of obtaining a perpetual injunction against it from placing or maintaining a dam or other obstruction in Cole slough, and from diverting from said channel any of the waters thereof by means of its ditch or otherwise, the defendant in its answer to their complaint alleged that it had acquired a prescriptive right to divert from said channel, by means of a ditch 20 feet wide at the bottom and 40 feet wide at the top, about 100 cubic feet of water per second, measured under a four-inch pressure, and that plaintiffs' right of action was barred by the statute of limitations; and that upon the trial of the issues in said action the court found that the plaintiffs' right of action was barred by the statute of limitations, and that the defendant in the month of December, 1875, had acquired, and ever since had the right, as against the plaintiffs, to divert from the channel of said slough, by means of said dam and ditch, a sufficient amount of the waters flowing in said slough to fill a ditch 20 feet wide at the bottom and 40 feet wide at the top; upon which findings judgment was rendered that the plaintiffs take nothing by their action. The complaint herein further alleges that, at the time of the construction of said ditch by the defendant in 1875, it claimed the right to divert from said slough sufficient water to fill the ditch at such times when there was more than 500 cubic feet of water per second flowing down the channel by and beyond the head of the ditch, but that prior to October, 1883, of the 100 cubic feet of water per second which were diverted into said ditch, 60 cubic feet were at all times turned back into the channel; and that the defendant had not permanently turned away, or claimed the right to turn away, more than 40 cubic feet per second, and had not prior to October, 1883, acquired the right to divert and permanently turn away from said channel more than 40 cubic feet of water per second; that since the 12th day of October, 1883, and during the pendency of the aforesaid action, the defendant had deepened its said ditch and enlarged its carrying capacity, and had diverted and permanently turned away from the channel of the slough 190 cubic feet of water per second, and had threatened to, and unless enjoined from so doing would, permanently divert said quantity of water from said channel. The defendant in its answer herein traversed the allegations in the complaint which deny its right to divert the waters of the channel, and alleged, in substance, that by virtue of its acts in December, 1875, and subsequent thereto, it has acquired the right to divert from the channel of said slough a sufficient quantity of water to fill its said ditch; that the capacity of said ditch is sufficient to carry 190 cubic feet of water per second, and that it has by means of its said ditch and dam continuously since December, 1875, diverted that amount of water from the channel of said slough; and that the plaintiffs' cause of action is barred by the statute of limitations. Upon the trial of these issues the court found in favor of the defendant, and in its judgment adjudged and decreed "that in the month of December, 1875, the defendant acquired the right, and has ever since had and now has the right, as against the plaintiffs and the whole world, to divert from the waters flowing in Cole slough a sufficient amount thereof to fill a ditch twenty feet wide at the bottom and forty feet wide at the top, to wit, about one hundred and ninety cubic feet of water flowing per second, for the purposes of irrigation." From this judgment, and from an order denying a new trial, the plaintiffs have appealed.

The complaint in the judgment roll in the former action between the parties in the superior court of Tulare county, which was offered in evidence on the part of the plaintiffs at the trial herein, set forth the rights of the plaintiffs as riparian proprietors to the waters of Cole slough, and alleged that the defendant had prior to February, 1883, constructed a dam in the channel of the slough, by means of which, and through a ditch leading therefrom, which it had also constructed, it had diverted the waters away from the plaintiffs' lands, and had thereby caused them damage to the amount of $10,000, and that it threatened to continue said trespass and damage, for which the plaintiffs asked for a judgment of $10,000 damages, and that defendant be perpetually enjoined from maintaining said dam, or diverting any of the waters of said slough. The answer of the defendant therein traversed the allegations of trespass and damage, and, as a separate defense to the plaintiffs' right to maintain the action, alleged that, by virtue of its acts commenced in the year 1875, it had acquired a prescriptive right, by means of a ditch 20 feet wide at the bottom and 40 feet wide at the top, and a dam across the channel of the slough just below the head of said ditch then constructed by it, to divert from said slough about 100 cubic feet of water flowing per second, measured under a 4-inch pressure; and that the plaintiffs' cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations. Upon these issues the court found that the plaintiffs had not been damaged in any sum of money whatever by any act of the defendant, and also found that the defendant had acquired a prescriptive right to divert from the waters of the slough a sufficient quantity of water to fill its ditch 20 feet wide at the bottom and 40 feet wide at the top, and that the plaintiff's cause of action was barred by the statute of limitations. The court also found that the defendant had never claimed the right to divert, and had never in fact diverted, any of the waters of said slough except at times when there was more than 500 cubic feet of water flowing per second in said slough by the head of the defendant's ditch; and upon these findings judgment was rendered that the plaintiffs take nothing by their suit, and that the defendant recover from them its costs. It is contended by the plaintiffs that this judgment was a conclusive determination by the court that the right of the defendant to divert waters from said slough can be exercised only to the extent of 100 cubic feet of water per second, and to that extent only when there shall flow in the channel of the slough, by the head of its ditch, more than 500 cubic feet of water per second, and that by said judgment the defendant is estopped from claiming any other right of diversion of said waters.

A judgment rendered in any action upon the merits is a conclusive determination respecting the plaintiff's right of action upon the demand sued on, and operates as an estoppel in any subsequent action upon the same demand between the same parties. If the judgment be in favor of the plaintiff, it estops the defendant from afterwards setting up any other defense to the claim than was presented in that action, and if it be in favor of the defendant, it estops the plaintiff from afterwards presenting any other argument of evidence in support of that claim. It is for such a judgment that it is frequently said that it is conclusive, not only as to the matters which were therein litigated, but as to any other matter which might have been litigated therein. It has become a final determination of the rights of the parties in reference to the demand upon which it was rendered. If, however, the defendant in such action sets up a defense which is sufficient to defeat the plaintiff's demand, although the judgment is conclusive against the plaintiff as to any ground or matter which he might have presented in support of such demand, yet in an action by him against the defendant upon another demand it is not conclusive upon the defendant, either as to the defense which was pleaded therein, or as to any other defense which he might have interposed to the action. A judgment in favor of a defendant, upon an affirmative defense to the plaintiff's demand conclusively establishes the existence of the fact which constitutes that defense, and estops the plaintiff from questioning its sufficiency to defeat his cause of action, or from maintaining another action upon the same demand. It does not, however, estop the defendant in an action upon another demand from showing that the evidence by which that fact was established is sufficient to establish a different fact, nor does it limit such evidence to the determination of the defense which was then before the court. The issue then tried by the court was the right of the plaintiff to maintain his action, and the judgment as an estoppel is limited in its operation to that issue; but the fact by which the defendant defeated the plaintiff's right of recovery is not so limited, and may be invoked by him in support of a defense to any other demand by the same plaintiff. As to the successful party, the judgment is conclusive in favor of his right, but not as to all the means which he might have presented for the purpose of establishing that right. In other words, it is conclusive upon the issues, but not upon the facts necessary to establish those issues. In any other action between the same parties upon a different demand, though involving facts which were litigated in the former action, such judgment is conclusive only as to the same matters in issue which were determined in the former action, and which were also essential to the rendition of the judgment. In Caperton v. Schmidt, 26 Cal. 494, it is said: "Neither the judgment of a concurrent or exclusive jurisdiction is evidence of any matter which only comes collaterally in question, though within the jurisdiction; nor of any matter incidentally cognizable; nor of any matter to be inferred by argument from the judgment. The matter, to become as a plea, a bar, or as evidence conclusive, must have been directly in issue. 1 Greenl. Ev. 528; Fulton v. Hanlow, 20 Cal. 451, 486; McDonald v. Mining Co., 15 Cal. 145; Hopkins v. Lee, 6 Wheat. 109. It will be seen from the rule as here stated that the matter adjudicated, to become as a plea, a bar, or as evidence conclusive, must have been directly in issue, and not merely collaterally litigated. It must be a fact 'immediately found according to the pleadings, not that on which the verdict was merely based,—a fact in issue, as distinct from a fact in controversy.' Potter v. Baker, 19 N. H. 166; McDonald v. Mining Co., supra." "A fact or matter in issue is that upon which the plaintiff proceeds by his action, and which the defendant controverts in his pleadings, while collateral facts are such as are offered in evidence to establish matters or facts in issue; and notwithstanding they may be controverted at the trial, they do not come within the rule." Garwood v. Garwood, 29 Cal. 521.

In Cromwell v. Sac Co., 94 U. S. 351, the plaintiff had brought an action against the defendant upon certain coupons in which judgment was rendered in favor of the county upon the ground of fraud and illegality in the original issuance of the bonds. Subsequently the plaintiff in this action, who was the real party in interest in the former action, brought another suit upon other coupons on the same bonds, and, although it was contended that the former judgment was an estoppel against the recovery, yet it was held otherwise, and that the plaintiff was not estopped from proving that he had paid value, and was a bona fide purchaser, since the former judgment was not a conclusive determination that the bonds were invalid, but was conclusive only upon the fact that they were invalid in the hands of one who had not paid value for them. In Campbell v. Consalus, 25 N. Y. 613, an action had been brought to declare a mortgage satisfied on the ground that it had been paid, and an accounting between the parties was had therein, from which it was ascertained that there were $2,788 unpaid thereon, and thereupon judgment was rendered dismissing the action. Afterwards an action was brought to foreclose the mortgage, and it was contended that the former judgment was conclusive as to the amount unpaid thereon, but it was held otherwise upon the ground that the amount due on the mortgage was not put in issue in the former action, but only the fact whether the mortgage had been fully paid, and that the amount that was unpaid was only incidental and collateral to this main issue. See, also, Lewis and Nelson's Appeal, 67 Pa. St. 153; King v. Chase, 15 N. H. 9; Moulton v. Libbey, Id. 480; Stannard v. Hubbell, 123 N. Y. 520, 25 N. E. Rep. 1084. In Sweet v. Tuttle, 14 N. Y. 465, it was held that where the defendant, together with five others as plaintiffs, had brought an action in which a judgment was rendered against them, he was not estopped in a subsequent action against him by the defendant in the former action, arising out of the same transaction, from showing that seven others were jointly liable with him, and ought to have been joined as defendants in said action.

When, therefore, in the second action the former judgment is offered in evidence, it is necessary to ascertain in the first instance whether the cause of action upon which it was rendered is the same as that under prosecution, and, if so, it becomes, as a matter of law, conclusive upon the rights of the parties in the second action. If, however, the cause of action or demand upon which the former judgment was rendered is different from the one prosecuted in the second action, it is then necessary to ascertain as a question of fact what issues or matters were determined in the former action, and then to determine as a matter of law whether those issues and their determination were essential to the former judgment; for it is only issues upon which that judgment depends that the parties are estopped from litigating in any other action. Matters which were merely collateral or incidental to the former determination do not constitute an estoppel, even though they were litigated and decided therein; and the evidence which was introduced in support of such issues may always be introduced in support of a defense in any other action. The judgment in such a case does not become an estoppel as to all matters which might have been litigated therein, but only as to such as were actually litigated, and which were necessary to be determined by the court before rendering its judgment upon the demand or the defense. For example, if, in a suit in ejectment, the defendant alleges and proves a right to the possession of the land by virtue of having acquired an estate therein for years, he will not be precluded, in a subsequent action against him by the same plaintiff to quiet title to the same land, from showing that he was, at the time of the former judgment, the owner in fee of the land. "That only is deemed to have been adjudged in a former judgment which appears upon its face to have been so adjudged, or which was actually and necessarily included therein, or necessary thereto." Code Civil Proc. § 1911.

The former action between the parties hereto was brought by the plaintiffs for the purpose of recovering damages resulting from the diversion of the water, and to prevent the defendant from making any further diversion. The issue presented by the plaintiffs for determination by the court was the right of the defendant to make any diversion of the water, and for the purpose of meeting that issue it was incumbent upon the defendant to establish a right of diversion to such an extent as would preclude the plaintiffs from a recovery, but the limit of the extent to which that right had been acquired was immaterial, except as a matter of evidence upon the controverted fact in issue. If it had such right, the plaintiffs had no right to recover damages therefor, however much loss they might have suffered. The first question, then, to be determined, and the real issue before the court, was the right of the defendant to do the act which the plaintiffs charged as an invasion of their rights. If that right existed, the plaintiffs' cause of action fell, and, for the purpose of showing that such right did exist, the defendant pleaded and the court found that all the water which the plaintiffs showed to have been diverted by the defendant was taken under a right acquired by it by prescription. The amount of the diversion to which that prescriptive right extended was not an issue in the case. The court was not called upon to determine the extent of the prescriptive right, but only whether the diversion shown by the plaintiffs was within the limits of that right. The defendant did not seek any affirmative relief by reason of the prescriptive right thus set up, but had merely pleaded it as a defense to the plaintiffs' demand. It was incumbent upon the plaintiffs, in order to maintain their demand, to show to the court the entire extent of the diversion complained of, but it was only necessary for the defendant to show such facts as would defeat the showing made by the plaintiffs. If the judgment had been in favor of the plaintiffs, it would have been a conclusive determination against the defendant, by which it would have been estopped from afterwards showing a right to any diversion of the water; but the judgment in favor of the defendant only determined that the plaintiffs had no right to recover damages for any diversion that had been made by it, and did not estop the defendant from showing in another action that its prescriptive right was greater than was necessary for the defeat of the plaintiffs' claim in that action. In McDonald v. Mining Co., supra, the plaintiff, in a former action to recover damages for the diversion of water, had alleged the right to 1,000 inches of water, as against the defendants, and had recovered a verdict against them for damages. In a subsequent action, to enjoin them from diverting water from the stream, it was contended that the plaintiffs' right to this quantity of water had been determined in the prior action, but the court held that the averment in regard to the quantity of water to which the plaintiff was entitled was immaterial, and that his right to recover could not have depended upon such proof.

Upon the allegations and the evidence before it the court found in the present case that in the month of December, 1875, the defendant, under a claim of right, appropriated and diverted a portion of the waters flowing in said Cole slough, sufficient to fill a ditch 20 feet wide on the bottom and 40 feet wide on the top, leading out from Cole slough, and had each and every year since said month continuously, and by means of the same ditch and the same dam, under the same claim of right, taken and diverted sufficient water to fill said ditch for the purposes of irrigation, adversely to the plaintiffs and the whole world, and that said ditch is of sufficient capacity to carry about 190 cubic feet of water flowing per second, and that defendant has, by means of said ditch and dam as aforesaid, under the same claim of right, and in the same manner, during the same time, carried, taken, and diverted from said slough about 190 cubic feet of water flowing per second; and, as a conclusion of law, that it had acquired a prescriptive right to divert that amount of water from the slough. The evidence before the court was sufficient to sustain this finding, unless the judgment in the former action was conclusive against the right of the defendant to divert more than 100 cubic feet of water per second, but, as we have before seen, that judgment cannot be regarded as conclusive against the defendant upon this point. The judgment itself was merely a determination that the plaintiffs had no right to recover damages against the defendant for any diversion that it had made, and, aside from its determination of the facts implied in its finding upon the statute of limitations, the only issue determined by the court which was essential to the judgment was that the defendant had acquired a right "to divert from the waters flowing in Cole slough a sufficient amount thereof to fill a ditch twenty feet wide at the bottom and forty feet wide at the top, to be used for the purposes of irrigation." The effect of this judgment, and also of the determination of this issue, is not limited by the fact that the defendant therein in its answer, in addition to its plea of the statute of limitations, alleged that it had acquired the right to divert 100 cubic feet of water per second. That allegation was only a statement made by the party for the purpose of meeting the plaintiffs' demand. As an admission in the action in which it was made, the defendant would have been bound, but in any other action it would have no higher effect than any other statement. Boileau v. Rutlin, 2 Exch. 681. "As a mere statement or allegation, it had no greater effect than any other mere admission or assertion of a party respecting a material fact. As an admission, it was evidence, but not conclusive. In the judgment there was no determination of the fact. On the contrary, it simply shows that the plaintiffs failed in their action, and that the defendant recovered his costs." Sweet v. Tuttle, 14 N. Y. 470. The court did not purport, either in its finding or in its judgment, to determine the extent to which the defendant had acquired the right to divert the waters. It did determine that it had the right to divert a sufficient amount to fill a ditch of certain dimensions, but did not determine what that amount was, or the capacity of the ditch. In the present case it determines that that ditch is of sufficient capacity to carry about 190 cubic feet of water flowing per second, and that that is the amount which the defendant has during the exercise of its prescriptive right taken and diverted from said slough. The evidence was sufficient to sustain the finding of the court that the capacity of the ditch was sufficient to divert this amount of water per second. The contention of appellants that there was uncontradicted testimony that in a certain part of the ditch its capacity was much less does not impair the testimony respecting the capacity of the ditch at the point of diversion. The section of the ditch to which this evidence of the plaintiffs was directed was about three miles below the point of diversion, and the testimony as to its capacity at that point is not inconsistent with the testimony respecting its capacity at the point of diversion, since it was shown that much of the water was taken from the ditch before it reached that point.

The failure of the court to find upon the claim of the plaintiffs that the defendant had no right to divert any of the waters of the slough, except at times when there is more than 500 cubic feet of water in the channel, flowing past the head of the defendant's ditch, cannot be regarded as error. The plaintiffs were not entitled to a finding upon this issue, unless there was evidence before the court in support of their claim, nor unless a finding thereon would counteract the other findings to such an extent as to invalidate the judgment. The only evidence in support of the averment is the finding to that effect made by the court in the former action, but, as that finding was outside of the issues in that action, and did not enter into the judgment therein, it could not have any effect in that action, and cannot have any greater effect as evidence in the present action than would any other declaration made by the judge who tried the former action. See People v. Johnson, 38 N. Y. 63; Springer v. Bien, 128 N. Y. 99, 27 N. E. Rep. 1076.

The plaintiff Lillis was asked whether prior to the 12th day of October, 1883, the water that was diverted at the head of defendant's ditch was carried down to a point between two and three miles below the headgate of the defendant's ditch, and then a portion of it at that point turned back into a waste way, through which it returned to the slough. This question was objected to, and the answer excluded by the court. In this ruling the court did not err. The plaintiffs had alleged in their complaint that in the action brought by them against the defendant, October 12, 1883, it had been decided by the court that the defendant had prior thereto acquired the right to divert, by means of its ditch and dam, from the waters flowing in the slough, a sufficient amount thereof to fill a ditch 20 feet wide at the bottom and 40 feet wide at the top, and had since the month of December, 1875, continuously, by means of that ditch, and under its said claim of right, taken and diverted sufficient water to fill said ditch. This averment of such decision by the court carried with it the admission that the decision was sustained by sufficient evidence, and was in accordance with the fact, and was itself an admission of record which was inconsistent with the evidence thus offered, and the plaintiffs could not be permitted to contradict this admission. The effect of the admission was not qualified by a previous averment in the complaint that the defendant had not in fact at any time prior to October 12, 1883, permanently diverted more than 40 cubic feet of water per second from the slough, for such averment was itself contradictory to the averment of what the court had decided, and, between the two inconsistent averments, that respecting the decision of the court has the greater weight, and must be taken against the plaintiffs. Upon the case presented in their complaint, the plaintiffs, by this averment of the decision of the court, conceded, in legal effect, the right of diversion from the slough of water enough to fill the ditch, and it was immaterial that, after such diversion had been rightfully made by the defendant, some of the water found its way back to the slough. The plaintiffs, moreover, did not attempt to show that the defendant caused any of the water that had been diverted by it to be returned to the slough. The judgment and order are affirmed.

I concur: GAROUTTE, J.

PATERSON, J. I concur. I do not think it was essential in the former action for the court to determine the quantity of water flowing through the ditch, but, if it was material, such quantity was not fixed. The court by its decree in this action has made certain that which was left uncertain in that respect in the former case, where the findings described the quantity as being "sufficient to fill a ditch twenty feet wide at the bottom and forty feet wide at the top." Neither the findings nor the judgment in that case attempt to fix the number of cubic feet of water; and, as neither the depth of the ditch nor its grade is given, it is impossible to tell what the capacity of the ditch was. It is true the defendants in their answer in that action claimed that they had acquired by appropriation "the right to divert from said Cole slough, and to use for the purposes of irrigation and other purposes, as aforesaid, about one hundred cubic feet of water flowing per second, measured under a four-inch pressure of the waters thereof;" but as counsel for appellants himself states, the addition of the words "measured under a four-inch pressure" makes the whole description "an hydraulic absurdity. One hundred cubic feet of water per second is one thing. One hundred cubic feet of water, measured under a four-inch pressure, is altogether a different thing. In calculating the discharge of flowing water, the principles of hydraulics require that the discharge shall be measured by time or by pressure, and a discharge cannot, in the nature of things, be estimated by time and pressure together." The decree in this case describes the ditch exactly as it was described in the former action.

WARD v. MARSHALL. (No. 14,430.)

OFFICER—REMOVAL—REVERSAL OF JUDGMENT—SALARY.

Pen. Code, § 770, provides that from a judgment of removal from office "an appeal may be taken to the supreme court in the same manner as from a judgment in a civil action; but, until such judgment is reversed, defendant is suspended from his office. Pending the appeal, the office must be filled as in case of a vacancy." Held that, where a judgment removing a justice of the peace from office for willful misconduct therein is reversed on appeal, the justice is entitled to his salary during the period of removal, though another has filled the vacancy and been compensated therefor.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Solano county; A. J. BUCKLES, Judge.

Action by F. P. Ward against John Marshall to recover unpaid salary. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Raleigh Barcar, for appellant. O. P. Dobbins, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. The plaintiff was a justice of the peace within the county of Solano, and on April 29, 1889, was accused by the grand jury of that county of willful misconduct in office. He was tried upon this accusation, and convicted, and on June 17, 1889, the superior court made and entered its judgment in the proceeding, removing him from his office. In December following the plaintiff took an appeal to this court from that judgment, and on September 10, 1890, the judgment was reversed. One of the grounds for the reversal was that the accusation against plaintiff did not state facts sufficient to authorize the judgment. People v. Ward, 85 Cal. 585, 24 Pac. Rep. 785. On July 22, 1889, the board of supervisors of the county appointed one Parker to the office from which plaintiff had been removed by the judgment of the superior court. Parker qualified and discharged the duties of such office until the judgment removing plaintiff was reversed by this court, and the county paid to him the amount of the salary of such office during that period. The defendant here is the auditor of Solano county, and this is a proceeding to compel him to draw his warrant on the treasurer of that county in favor of plaintiff for the salary attaching to the office referred to between the date of the judgment of the superior court removing plaintiff therefrom and the reversal of that judgment by this court. The superior court gave judgment in favor of defendant, and the plaintiff appeals.

It will be seen from the foregoing statement of facts that the sole question for decision here is whether appellant is entitled to the salary of the office to which he was elected, and for which he had duly qualified, during the time he was suspended from the performance of its duties by the erroneous judgment of the superior court. It is claimed by respondent that, under section 770 of the Penal Code, which provides for an appeal from a judgment of removal from office, this question must be answered in the negative. That section is as follows: "From the judgment of removal an appeal may be taken to the supreme court in the same manner as from a judgment in a civil action; but, until such judgment is reversed, the defendant is suspended from his office. Pending the appeal, the office must be filled as in case of a vacancy." This section does very clearly provide that until the judgment of removal is reversed the defendant in the proceeding is suspended from his office, and that pending the appeal the office must be filled as in case of a vacancy; but there is nothing in this provision inconsistent with the right of such officer to receive the salary attached to his office if the final judgment in the proceeding shall be in his favor. The section must be construed as a whole, and the first sentence thereof, which gives to a defendant in such a proceeding the right to appeal from the judgment, must be allowed to accomplish its obvious purpose. Nothing can be clearer than that the legislature, by this provision, intended that the rights of a defendant in such a proceeding—his right to hold the office and receive its emoluments—should not be finally determined against him by the judgment of the superior court; and the right of appeal given by this section, in the absence of clear and explicit declaration to the contrary, must be held to secure to a defendant, if successful upon such appeal, the usual results which as between the parties flow from the reversal of a judgment, to wit, the restoration of all rights which had been taken from him by such erroneous judgment. The effect of a reversal of a judgment is to leave the parties where they stood before its rendition. Phelan v. San Francisco, 9 Cal. 16; Crispen v. Hannovan, 86 Mo. 168; Elliott, App. Proc. § 580. And this was the effect of the reversal of the judgment in the proceeding brought by the people of the state to remove plaintiff from his office, and he then became entitled to recover the salary of which he had been deprived by the erroneous judgment of the superior court. This right to receive such salary was not finally lost by him by such judgment, but only suspended during the period it remained unreversed. The plaintiff, by virtue of his election and qualification as justice of the peace, became entitled to the salary attached to such office during the term, if he should live so long, and was not guilty of any misconduct for which he should be removed, or did not otherwise forfeit his legal title to such office. The right to receive the salary is an incident which attaches itself to the legal title to the office. Dorsey v. Smyth, 28 Cal. 21; Burke v. Edgar, 67 Cal. 182, 7 Pac. Rep. 488; People v. Potter, 63 Cal. 127; Fitzsimmons v. City of Brooklyn, 102 N. Y. 536, 7 N. E. Rep. 787; Andrews v. Portland, 79 Me. 484, 10 Atl. Rep. 458. And when an officer is accused of misconduct in office, and an action brought to remove him therefrom, the question of his guilt or innocence can only be determined by the final judgment in the proceeding; and when in the action brought against plaintiff it was finally adjudged that he was not guilty of the misconduct charged against him, or that the accusation itself did not state facts which would justify his removal, the litigation was then terminated in his favor, and it would be unreasonable to hold that notwithstanding the final judgment, to the effect that he had done nothing to warrant his removal from office, yet he had by the erroneous and reversed judgment been deprived of all that made the office of any pecuniary value. The fact that during the time of his suspension from office its duties were performed by a person properly appointed for that purpose, and that the county has paid him the salary, does not affect the right of plaintiff to recover. He was, without fault on his part, and against his consent, released from the performance of the duties of such office for the period named. Fitzsimmons v. City of Brooklyn, 102 N. Y. 536, 7 N. E. Rep. 787; Andrews v. Portland, 79 Me. 485, 10 Atl. Rep. 458. Judgment reversed.

Rose v. Foord. (No. 14,060.)

Sale of Shares of Stock—Failure to Issue—Recovery of Purchase Money—Statute of Limitations—Demand.

1. Where the purchaser of shares of stock to be issued by a mining corporation pays the purchase price, and the corporation is prevented by an injunction from issuing the stock so that the vendor cannot perform his contract, the purchaser, after waiting a reasonable time and making demand for the repayment of the purchase money, may maintain an action therefor against the vendor's administrator.

2. Where, in such case, it appears that the sale was made in 1882, and demand for repayment of the purchase money was made on the vendor's administrator in 1888, the action is not barred by the statute of limitations, since it did not accrue until demand was made.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Walter Van Dyke, Judge.

Action by Rose against Foord, as administrator of the estate of N. R. Vail, deceased, to recover the purchase money paid for shares of stock to be issued by a mining corporation. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order refusing a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Lee & Scott, for appellant. Chapman & Hendrick, for respondent. John J. Roche and Gordon & Young, amici curiæ.

Beatty, C. J. In November, 1882, the plaintiff and defendant's intestate, N. R. Vail, made an agreement in writing by which said Vail sold and promised to deliver to plaintiff 18,750 shares of stock in a mining corporation then about to be formed in the state of New York; the shares so to be delivered being one half of the whole number to which said Vail claimed he would be entitled on the completion of the incorporation. The purchase price of the stock ($4,000) was paid by the plaintiff at the date of the contract. The corporation was subsequently formed, but the issuance of its stock was enjoined at the suit of third parties, and the injunction has never been dissolved. In March, 1888, Vail died, and in due time thereafter plaintiff presented a proper demand to his administrator for the repayment of the $4,000 advanced by him as the purchase price on said stock. His demand being refused, plaintiff commenced this action to recover said $4,000, as money had and received to his use. The findings and judgment of the superior court were in favor of the plaintiff, and defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial.

The appellant contends that the superior court erred in finding that plaintiff was a purchaser of stock to be issued, claiming upon the evidence that he was really a purchaser of an interest in the mine, and upon this proposition mainly he bases his defenses to the action. We think, however, that the evidence very fully and clearly sustains the findings of the court as to the real nature of the contract which is embodied in a series of letters written and received by the respective parties. But, admitting that the contract was as the court found it, the appellant still contends that the plaintiff mistook his cause of action, and that the action is barred by the statute of limitations. Without noticing specially the various points made in the argument, it is sufficient to say that the stock which was the subject of the sale, never having been issued, must be regarded as never having come into existence, and the plaintiff, therefore, after waiting a reasonable time for its issuance, had a right to demand and receive back the money advanced upon the purchase. He was not confined to an action for damages for breach of contract to sell and deliver, and, indeed, such an action would have afforded him no redress; for the stock, never having had an existence, had no market value, and the rule of damages in such actions (Civil Code, §§ 3309, 3336) could not have been applied. The right to recover the purchase money and interest in such a case is affirmed in Peat Fuel Co. v. Tuck, 53 Cal. 304, and in Maher v. Riley, 17 Cal. 415.

The proposition that the statutory rule of damages for breach of contract to sell personal property does not apply, and that other rules do apply when the subject of the sale has no market value, is sustained by the decision in McKay v. Riley, 65 Cal. 623, 4 Pac. Rep. 667. The plaintiff, then, we repeat, had a right, after waiting a reasonable time for the issuance of the stock, to demand back the purchase money; and, until he made such demand, its retention by the vendor was lawful, there was no cause of action to recover it, and the statute of limitations did not begin to run. No doubt the plaintiff might reasonably have made such demand long before Vail's death, but he never did. On the contrary, he accepted Vail's excuses for the delay, and offered to contribute to the expenses of procuring a dissolution of the injunction, which alone prevented the issuance of the stock. In short, he stood by the contract and waited for the stock till Vail died, and it does not lie in the mouth of the defendant to say that he waited too long. When he chose to wait no longer, and to demand back his money, he had an undoubted right to receive it. The judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. WONG ARK. (No. 20,919.)

JURY—ACTUAL BIAS—APPEAL—RES GESTÆ.

1. Pen. Code, § 1170, subd. 2, providing that exceptions may be taken by defendant in a criminal case to a decision of the court "in admitting or rejecting testimony on the trial of a challenge to a juror for actual bias," does not authorize an exception to a ruling on the challenge, or a review of such ruling.

2. Such statute, so far as it denies the right of appeal from a decision as to actual bias of a juror, is unconstitutional, as denying the right of trial by an impartial jury. Per Garoutte and De Haven, JJ.

3. On a trial for murder, evidence that, a few minutes after the shooting, deceased said that defendant shot her, is not admissible as part of the res gestae. People v. Vernon, 35 Cal. 51, disapproved.

4. Under Pen. Code, § 1123, providing that, if a juror becomes sick and is discharged, a new juror may be sworn and the trial begin anew, when a new juror is sworn defendant is entitled to all the peremptory challenges he had in the first instance. People v. Stewart, (Cal.) 28 Pac. Rep. 112, followed.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; J. W. MCKINLEY, Judge.

Wong Ark was convicted of murder. From an order denying a motion for a new trial, and from the judgment, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Jesse Hardesty, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

PATERSON, J. The appellant was convicted of murder, and sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison for life. A motion for a new trial was made and denied, and from the order denying the motion, and from the judgment, the defendant has appealed. The appellant's chief contention is that the court abused its discretion in overruling the defendant's challenge for actual bias, made to several of the persons who were examined as to their qualifications to serve as jurors. Section 1170 of the Penal Code does not provide for the exception to a challenge for actual bias, and it has been held here in several cases that there is no exception, and that there can be no review of the ruling upon such a challenge. The appellant contends, however, that the section referred to is unconstitutional and void, because "it deprives the accused of the right to except to the decision of the trial court in disallowing a challenge for actual bias, urged by the accused against a proposed juror, and takes away from the accused the safeguard of a trial by an impartial jury, and deprives him of his life or liberty 'without due process of law.'" But we are not called upon to determine the constitutionality of the act. We have examined the testimony of each juror, given upon his voir dire, and are satisfied that the challenges were properly denied. To establish actual bias there must be shown "the existence of a state of mind on the part of the juror in reference to the case, or to either of the parties, which will prevent him from acting with entire impartiality, and without prejudice to the substantial rights of either party." Section 1170, Pen. Code. The testimony fails to show that there existed in the mind of any of the jurors any prejudice, either with reference to the facts of the case or the parties to the action.

At the trial a police officer of the city of Los Angeles was permitted to testify that, after the shooting, he ran to the place where the deceased was lying on the porch, (a distance of about 140 yards,) and "had a conversation with her for possibly half a minute, or a little longer;" that, when he reached the place where she was lying, there were several persons present. Against the objection of the defendant, the witness was permitted to state that the deceased declared that the defendant was the man who had shot her. This ruling of the court was erroneous. The declaration was not made in the presence of the defendant, and it was not admissible as a dying declaration, because no foundation therefor was laid. If admissible at all, it was only as a part of the res gestæ.

It is often difficult to determine what acts or declarations are part of the res gestæ. There is an apparent conflict in the authorities on the subject. Each case must be determined upon its own peculiar facts. Wharton says: "The distinguishing feature of declarations of this class is that they should be necessary incidents of the litigated act; necessary in this sense: that they are part of the immediate concomitants or conditions of such act, and are not produced by the calculated policy of the actors. * * * The rule before us, however, does not permit the introduction under the guise of res gestæ of a narrative of past events, made after the events are closed, by either the party injured or by the bystander." At the time the declaration referred to was made, the shooting had been done, and the assailant had escaped from the scene of the shooting. The declaration was not the fact talking through the party, but the party's talk about the facts. Whart. Crim. Ev. §§ 266, 691. The subject under consideration was carefully considered by Mr. Justice Sharpstein in People v. Ah Lee, 60 Cal. 85, and the views therein expressed we think are correct, and applicable to the case at bar.

During the impanelment of the jury, and after nine jurors had been selected and sworn to try the case, two of the jurors were excused on the ground of illness. At that time the defendant had exercised 9 of the 20 peremptory challenges allowed him by law. The remaining 7 jurors were retained, and additional men were called to fill the panel. When 11 jurors had been sworn to try the case, the defendant had exercised in all 20 of the peremptory challenges. The defendant attempted to excuse by peremptory challenge the twelfth juror called, but the court held that he had already exhausted the peremptory challenges allowed him by law, refused to allow the challenge, and directed the clerk to swear the juror, which was done. The court erred in not allowing the defendant to exercise the peremptory challenge. Section 1123, Pen. Code;[1] People v. Stewart, 64 Cal. 61, 28 Pac. Rep. 112; People v. Brady, 72 Cal. 492, 14 Pac. Rep. 202.

We have examined the instructions given to the jury, and think they state the law applicable to the case fully, fairly, and correctly. The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial.

We concur: McFarland, J.; Sharpstein, J.

Harrison, J. I concur in the reversal upon the ground that the court erred in permitting the police officer to give evidence of the declarations of the deceased.

Garoutte, J. While concurring in the opinion of Mr. Justice Paterson, I deem some of the matters presented by this appeal to be of such grave importance that a further consideration of them will not be labor lost. The case of People v. Vernon, 35 Cal. 51, is the leading case in this state upon the question of res gestæ, and it was undoubtedly upon the authority of that case that the trial court admitted the evidence of which appellant now complains. Measured by the doctrine there declared, the ruling of the court in this case was correct; but I think that decision rests upon no sound legal principle, and it should be expressly so declared, in order that it shall no longer serve as a shining light held in the hands of res gestæ for the sole purpose of leading nisi prius courts upon fatal rocks of error. The term "res gestæ" is defined as the "things done," or, liberally speaking, may be said to be "the facts of the transaction." Was this statement made by the deceased, under the circumstances disclosed by the record, part of the res gestæ or things done, or was it a statement of a matter pertaining to a past event,—a matter entirely completed and concluded? While, owing to the varying phases of human affairs, it is not possible to lay down a rule which will determine what is the res gestæ in every case, yet all criminal law writers agree that declarations merely narrative of a past occurrence cannot be received in evidence as proof of the existence of such occurrence upon the principle of res gestæ. Wharton on Evidence, § 259, says: "The 'res gestæ' may be therefore defined as those circumstances which are the automatic and undesigned incidents of a particular litigated act, and which are admissible when illustrative of such act. * * * Incidents that are thus immediately and unconsciously associated with an act, whether such incidents are doings or declarations, become in this way evidence of the character of the act. They are admissible through hearsay, because in such cases, from the nature of things, it is the act that creates the hearsay, not the hearsay the act. It is the power of perception, unmodified by recollection, that is appealed to, not of recollection modifying perception; whenever recollection comes in,—whenever there is opportunity for reflection and explanations,—then statements cease to be part of the res gestæ."

Weighed in the balance furnished by Mr. Wharton, the Vernon Case meets no requirement of the law. The facts of that case were as follows: "It appears from the evidence, as presented in the record that a witness, Dainty, resided about two hundred feet from the residence of the prisoner; that deceased called at witness house on Friday evening, the 21st of December, between ten and eleven o'clock, and requested him to go with deceased to the house of the prisoner for the purpose of amicably arranging a recent difficulty between prisoner and deceased. Dainty told deceased to wait till he put on his clothes and he would go along, to which deceased replied that he would go along and see prisoner if he was up, and if he was in bed he would call him up, and witness could come along. Witness dressed himself and started, had passed about half the length of his porch, when he heard a shot; continued to advance towards prisoner's house, and immediately heard three more shots in quick succession, and when he got about halfway to prisoner's house met deceased walking fast from the direction of prisoner's house. That it was about half a minute, and not exceeding three quarters of a minute, from the time witness heard the first shot till he met deceased, who immediately said he had been shot treacherously by defendant; that he (deceased) was sitting down on defendant's porch; that defendant came out to the door and spoke to him, and said, 'Wait till I go and put my boots on;' and, instead of going to put his boots on, he came out with a gun and shot him when he was sitting on the porch; that, when he [deceased] got up to go away, defendant followed after, and shot him in the back." Upon this state of facts the court admitted the statements of the deceased as being part of the res gestæ. The assignment of error in this regard was disposed of in a somewhat summary manner upon the authority of Greenl. Ev. § 108; Mitchum v. State, 11 Ga. 615; and Com. v. McPike, 3 Cush. 181. It is perfectly apparent that the statements of the deceased to the witness were purely narrative of a past event. They formed no part of the transaction, were no element of the thing done, and in no sense spontaneous or automatic, and we find nothing in the citation from Greenleaf as authority to support the decision.

[1] Pen. Code, § 1123, provides that "if, before the conclusion of the trial, a juror becomes sick, so as to be unable to perform his duty, the court may order him to be discharged. In that case a new juror may be sworn, and the trial begin anew, or the jury may be discharged, and a new jury then or afterwards impaneled."

In Com. v. McPike the record is as follows: "The attorney for the commonwealth called Benjamin D. Shaw as a witness, who testified that, about the time mentioned by the preceding witness, he heard the voice of a woman crying 'Murder!' as she was going upstairs. He got up, and, going towards the room, met the last witness coming out, who told him not to go up, for the defendant would kill her, and he then saw the defendant coming out of the room. The witness then went for a watchman, and, coming back, went immediately up to the room where the deceased was, and there found her on the floor bleeding profusely. She asked the witness for some water, and to go for a physician. She said that John (meaning the defendant) had stabbed her, and told the witness what she wanted done if she died." Upon appeal the court held the statement of the deceased admissible upon the ground that the period of time at which these acts and statements took place was so recent after receiving of the injury as to justify its admission as part of the res gestæ, and upon the further ground that in the admission of testimony of this character much must be left to the exercise of the sound discretion of the presiding judge. These grounds are untenable. Neither upon principle nor authority does the fact (of itself) that the statement was made within a very few moments after the injury was received, stamp such statement as res gestæ. As to the second ground relied upon to support the admission of the evidence, the same court said, in Lund v. Inhabitants of Tyngsborough, 9 Cush. 41, referring to the admission of evidence as res gestæ: "Its admission is not left to the discretion of the presiding judge, as has been sometimes supposed, but is governed by principles of law, which must be applied to particular cases as other principles are applied in the exercise of a judicial judgment." In the decisions of the New York courts we find the McPike Case referred to, as carrying the doctrine of res gestæ to exteme lengths, and in the subsequent adjudications by the Massachusetts courts upon this question Com. v. McPike does not appear to be recognized as a precedent for future guidance. From the facts of that case it appears that, after being wounded, the woman went upstairs to a room. The witness then went for a watchman, and upon his return to the room found her lying upon the floor, and then she said that "John had stabbed her," asked for water, and requested that he should go for a physician. It is entirely apparent that her statement as to the stabbing was the narrative of a past event, and should not have been admitted as res gestæ. It was no more a part of the res gestæ than if the statement had been made to the witness upon his return after calling the physician.

We will not pause to review the Georgia case, the remaining authority relied upon to support People v. Vernon, but will only say it appears to possess some substantial marks of difference from the other cases, although probably in line with them. There are a few English cases also supporting People v. Vernon, notably Rex. v. Foster, 6 Car. & P. 325, and Thompson v. Trevanion, Skin. 402; but in Rosc. Crim. Ev. p. 29, the learned author in referring to these cases says: "These two cases are difficult to reconcile with established principles." In the case of Reg. v. Bedingfield, 14 Cox, Crim. Cas. 341, the evidence disclosed that the deceased went into her house, from which she emerged quite suddenly in a minute or two, coming towards the witness, who was in the yard. Her throat was cut. She was bleeding very much. She said something, pointed towards the house, and died within a few minutes. Her statement was offered as res gestæ, and excluded by Chief Justice COCKBURN, upon the ground that it was not part of anything done or said, but something said after the act was completed and concluded. The chief justice said: "Anything uttered by the deceased at the time the act was being done would be admissible, as, for instance, if she had been heard to say something, as 'Don't, Harry.' But here it was something stated by her after it was all over, whatever it was, and after the act was completed." The legal soundness of this decision was attacked by some of the law writers of the day, and the chief justice answered these attacks in a pamphlet supporting his decision, and, among other cases, reviewed and dissented from Com. v. McPike, heretofore cited. The tendency of the later decisions of the court has been to restrict within narrow limits this species of testimony, and modern authority would seem to support the Bedingfield Case. In referring to it in Rosc. Crim. Ev., at page 40, the author says: "This decision gave rise to some discussion. * * * It should seem that the ruling of COCKBURN, C. J., was correct, if it is to be taken as a fact that the transaction was entirely at an end, which appears to be the case." The case at bar presents a much stronger array of facts for appellant than is disclosed in that case.

No rule can be laid down for all cases. Each case must be tested to a great extent by its own facts, but the fact that the statements may have been made immediately subsequent to the wounding or killing is in no sense true indicium that they are res gestæ. When the statements are the spontaneous outgrowth of the main fact, when, as Mr. Wharton says, "they are the act talking for itself, and not what people say when talking about the act," then they become res gestæ; otherwise they are merely narrative of a past event, and, in the interest of truth and justice, should be rejected. Again, statements made with a view to the apprehension of the offender are in no sense res gestæ, and the statement of the deceased here considered is of that character. In this case the "thing done" was the shooting. The officer was not present at the time, but was 140 yards distant. He traveled that distance, and found the deceased lying upon the sidewalk, and several Chinese in her immediate presence. An opportunity for reflection and recollection had presented itself, and corrupt influences may have suggested her statement. It was a statement that defendant did the shooting. It was a narrative of a past event; in no respect an automatic or spontaneous incident of the shooting; no part of the thing done; and should not have been placed before the jury.

It is insisted by appellant that the court erred to the prejudice of his substantial rights during the formation of the jury by overruling his challenge to certain jurors upon the ground of actual bias, to wit, the existence of a state of mind on the part of the juror, in reference to the case and to the defendant, which would prevent him from acting with entire impartiality and without prejudice to the substantial rights of the defendant. The appellant excepted to the order of the court denying his challenge, and now asks that such ruling be reviewed. The accused exhausted all the peremptory challenges given him by law, and these men whose competency as impartial jurors is now attacked formed part of the jury which rendered the verdict. We are met at the threshold of the examination by the objection that under section 1170 of the Penal Code, supported by a long line of decisions, there is no exception allowed to a defendant from a ruling of the court denying a challenge for actual bias, and that consequently there is no appeal to this court from such ruling. This brings us to a consideration of that section of the Code before we can look into the evidence. It reads as follows: "On the trial of an indictment or information exceptions may be taken by the defendant to a decision of the court: (1) In disallowing a challenge to the panel of the jury, or to an individual juror, for implied bias; (2) in admitting or rejecting testimony on the trial of a challenge to a juror for actual bias; (3) in admitting or rejecting testimony, or in deciding any question of law not a matter of discretion, or in charging or instructing the jury upon the law upon the trial of the issue."

When the legislature said the accused was entitled to an exception to a decision of the court in admitting or rejecting testimony on a trial of a challenge to a juror for actual bias, that enactment was of little practical benefit to a defendant charged with crime. We are acquainted with but a few cases from our reports, (and there the question arose under peculiar circumstances) in which an appellant has ever secured a new trial by availing himself of the benefits of the exceptions therein secured, although the right of a person charged with crime to have his guilt or innocence passed upon by 12 impartial jurors has been recognized and declared sacred, not only by the common law, but by the supreme law of every state of this Union. While it is not clear that any valuable rights are given to the defendant under this provision of law, it is very apparent therefrom that the legislature intended to deprive him of the right to review the action of the lower court in denying a challenge to a juror for actual bias. That is not only apparent from the section, but this court has repeatedly held such to be its object and effect. In other words, each of twelve jurors may state upon his voir dire that he has a fixed and settled opinion of the defendant's guilt, or that he has such a bias and prejudice against the defendant that he could not act with entire impartiality in the trial of the case, and if thereupon the court should deny a challenge to each of the said jurors upon the ground of actual bias, and impanel them as a jury to try the case upon a verdict of guilty by such a jury, the defendant might suffer death, for the legislature has said that he should be forever barred from raising in the higher court any inquiry as to the condition of mind of the men who convicted him at the time they took their places in the jury box. This section of the Code, under the construction given it by the various decisions of this court, is unconstitutional, and no extended examination of fundamental principles is necessary in order that its unconstitutionality may be made plain. The legislature of the state has power to formulate and regulate the practice of the law and the procedure under the law, but subdivision 2 of section 1170 involves principles broader and deeper than any mere question of practice or procedure.

Article 6 of the amendments to the constitution of the United States says: "In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury. * * *" Section 7, art. 1, of the constitution of the state of California, reads: "The right of trial by jury shall be secured to all and remain inviolate." And when the constitution of this state guaranties to all the right of trial by jury, it means an impartial jury; as Blackstone says, (book 4, p. 350,) a jury of "freeholders without just exception." Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, pp. 390-393, says: "Accusations of criminal conduct are tried at the common law by jury; and, whenever the right to this trial is guarantied by the constitution without qualification or restriction, it must be understood as retained in all those cases which were triable by jury at the common law, and with all the common-law incidents to a jury trial, so far, at least, as they can be regarded as tending to the protection of the accused. * * * Many of the incidents of a common-law trial by jury are essential elements of the right. The jury must be indifferent between the prisoner and the commonwealth." See, also, People v. Powell, 87 Cal. 348, 25 Pac. Rep. 481. In Stokes v. People, 53 N. Y. 171, the court said: "The position of the counsel for the accused is that the right of trial by jury is secured to persons accused of felony by the constitution, and that this secures the further right of trial by an impartial jury. We shall assume the correctness of the latter position. Any act of the legislature providing for the trial otherwise than by a common-law jury composed of twelve men would be unconstitutional and void, and any act requiring or authorizing such trial by a jury partial and biased against either party would be a violation of one of the essential elements of the jury referred to in and secured by the constitution." In the case of State v. McClear, 11 Nev. 39, principles similar to those here involved were exhaustively discussed, and the entire range of authorities bearing upon the question reviewed, by HAWLEY, C. J., and it was there decided that it was not within the power of the legislature to deprive a citizen accused of crime of the right to challenge a juror for actual bias, and an act of the legislature to that effect was declared unconstitutional. That act was declared invalid upon the ground that the accused, under the supreme law of the land, was entitled to a trial by an impartial jury, a jury indifferent between the people and the accused, and to deprive him of the right to challenge jurors for actual bias was to deprive him of the right to be tried by an impartial jury. Section 1170 of the Penal Code does not go to the extent of the act which was under consideration in the McClear Case, but does go to the extent of declaring that, when the trial court has adjudged that a juror is an impartial juror, the matter is foreclosed, and no further inquiry shall ever be made. In other words, upon such an adjudication the court could commit no error, could do the defendant no wrong, and therefore no right of appeal should exist.

The constitution of this state vests in this court appellate jurisdiction in all criminal cases prosecuted by indictment or information in a court of record on questions of law alone, and no act of the legislature, or omission to act, can subtract anything from the jurisdiction conferred by the constitution, or fetter this court in the exercise of that jurisdiction. As the legislature has no power to grant the court jurisdiction, it has no power to deprive the court of jurisdiction. The jurisdiction of this court came from a source of power above and beyond the legislature of the state, and the court can only be deprived of it by the power from whence it came. This court has appellate jurisdiction of the present case upon all questions of law, and when the accused comes before the court, saying that he has been convicted of a felony by a verdict of a jury composed of 12 men, who were not impartial jurors, presents in a legal manner the evidence upon which he relies to establish such facts, and asks us to review that question as an error of law committed by the lower court, we are bound under the constitution to grant his request, notwithstanding the legislature may have declared that he shall not be entitled to an appeal as to such matter.

If the defendant has been tried and convicted by a jury of men whose minds were biased against him when they entered the jury box, he has been deprived of substantial rights; for he has been deprived of rights guarantied to him by the constitution,—the same constitution that created this court, and imposed upon it the duty of protecting all men in the enjoyment of every right vouchsafed to them by that instrument. The legislature could as well have enacted that the accused should not be entitled to an exception from an order of the court compelling him to be tried by an impartial jury of 10 men, or from an order depriving him of the right to any jury trial whatever. Justice would probably overtake him under these conditions, but it would be a mockery of justice to submit his guilt or innocence to a jury of his enemies. This court decided in People v. Powell, supra, that the defendant was deprived of his constitutional rights by an act of the legislature, which allowed the court, upon motion of the district attorney under certain circumstances, to change the place of trial of the accused to an adjoining county, and thereupon declared such act unconstitutional, as being violative of that provision of the constitution previously quoted, that "the right of trial by jury shall be secured to all and remain inviolate." It will thus be seen that the constitutional rights of the accused are guarded by the courts with untiring care and a jealous eye. And, while there may be differences among the courts of this country as to what particular incidents of a common-law jury are carried into the constitutions of the various states, all courts agree that the incidents that the jury must consist of 12 impartial men, men who stand indifferent between the parties, are included in the term "jury" wherever found in the organic law of the land. If the legislature has the power to deprive the accused of an exception to the ruling of the court, admitting into the jury box a juror to try defendant who was biased against him and his cause, it would have the same power to deprive him of all exceptions to the rulings of the court. It would have the same power to deprive him of all appeal, for, of the many rights of the accused guarantied to him by the law and the constitution, no one is so important as that he shall be tried by a fair and impartial jury.

The decision of the court upon the challenge of a juror for actual bias in many instances is a decision of a matter of law, and in all such cases there is an appeal to this court given by the constitution. If a juror upon his voir dire should state that the accused was his enemy, and such fact would affect his verdict if taken as a juror, no issue of fact would be created; no question of the court's discretion would be involved; but the decision upon a challenge for actual bias based upon such conditions would be a decision upon a question of law. From the existence of such a state of facts it would follow as matter of law that the juror was incompetent to act. In speaking upon this question in Holt v. People, 13 Mich. 227, the court, by Justice COOLEY, said: "Here the juror was himself placed upon the stand, and a single question was put to him. It is upon his reply to that question that the judge's decision was based. The facts were undisputed, and the question of their sufficiency as a cause for challenge was purely a question of law. The decision of the judge upon that question is as fairly presented for review by the exception thereto as if the judge had proceeded to find the facts in the words of the juror, and had then spread upon the record his conclusion that the state of mind in the juror thus found was not, as matter of law, a ground of disqualification." As was said in Eason v. State, 6 Baxt. 477: "It is our duty, and the highest and most responsible imposed upon us, to guard the constitution against infractions. When we are called upon to determine constitutional questions, if we are in no doubt, our path of duty is plain and straightforward. Such is our present position. We are satisfied that the act in question violates the constitution, * * * and we are bound so to declare." It follows that section 1170 of the Penal Code, to the extent that it denies to a defendant the right to take an exception to the ruling of the court upon the trial of the issue of actual bias of a juror, is unconstitutional and void.

DENIS v. VELATI. (No. 14,651.)

RESCISSION OF DEED—COMPLAINT.

The complaint, in an action to set aside a deed, alleged that the deed in question was made by plaintiff to defendant in view of death and to take the place of a will; that it was placed in defendant's hands only to enable her to prove the same after plaintiff's death; that it was understood that the deed was not to take effect until after plaintiff's death; that, after acknowledging the deed, plaintiff retained possession of it, and it was understood that he should retain possession of it until his death; that defendant thereafter wrongfully obtained possession of the deed, and had the same recorded. Held, that the facts stated were sufficient to entitle plaintiff to a trial as to the delivery of the deed.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; F. W. HENSHAW, Judge.

Action by Denis against Velati to set aside a deed. Judgment for defendant on the pleadings. Plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

P. C. Trusseau, (N. B. Malville, of counsel,) for appellant. A. Comte, Jr., for respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J. The plaintiff in his complaint alleges that on the 29th day of April, 1890, he made a deed of certain real estate, in said complaint described, wherein and whereby he granted, bargained, and sold said real estate to the defendant. "That said deed was made in view of death, and was intended by plaintiff to take the place of a will, for the purpose of avoiding and doing away with the necessity of probate proceedings after the death of plaintiff, all of which was explained to the defendant, and understood by her. That by understanding with defendant said deed was placed in her hands, ostensibly for the purpose of enabling defendant, after the death of plaintiff, to establish the necessary proof as to the validity of said deed; but in fact it was understood, by and between plaintiff and defendant, that said deed should not take effect until after the death of plaintiff. That after the acknowledgment of said deed by plaintiff, the same was retained by him, and remained in his possession until the wrongful taking thereof by defendant, as hereinafter stated. Said deed was never delivered to defendant. That it was further understood, by and between plaintiff and defendant, that plaintiff should retain the possession of said deed until he would die, and that said deed should not be recorded or take effect before the death of plaintiff. Plaintiff further alleges herein that said defendant wrongfully, and in violation of said understanding in relation to said deed, afterwards, on or about the 24th day of June, 1890, unknown to plaintiff and without his consent and during the time he was sick at the French hospital in San Francisco, obtained possession of said deed from the place plaintiff had it deposited, and had the same filed for record in the county recorder's office of said county of Alameda. That said record of said deed was and is against plaintiff's wish and consent, and has the legal effect of depriving him of the right and legal ownership of his said real estate, upon which he heretofore resided and now resides, and which was and is his home. Wherefore plaintiff prays for the judgment and decree of this court, adjudging and decreeing that the plaintiff was and is still the owner of said land, and the improvements thereon, and that the said deed to defendant was never delivered to her, and was merely intended to take effect after the death of plaintiff, and that the record thereof be annulled and declared invalid, and for such other and further relief in the premises as may be just, lawful, and equitable, and for costs of suit." The complaint was demurred to by defendant, one of the grounds of demurrer being that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The demurrer was overruled. The court, in an opinion filed at the time, held that the complaint showed that the deed of plaintiff to defendant was duly delivered, but that the complaint stated another ground upon which the plaintiff might be entitled to other relief, and for that reason the demurrer was overruled, in order that the proper relief might be granted. The defendant filed an answer in which she admits that plaintiff made a deed of the property described in the complaint, but denies that it was made in view of death, or was intended to take the place of a will, for the purpose of avoiding or doing away with the necessity of probate proceedings after the death of plaintiff, "except that it was understood between plaintiff and defendant that, notwithstanding said deed to the defendant, plaintiff should be permitted to occupy the premises conveyed by said deed free from rent during the term of his natural life." She denied that by understanding with her said deed was placed in her hands for the purpose of enabling her, after the death of plaintiff, to establish its validity; "but, on the contrary, avers that said deed was absolutely and unconditionally delivered to her by plaintiff in the presence of witnesses immediately upon the execution of said deed by plaintiff." She denies that she wrongfully, or in violation of the alleged understanding in relation to said deed, or any understanding without plaintiff's consent, obtained possession of said deed, and avers that plaintiff authorized her to do what she wished with said deed. Finally, she avers that she has always been willing and ready to execute any paper document to protect plaintiff in the use and occupation of said premises during the time of his natural life, without rent and free of charge. Wherefore defendant prays that the prayer of plaintiff be denied, and the action dismissed, and that defendant recover her costs, and for such further and other relief as may be proper in the premises. Defendant then gave notice of motion for judgment on the pleadings, as follows: (1) A judgment adjudging defendant to be the owner in fee of the premises described in the complaint; (2) that plaintiff have the use, occupation, and enjoyment of said premises during the term of his natural life free from rent; and (3) that defendant execute unto plaintiff a deed conveying to him a life estate in said premises. The motion was granted, and the court made and entered a judgment in accordance therewith, from which the plaintiff appeals.

The only ground upon which the action of the court could be justified would be that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. If the plaintiff in his complaint sufficiently alleges that he never delivered the deed which he seeks to avoid, the court erred in granting defendant's motion for judgment upon the pleadings. There are allegations in the complaint that said deed was never delivered to defendant. The following paragraph contains such allegation: "That, after the acknowledgment of said deed by plaintiff, the same was retained by him, and remained in his possession until the wrongful taking thereof by the defendant, as hereinafter stated. Said deed was never delivered to the defendant." But the contention of respondent is that the decision of the court below was based upon another paragraph of the complaint, which immediately precedes the one above quoted. The paragraph relied on to justify the action of the court reads as follows: "That, by understanding with the defendant, said deed was placed in her hands, ostensibly for the purpose of enabling defendant, after the death of plaintiff, to establish the necessary proof as to the validity of said deed. But, in fact, it was understood by and between plaintiff and defendant that said deed should not take effect until after the death of the plaintiff." In Prutsman v. Baker, 30 Wis. 644, Dixon, C. J., after reviewing the authorities, says: "To constitute delivery, the grantor must divest himself of all power and dominion over the deed." In Ford v. James, 2 Abb. Dec. 159, Grover, J., says: "A deed may be deposited with the grantee or handed to him for any purpose other than as the deed of the grantor, or as an effective instrument between the parties, without becoming at all operative as a deed." The purpose for which the deed in the case at bar was placed in defendant's hands is stated as other than as an effective instrument between the parties. It was not to take effect until after the death of the grantor. He did not intend it should be an operative conveyance so long as he lived, and he alleges that it was understood between him and the grantee that it should not take effect until after the grantor's death. We think the complaint states facts sufficient to entitle appellant to a trial of the question, whether or not he delivered the deed which he alleges he did not, and the defendant avers that he did deliver, as an operative conveyance of the premises described in the complaint. Judgment reversed, and cause remanded to the court below to try the issue raised by the complaint and answer.

BUSH v. BARNETT. (No. 14,666.)

Carriers—Injury to Passengers—Instructions—Evidence.

1. In an action for personal injuries resulting from the overturning of defendant's stagecoach, on which plaintiff was a passenger, there was no error in charging the jury that the proof by plaintiff that she was injured "cast on defendant the burden of proving that the injury was occasioned by inevitable casualty, or by some other cause which human care and foresight could not prevent." Paterson, J., dissenting.

2. On the trial of such case, defendant put in evidence a writing signed by plaintiff after the accident, in which she stated that she did not blame defendant or his driver for the injury. Plaintiff testified that the paper was signed at a time when she was unable to comprehend its meaning. Held, that the statement was admissible to enable the jury to weigh plaintiff's evidence, and determine her credibility, and not in mitigation of damages.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; G. W. Hunter, Judge.

Action for personal injuries by one Bush against one Barnett. Plaintiff had judgment, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Ernest Sevier and H. L. Smith, for appellant. J. D. H. Chamberlin, for respondent.

Harrison, J. The defendant was the proprietor of a line of stagecoaches running between Hydesville, in the county of Humboldt, and Laytonville, in the county of Mendocino, and on the 2d of October, 1888, received the plaintiff as a passenger to be conveyed in one of his coaches over a portion of the route. While making this trip the coach was overturned, and the plaintiff received certain injuries thereby, for which she brought this action, and recovered a verdict of $900. From the judgment entered thereon, and an order denying a new trial, the defendant has appealed.

The main proposition urged upon this appeal is that the court erred in its instruction to the jury that the proof by the plaintiff that she had been injured "would cast upon the defendant the burden of proving that the injury was occasioned by inevitable casualty, or by some other cause which human care and foresight could not prevent." There was no direct evidence of the immediate cause of the overturning of the coach, other than that, while driving in the nighttime down a steep hill, one of the horses became frightened, and began to kick, and thereupon the team began to run until it got beyond the control of the driver, and ran down the hill until the coach struck some obstacle which upset it, and threw the plaintiff to the ground. Upon these facts the appellant insists that it was incumbent upon the plaintiff to show what was the real cause of the accident, or, at least, to give evidence in disproof of the proposition that it was caused by some inevitable casualty; that, in the absence of any affirmative evidence that the accident was caused by some negligence on the part of the defendant, the jury should have been instructed to find a verdict in his favor. It is, however, a well-established rule that a common carrier is liable for any injury caused by his negligence, and that upon the proof of the injury the presumption is that it was the result of some negligence upon his part, and that, if he would absolve himself from liability therefor by showing that the injury resulted from some unavoidable accident, or from some cause beyond the power of human care or foresight to prevent, such defense is an affirmative one upon his part, which the rule as to the burden of proof requires him to establish by a preponderance of evidence, as in any other affirmative defense. This rule was very clearly enunciated in Boyce v. Stage Co., 25 Cal. 460, and has since been affirmed in Lawrence v. Green, 70 Cal. 417, 11 Pac. Rep. 750; Treadwell v. Whittier, 80 Cal. 583, 22 Pac. Rep. 266. A mere reference to these cases, without repeating the arguments therein presented, is sufficient to show that such is the established rule in this state.

The presumption that the injury was caused by the negligence of the carrier, which is raised upon the proof by the plaintiff that he was injured while being carried as a passenger, is itself a fact which the jury must consider in determining its verdict, and which, in the absence of any other evidence in reference to the negligence, necessitates a verdict in favor of the plaintiff. A presumption which the law raises from admitted or established facts is itself evidence sufficient to sustain a verdict in accordance therewith, and cannot be disregarded by the jury or by the court in any instruction which it may give with reference thereto. Kidder v. Stevens, 60 Cal. 419.

At the trial the defendant introduced in evidence a document which the plaintiff had authorized to be signed in her name after the accident, wherein she purported to exonerate the defendant from liability for damage, and to admit that the injury was the result of an unavoidable accident. The plaintiff gave testimony tending to show that she had no recollection of the paper, and that it was signed at a time when she was unable to comprehend its meaning. Upon its introduction in evidence the defendant stated that he did not offer it as a release from the plaintiff to the defendant, but "only for the purpose of discrediting the testimony of the plaintiff, and in mitigation of damages." The court instructed the jury with reference thereto that it was to be considered by them for the purpose of enabling them to weigh the evidence of the plaintiff, and determine her credibility, and for no other purpose. The defendant assigns this instruction as error, for the reason that, as he had offered it in mitigation of damages, the court should have instructed the jury to so consider it. The defendant did not present to the court a request for any instruction of this character, and the jury were instructed, in assessing any damages they might award, to take into consideration and make allowance for any payments the defendant might have made in behalf of the plaintiff on account of the injuries received by her. We think that the jury was fully and fairly instructed upon this point, and that the court committed no error in its instruction. The statement by the plaintiff after the accident that it was unavoidable, and that she did not blame the defendant or his driver, was not conclusive upon her right of action. It was, at most, only an admission upon her part which she was at liberty to explain, and the jury was to determine the weight to be given to the admission, as well as the sufficiency of the explanation. Smith v. Whittier, (Cal.) 30 Pac. Rep. 529. Certain rulings upon the admission of testimony were excepted to at the trial, which the appellant has assigned as error, but, as the evidence received under these rulings could not have affected the liability of the defendant as shown at the trial, they cannot be regarded as error. The judgment and order are affirmed.

I concur: GAROUTTE, J.

3 Cal. Unrep. 551

PATERSON, J. I concur in the judgment only, because I am not prepared to say the rule is universal that proof of injury in an accident raises a presumption that it occurred through the negligence of the carrier. BARRETT v. AUSTIN. (No. 14,753.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 1, 1892.)

CONSTRUCTION OF CONTRACT—ABANDONMENT OF WORK—RIGHT TO DAMAGES.

1. In an action on a contract for boring a well on plaintiff's land it appeared that he agreed to furnish the casing, fuel, and board for defendant and his men "at his own expense," and pay-a certain sum when the well was completed. Defendant agreed to continue boring the well, "barring bad weather or other unavoidable hindrances," till a certain depth was reached or impenetrable rock was encountered. When about half the agreed depth was reached, defendant's auger broke near the lower end, and became fastened in the well. Defendant claimed he could remove the broken piece, and, after striving unsuccessfully for three weeks, plaintiff refused to furnish further fuel and board, and defendant abandoned the work. Held, that plaintiff was not entitled to recover for the value of supplies furnished defendant to the date the work was abandoned, since by the contract he was not released from furnishing them while boring was prevented by "unavoidable hindrances."

2. In such action defendant is not entitled to recover on a cross complaint for the number of feet bored, at the contract price, since he was not prevented by plaintiff, nor by encountering impenetrable rock, from performing his contract.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; M. K. HARRIS, Judge.

Action by B. H. Barrett against O. A. Austin on a contract for boring a well. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

R. B. Terry and Geo. B. Graham, for appellant. Church & Cory, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an action to recover damages for breach of contract. It is alleged in the complaint that on the 4th day of February, 1890, plaintiff and defendant entered into a written contract, a copy of which is set out, for the boring of a well on plaintiff's land; that plaintiff complied with all the conditions of the contract to be performed on his part, and in pursuance thereof furnished the materials and supplies provided for of the value of $1,000; and that defendant failed and refused to comply with any of the conditions to be performed on his part, and that, by reason of such failure and refusal, plaintiff had been damaged in the sum of $1,000, for which he asked judgment. By the contract the plaintiff bound himself "to furnish all the tubing and casing at his own expense; also all necessary fuel for the use of engine, and all the casing clay needed in the boring of a certain well, now commenced and sunk about one hundred and forty feet, on the following described land," etc.; "also to board and furnish house room for the men—three in number—employed in boring said well;" "also to pay to the party of the second part (defendant) seventy cents per foot in depth, commencing from the top of the ground, for each and every foot in depth of said well, and to make said payment in full, as aforesaid, at the completion and cessation of the boring of said well." And the defendant bound himself "to continue the boring of said well, commencing on the 11th day of February instant, barring bad weather or other unavoidable hindrances, until the depth of one thousand feet shall have been secured," provided that if a satisfactory flow of water should be secured, or impenetrable rock be encountered, before the depth of 1,000 feet should be reached, then the boring was to cease, and the defendant was to be paid for the work done, as before provided. By his answer, the defendant admitted the execution of the contract, but denied that plaintiff had complied with all the conditions thereof as alleged; and also denied that he had sustained damages in the sum of $1,000, or in any sum, by reason of any failure, neglect, or refusal on the part of defendant to perform the conditions of the contract to be by him performed; and alleged that plaintiff was the party in default, and by his own acts had prevented the completion of the work. Defendant also filed a cross complaint, in which he set up the contract, and alleged that under and in pursuance of its terms he commenced boring the well on the 11th day of February, 1890; that he had at the place of performance all necessary machinery and assistance for the full execution and completion thereof; that he steadily and industriously continued the work until the 9th day of April, 1890, when the plaintiff failed and refused to furnish any more fuel for the engine or board for the men; and that by reason of such failure and refusal he was then, and ever since had been, prevented from proceeding and fully completing the work required of him by the terms of the contract, although he was, and at all times since had been, ready, willing, and able to perform all the conditions required to be kept and performed by him; that, in accordance with the terms of the contract, he bored the well to a depth of 563 feet, and at the request of plaintiff furnished and used therein 34 feet of casing of the value of $15.30, and loaned to the plaintiff $2.50; that there was due to defendant from plaintiff, for the boring done, the casing furnished, and the money loaned, the sum of $411.90, for which he prayed judgment. At the trial it was proved, without contradiction, that the defendant commenced boring the well on the 11th of February, and continued the work a little more than a month, when his boring pipe and auger broke near the lower end thereof. He then tried to remove the broken pieces, and to that end worked diligently until the 9th of April. Up to that time the plaintiff furnished fuel for the engine and board for the men, but he then refused to furnish them any longer. The plaintiff testified: "The boring was stopped by reason of his boring pipe breaking off and leaving the auger at the bottom of the well. Defendant worked about two or three weeks trying to get the auger out, * * * but he never succeeded in getting it out, and finally I quit, because I never agreed to dig his tools out, if he got them fast. I quit furnishing him provisions after he got the auger stuck in the well, I think about two or three weeks. * * * I saw no way to get the auger and boring pipe out of the well. Mr. Austin says he can get it out. He always contended that he would get it out. Said he could bore the well. * * * I didn't propose to keep furnishing him with fuel and provisions to dig out his tools. I didn't consider that I had agreed to do that. After he got them down there he could not get them out, and I quit. He told me that he could get the tools out and complete the well."

When the plaintiff refused to furnish any more fuel or provisions, defendant notified him that, unless they were furnished, he would be compelled to stop all further work. He testified: "I remained there and worked all the time steadily at the work until the time he quit furnishing me and refused to furnish me the supplies that is required of him by the contract. I was compelled to quit for want of these supplies." When the work was stopped defendant had bored the well to a depth of 563 feet, and had used 438 feet of the casing furnished by plaintiff, the cost price of which was 75 cents a foot. The court found that the plaintiff had complied with all the conditions of the contract to be performed on his part, and that he caused to be delivered at the proper place casing of the value of $400, and furnished board and lodging to the defendant of the value of $30, and wood of the value of $150; that defendant failed, neglected, and refused to comply with the conditions of the contract to be performed on his part, and abandoned the contract before the commencement of the action; and, as a conclusion of law, that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment against the defendant for the sum of $580, damages for breach of the contract and costs. Judgment was accordingly so entered, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals.

1. It is apparent that the judgment as entered was erroneous. It allowed the plaintiff $400 for the casing delivered, when, at most, he was entitled only to recover for so much as was used, the cost of which was $328.50. Besides, the casing is still in his land, and belongs to him, and it may perhaps be taken out, and then have some value over the cost of its recovery. The judgment also ignores the defendant's claim for the casing furnished and the money paid out by him.

2. If the judgment might be modified so as to correct the errors above noted, still we are unable to see how, under the facts shown, the plaintiff was entitled to any relief. By the contract he obliged himself to furnish the casing, fuel, and board "at his own expense," and the defendant obligated himself to commence and continue the boring, "barring bad weather or other unavoidable hindrances." There was no provision that the plaintiff should be released from furnishing the supplies during the continuance of bad weather or other hindrances, and that he did not understand that he was so released is shown by the fact that he continued to furnish them for about three weeks after the auger was broken. It is difficult to define the words "unavoidable hindrances," but we think they must have been intended to include accidents such as occurred here. It is a matter of common knowledge that tools and machinery often unexpectedly break, and that augers used in boring wells frequently break in the ground, without any carelessness or fault on the part of the parties using them. The plaintiff, therefore, was not justified in refusing to furnish any more supplies, because he thought the broken pieces could never be removed, when the defendant, an experienced well borer, was trying diligently to remove them, and insisting that he could and would remove them, and complete the boring of the well. It is true that it might have been a hardship on plaintiff to be compelled to continue furnishing the supplies for an indefinite time, but the hardship on defendant would have been equally great or greater, as he had to employ three men and keep and use costly machinery during the period of delay. It was, of course, an unfortunate accident, but, in the absence of a stipulation to the contrary, each party must bear his share of the loss. The covenants were mutual, and, when the plaintiff refused to furnish any more supplies, the defendant was justified, if he chose to do so, in stopping the work, but his stopping did not give the plaintiff any cause of action for damages.

The defendant claimed in the court below, and claims here, that he was entitled to have judgment entered in his favor, according to the prayer of his cross complaint. We do not agree with him in this. By the terms of the contract he was only to be paid when he had bored the well to a depth of a thousand feet, or had found a sufficient supply of water, or had met with impenetrable rock. Now, while he may have been justified in stopping the work as he did, still he was not prevented by the acts of the plaintiff from going on and performing the contract on his part. Cox v. McLaughlin, 52 Cal. 590, and 54 Cal. 605. He might have furnished the necessary supplies himself, and doubtless when the well was sunk to the required depth could have maintained an action to recover their value. Our conclusion is that when the action was commenced the plaintiff had no cause of action against the defendant for the materials furnished, and the defendant none against the plaintiff for the work then done. We therefore advise that the judgment and order be reversed, and the cause remanded.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded.

McBEAN v. MARTIN. (No. 14,678.)

SEWER ASSESSMENTS—ACTION TO FORECLOSE—PLEADING.

Under Act March 18, 1885, (St. 1885, p. 147,) § 10, providing that, when the owner of premises assessed for constructing a sewer "cannot conveniently be found," or is unknown, payment of such assessment shall be publicly demanded on the premises, the complaint, in an action to foreclose a lien of assessment, where payment was publicly demanded on the premises, and the owner thereof is known, must allege that the owner could not "conveniently be found."

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; J. W. MCKINLEY, Judge.

Action by McBean against Martin to foreclose a lien of assessment on defendant's lot. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Chas. R. Gray and J. P. Hargrave, for appellant. C. W. C. Rowell and Ezra Crossman, for respondent.

De Haven, J. Action upon an assessment for the construction of a sewer along G street, in the city of San Bernardino, and to foreclose the alleged lien of such assessment upon a lot belonging to defendant. The court found all the allegations of the complaint to be true, and gave judgment in favor of plaintiff, in accordance with the prayer of the complaint. The defendant appeals.

The judgment cannot be sustained upon the findings, as the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The complaint alleges, in substance, among other matters, that the superintendent of streets made the assessment sought to be enforced, and attached thereto a warrant and diagram, and recorded and delivered the same to the contractor, as required by sections 8 and 9 of the "Act to provide for work upon streets, * * * and for the construction of sewers within municipalities," approved March 18, 1885. St. 1885, p. 147. We also construe the complaint as alleging that, by said assessment and diagram, the lot upon which plaintiff claims that said assessment is a lien was assessed as the property of defendant, and that defendant was then and still is the owner of said lot. But the complaint fails to show a proper demand for the payment of this assessment within 30 days after the date of the warrant, and such a demand was necessary in order to preserve the lien of the assessment. Section 10 of the act of March 18, 1885, before referred to, provides with particularity the manner in which the demand of payment shall be made, and is as follows: "Whenever the person so assessed, or their agents, cannot conveniently be found, or whenever the name of the owner of the lot is stated as 'unknown' on the assessment, then the said contractor or his assigns, or some person in his or their behalf, shall publicly demand payment on the premises assessed." The complaint in this case alleges that the demand for payment of the amount of the assessment was made by going upon the premises and making a public demand therefor, but it is not alleged that the defendant or his agent could not be conveniently found; and it is only in such cases, or when the assessment is made to unknown owners, that the statute permits a public demand upon the premises. This was so held by this court in Guerin v. Reese, 33 Cal. 292, in construing a similar provision found in the act of 1862, relating to streets in San Francisco. St. 1862, p. 397. In that case, Mr. Justice Rhodes, speaking for the court, said: "There are three modes in which the demand may be made: First, of the person assessed; second, of his agents; and, third, a demand publicly made on the premises assessed. The purpose of the demand is very obvious. Up to that time the owner has only constructive notice of the proceedings, from their initiation up to the recording of the warrant, assessment and diagram; and as, by the record, a lien is cast upon his property, he is required to be notified in order that he may take the proper steps for its discharge. * * * Before the contractor is permitted to resort to the third mode of making the demand, he must have exhausted the second as well as the first mode." The failure to give defendant actual notice of the assessment under consideration by making a personal demand for its payment, when it could have been conveniently made as required by the statute, may have prevented him from exercising the right of appeal to the city council given by section 11 of the act under which the assessment was made, and which appeal must be taken within 30 days after the date of the warrant. The object of the statute is to guard against the possibility of such a result in all cases where the owner of property is known, and it has been assessed to him, by requiring a personal demand to be made upon him, when it can be conveniently done. It will thus be seen that the right to receive this notice is substantial, and the failure of the plaintiff to show in his complaint a strict compliance with this essential requirement of the statute is fatal to the judgment. Judgment reversed.

WINDERS v. SPERRY et al. (No. 14,781.)

Promissory Note—Execution by Joint Maker after Delivery.

In an action on a note for money loaned, it appeared that the borrower, at the time of the loan and the execution and delivery of a note signed by himself alone, promised that another would sign as joint maker. Held, that the execution and delivery of the note was incomplete until the other had signed, and his subsequent signing bound him, without a new consideration.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county; Joseph H. Budd, Judge.

Action by David Winders against Charles E. Sperry and others on a promissory note. Judgment for plaintiff. From the judgment and an order refusing a new trial, Sperry appeals. Affirmed.

L. J. Maddux, for appellant. John Heenan, for respondent.

Temple, C. This appeal is taken by defendant Charles E. Sperry from the judgment and from an order refusing a new trial. The action is by the indorsee of a nonnegotiable note against the two makers, and the appellant separately defended, on the ground that his contract was without consideration. The trial was by the court, which found for the plaintiff. On only one important point is there a conflict in the evidence. Resolving that, as we are bound to, in favor of the decision, we have this state of facts: E. N. Sperry, being without credit, but desiring to borrow some money from Charles Sperry, who was his nephew and son-in-law, told Charles that he had spoken to his son (the appellant) in regard to the matter, and that his son said, if he (Charles) would loan the money to him, (E. N.,) the son would be responsible for the payment of it, and would sign the note as joint maker. Thereupon Charles gave E. N. his check for the amount, and took a note signed only by E. N., but in form joint and several, reading, "We, or either of us, promise to pay," etc. Charles knew when he loaned the money that E. N. was not able to pay, and told him then that he looked wholly to appellant for payment. E. N. Sperry, when the note was taken by Charles, said that his son would be down soon, and, as Charles Sperry testified: "I said: 'Perhaps you had better take this note. You will see him before I will.' And he said, 'No, you had better take it, and send it up there;' and I sent it up the next day, I think." As matter of fact, E. N. Sperry had never spoken to his son in regard to the matter, and appellant knew nothing of the loan until he received a letter from Charles, the contents of which do not appear further than indicated by the reply of appellant, which was as follows: "Ceres, Sept. 22, 1888. Brother Charles: Received your letter this morning, and say in reply that I think it will be all right. Send note up, and I will sign it and send it back. Respectfully, C. E. SPERRY." The money was given to E. N. Sperry on the 19th, and the note received by Charles, signed only by E. N. Sperry, at the same time. The signature of appellant must have been at least four days afterwards.

The court found, in effect, that the note was not delivered as a complete instrument on the 19th, and that it was understood that it should not be so considered until signed by appellant. This conclusion is warranted by the testimony of Charles Sperry, and it does not matter here that this testimony was contradicted by other evidence. It is true, in general, that one who adds his signature to a promissory note after its execution and delivery is not bound unless there is a new consideration. But this is not that case. The execution and delivery were not complete until it was signed by appellant. But if we are bound to conclude that it had been executed and delivered as to one of the makers, there was a consideration for the subsequent signature of the appellant. As the contract was that he should sign the note, and the note was accepted only upon that understanding, the payee could have canceled it or tendered it back if appellant had refused to sign, and maintained a suit at once for his money. The note was payable one year after date, and the credit was given on the promise, and in consideration, of appellant's signature. Had he not signed the note this consideration would have failed. But, while the general rule as to a signature obtained after the execution and delivery of the note is as above stated, it has been held where the borrower promises at the time of the loan, and the execution and delivery of a note, signed by himself alone, that he will procure another signature, that the person so signing afterwards is bound; that the subsequent signature is not without consideration. McNaught v. McClaughry, 42 N. Y. 22; Harrington v. Brown, 77 N. Y. 72. The exigencies of this case do not require us to go so far as that. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

McBEAN v. REDICK et al. (No. 14,680.)

PUBLIC IMPROVEMENTS—UNAUTHORIZED CONTRACT.

Where a board of city trustees adopts a resolution of intention to construct a sewer along a portion of a street, but lets a contract for constructing the sewer along only a part of the portion specified in the resolution, the contract is void, and an assessment under the same creates no lien on property benefited.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; J. W. McKINLEY, Judge.

Action by McBean against Redick and others to recover on an assessment and foreclose a lien for the same. Judgment for defendants. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Ezra Crossman and C. W. C. Rowell, for appellant. Paris & Fox and Chas. R. Gray, for respondents.

DE HAVEN, J. This is an action to recover upon an assessment for the construction of a sewer upon one of the streets of the city of San Bernardino, and for the foreclosure of the alleged lien of such assessment upon a lot owned by defendants. The superior court made and filed findings, and thereupon rendered judgment for the defendants. The plaintiff appeals. There is no bill of exceptions in the record, and the only question to be considered is whether the findings support the judgment. The foundation of plaintiff's right to maintain the action rests upon the resolution of intention passed by the board of city trustees to do the work for which the assessment sought to be foreclosed was made. In relation to this the court finds that such trustees duly adopted a resolution of intention to construct a sewer along that part of Third street, in the city of San Bernardino, which lies "between the center of the intersection of B with said Third street and the center of the intersection of I and Third streets," and that said resolution was duly posted and published according to law. The court further finds: "That subsequently, and in due time, and without any further resolution of intention, or other notice to the property owners along said Third street, an advertisement calling for bids for the sewering of said Third street under said resolution aforesaid was duly made, except that such bids were called for for the sewering of said Third street between I and C streets, which said call was less by one whole block * * * than the resolution of intention specified as the distance to be sewered on said Third street;" and that in due time a contract was let as specified in said advertisement, and under it the work was done which resulted in the assessment sought to be enforced in this action. It is clear that upon these facts the contract for the construction of the sewer was void, and the work done thereunder, and the subsequent assessment and proceedings, created no lien upon the property of defendants.

The precise question was before this court in the case of Stockton v. Whitmore, 50 Cal. 554, and in its decision the court said: "It is objected that the council acquired no jurisdiction to order to be done only a portion of the work specified in the resolution, and we think the point is well taken. The object of the notice is to inform the property owners of the particular work proposed to be done. If it is proposed to improve a street for its whole length through several blocks, the property owners may be perfectly content to have the work done, and would have no motive to attend at the hearing. But they might have grave objections to improving the street for only a portion of the distance. For example, if it were proposed to grade a street for six blocks the property owners might consider it a desirable improvement, but would have serious objections to grading detached portions of it." The cases of Fanning v. Leviston, 93 Cal. 186, 28 Pac. Rep. 943; Himmelmann v. Hoadley, 44 Cal. 279; and Boyle v. Hitchcock, 66 Cal. 129, 4 Pac Rep. 1143,—cited by appellant,—are not in conflict with the case from which we have just quoted. In this case the contract was absolutely void, and in all its parts, and its invalidity could not have been remedied or avoided by the trustees of the city; and, this being so, the property owner was not required to appeal to the trustees for its correction. Dougherty v. Hitchcock, 35 Cal. 512.

2. There is no conflict in the findings, nor can finding No. 5 be construed as a finding that the assessment under consideration was duly made; that is, that it was based upon a valid contract, and, as such, that it constitutes a valid lien upon the property of defendants. Judgment affirmed.

BUCKLEY v. SUPERIOR COURT OF FRESNO COUNTY. (No. 15,079.)

WRIT OF REVIEW—DISMISSAL OF APPEAL—JURISDICTION.

Code Civil Proc. § 1068, provides that a writ of review may be obtained when a lower court has exceeded its jurisdiction. Held, that the hearing of a motion to dismiss an appeal from justice's court is within the jurisdiction of the superior court, and, though erroneously granted, a writ of review will not lie. Beatty, C. J., and Paterson, J., dissenting. Carlson v. Superior Court, 11 Pac. Rep. 788, 70 Cal. 628, overruled.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Fresno county; S. A. HOLMES, Judge.

Petition by Joseph Buckley for a writ to review an order of the superior court of Fresno county dismissing an appeal from a judgment of the justice's court. Writ dismissed.

L. L. Cory, for petitioner. Church & Walser, for respondent.

GAROUTTE, J. A motion was made in the superior court of Fresno county to dismiss the appeal then pending before that court in the case of Hulen v. Buckley, the case having been originally tried in the justice's court. The motion was made upon the grounds that (1) the judgment appealed from was entered by default, and is not appealable; (2) that no motion was made in the lower court to set aside the default before the appeal was taken; (3) that said appeal was taken upon questions of both law and fact. The court granted the motion, and we are now asked to review that action by a writ of review. Section 1068 of the Code of Civil Procedure reads: "A writ of review may be granted by any court, except a police or justice's court, when an inferior tribunal, board, or officer exercising judicial functions has exceeded the jurisdiction of such tribunal, board, or officer, and there is no appeal, nor, in the judgment of the court, any plain, speedy, and adequate remedy."

It will be noticed that the foundation of the writ is essentially and necessarily an excess of jurisdiction; for no act of tribunal, board, or officer exercising judicial functions, done or made within its jurisdiction, can ever be the subject of attack by writ of review. In the matter now before us it is apparent that the court had jurisdiction of the subject-matter and of the persons; all the parties were before the court; the appeal was regularly taken; and we are at a loss to understand why the court had not the same jurisdiction to hear a motion to dismiss the appeal as it had to proceed to a trial of the cause upon its merits. If it had jurisdiction to hear the motion,—and as to that matter there can be no question,—then its ruling upon the motion was simply an exercise of that jurisdiction, and, however erroneous such ruling might be, it would only be an error of law, in no manner subject to review by an original proceeding in this court. In this case the court had jurisdiction to hear the motion, and it would be an absurdity to say that, upon the submission of the matter, the court had jurisdiction to deny the motion to dismiss the appeal, but no jurisdiction to grant it. As was said in Central Pac. R. Co. v. Placer Co., 46 Cal. 670: "It has been settled by a long series of decisions in this state that a writ of certiorari brings up for review only the question whether the inferior officer, court, or tribunal has exceeded its jurisdiction, and cannot be used as a mere writ of error for the correction of mistakes, either in law or fact, committed by the inferior tribunal within the limits of its jurisdiction;" citing many cases. It may be conceded that the action of the court in dismissing this appeal was entirely without support in the law, and furnished ample material to justify a reversal of the order if a proper matter for review under the statute; but such may be the fact, and yet no question of excess of jurisdiction be involved. To absolutely thus deprive the appellant of the right to be heard upon the merits of his cause is a great hardship, and often productive of serious pecuniary loss, but such appellant suffers no greater hardship or loss than though he proceeds to trial and the court decides against him upon final judgment when he has a cause full of merit. As was said in Sherer v. Superior Court, 94 Cal.

355, 29 Pac. Rep. 716: "Within the limits thus prescribed, its errors in the exercise of its jurisdiction, however gross or glaring they may be, must be submitted to, as a part of the sacrifice which every individual is compelled to yield to the infirmities of human government." These views are in conflict with Carlson v. Superior Court, 70 Cal. 628, 11 Pac. Rep. 788, and that case must be considered as overruled. The appeal in that case was dismissed upon the ground that it was taken upon questions of law, and should have been taken upon questions of both law and fact. This court said the appeal vested the superior court with jurisdiction to hear and determine the question, and to dismiss the appeal was an act of the court in excess of its jurisdiction. The entire reasoning of the court upon the matter goes to the question that the order of the court in dismissing the appeal was erroneous,—a matter entirely immaterial to the issue involved. The vital question was, did the superior court exceed its jurisdiction in dismissing the appeal? not, was the appeal erroneously dismissed? When an appeal is regularly taken, the court not only has jurisdiction to try the cause upon its merits, but it has entire and complete jurisdiction of the cause for any and all purposes. It has jurisdiction to hear a motion to dismiss the appeal as fully as it has jurisdiction to hear and determine the cause upon its merits, and to erroneously dismiss the appeal is no more jurisdictional than to erroneously decide the merits of the cause. It follows that, if the court erred in dismissing the appeal, it was done in the exercise of jurisdiction, and not in assuming jurisdiction which did not exist. It was a mere error in the exercise of its power, an error of law, which will not be reviewed by an original proceeding. If there are other cases following in the wake of Carlson v. Superior Court, they are valueless for future precedent. Let the writ be dismissed.

We concur: De Haven, J.; McFarland, J.; Harrison, J.; Sharpstein, J.

Paterson, J., (dissenting.) A dissenting opinion in an ordinary case probably does more harm than good; it weakens the effect of the decision as a precedent, and tends to destroy the respect which we all hope to secure for our decisions at home and abroad. The decision in this case, however, is itself so destructive of precedents established by our predecessors in well-considered cases, I deem it my duty to spread upon the record the reasons for my dissent, and to show if possible that in matters of jurisdiction the superior court is not clothed with that supreme and arbitrary power conceded to it by the decision herein. Carlson v. Superior Court, 70 Cal. 628, 11 Pac. Rep. 788; Levy v. Superior Court, 66 Cal. 292, 5 Pac. Rep. 353, and other kindred cases, in my opinion, were correctly decided, and should be adhered to. The decisions in those cases went upon the proposition that a court cannot divest itself of jurisdiction by arbitrarily saying it has no right to proceed, any more than it can invest itself with jurisdiction by arbitrarily saying it has a right to proceed. My brothers concede that, if a court proceed in a case where the record shows it has no jurisdiction, its orders are void; but hold that, in this case the court having jurisdiction to hear and determine the motion to dismiss an appeal, "its ruling upon the motion was simply an exercise of that jurisdiction, and, however erroneous such ruling might be, it could only be an error of law." But the dismissal of the appeal in this case was neither more nor less than a refusal on the part of the court to give the appellant a hearing in the case, although the record on its face showed that he was entitled to a hearing on the merits. The court has no more right to refuse to hear the complaint and answer the prayer of a litigant who is regularly before it by proceedings on appeal than it has to refuse to hear and determine the claims of parties who are regularly before it by complaint, summons, and answer. It happens occasionally that the court refuses to settle a bill of exceptions, or to proceed with the trial of a case. It might be said in such cases that the court below had jurisdiction to grant or deny the motion, or to grant or deny the plaintiff's prayer for relief,—that it had to look into the record to determine whether it had jurisdiction or not,—and that its refusal to entertain the matter on its merits, or to hear the case, was mere error; but this court has never denied a writ of mandate when it appeared that the party was entitled to a hearing, and has uniformly held that a court could not refuse to hear a matter upon the merits when it was regularly before it for that purpose. There is no force in the argument that the superior court is liable to commit error on the trial of any case on appeal from the justice's court for which there is no remedy, and that, where a motion to dismiss the appeal is granted, the appellant "suffers no greater hardship or loss than though he proceeds to trial, and the court decides against him upon final judgment." The lameness of the argument consists in the assumption that the court would decide the case against the appellant, and it ignores his right to the judgment of the court upon the merits of the matter which is regularly before it for determination. Judgment is entered against A. in the justice's court, and he perfects an appeal to the superior court. The respondent moves to dismiss the appeal, to which motion A. objects, and asks to have the cause set for trial. The court overrules the objection, and dismisses the appeal. This is held to be mere error, although the record on its face shows that the court had jurisdiction, and should have tried the case. Judgment is entered against B. in the justice's court, and he makes an ineffectual attempt to take an appeal. The respondent moves to dismiss the appeal, to which motion B. objects, and asks to have the case set for trial. The objection of B. is sustained, the motion to dismiss the appeal is denied, and the case proceeds to trial and judgment. In each case the decision of the court was wrong. In the latter case it is conceded that the judgment is void, and should be set aside on certiorari. If the ruling of the court in the first case was merely erroneous, why was it not merely erroneous in the second case supposed? The court had jurisdiction to hear and decide the motion in the first case, and for that reason it is said its ruling was mere error, although it affirmatively appeared on the record that the court had jurisdiction to hear the appeal. Is it not equally true that in the second case the court had jurisdiction to hear and determine the objection and the motion before it? If its ruling in the one case was merely erroneous, was it not merely erroneous in the other? The error of the court rests in the assumption that, in determining that it has not jurisdiction, although the record affirmatively shows that it has, the superior court may exercise discretion, while it is admitted in determining that it has jurisdiction, when the record shows affirmatively that it has not, there is no discretion in the court, and its order is void. If it be true that a court has no power to say it has jurisdiction when the record shows it has not, the converse of the proposition must be true, that, if the record shows it has jurisdiction, it has no right to say it has not. The question of discretion or error is entirely foreign to the discussion. If the record shows it has jurisdiction, that is the end of it; the court must proceed. It has no power to say that it will not. If the record shows affirmatively that it has not jurisdiction, it has no power to say that it will proceed. In each case the court is bound by the jurisdictional facts appearing of record; it cannot ignore or dispute them. As said in Levy v. Superior Court, 66 Cal. 292, 5 Pac. Rep. 353, "the case is not like those which are dependent upon the existence of facts aliunde."

Beatty, C. J. I concur in the foregoing opinion of Mr. Justice Paterson.

CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO v. WESTERN UNION TEL. CO. (No. 13,903.)

Telegraph Companies — Acceptance of Franchise from United States — Power of State to Tax.

Rev. St. U. S. tit. 65, provides that any telegraph company, by filing its written acceptance, may construct and operate lines over any portion of the public domain, across any navigable water, and along any of the military or post roads of the United States; that the United States shall have priority in sending telegrams between the departments of government, its officers and agents, at rates to be fixed by the postmaster general; that after five years the United States may purchase such lines for postal and military purposes at an appraised value. Held, that a telegraph company, by filing such acceptance, acquired national franchises, which no state could tax. Telegraph Co. v. Attorney General, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 961, 125 U. S. 530, distinguished.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, city and county of San Francisco; John F. Finn, Judge.

Action by the city and county of San Francisco against the Western Union Telegraph Company to recover unpaid taxes. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Reversed.

R. B. Carpenter, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart and W. A. S. Nicholson, for respondent.

McFarland, J. This action was brought to recover a certain sum of money alleged to be due from defendant to plaintiff for state and county taxes alleged to have been duly assessed and levied "upon personal property of said defendant, to wit, franchise for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1886." Judgment was rendered for plaintiff, and defendant appeals from the judgment. From the findings of the trial court, and the written stipulations of the parties contained in a bill of exceptions, the following are substantially the facts upon which the appeal must be determined: During the times mentioned in the complaint, appellant was, and still is, a corporation "organized and existing under the laws of the state of New York," and engaged in the business of transmitting telegraphic messages. "It is not organized under the laws of the state of California, and has derived no franchise therefrom." For the said fiscal year ending June 30, 1886, the appellant was assessed upon all its lines and property within this state for state and city and county taxes, and paid all of said taxes. The assessment upon which the taxes sued for in this action is based is as follows: "Franchise, $50,000;" and no other taxes or causes of action are here involved. On July 24, 1866, there was approved an act of the congress of the United States entitled "An act to aid in the construction of telegraph lines, and to secure to the government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," which act was put in evidence. It is to be found at pages 221, 222, U. S. St. at Large 1865-1867, also incorporated in title 65 of the Revised Statutes. This act provides "that before any telegraph company shall exercise any of the powers or privileges conferred by this act, such company shall file their written acceptance with the postmaster general of the restrictions and obligations required by this act;" and such written acceptance was so filed by the appellant herein on June 12, 1867. It is not necessary, at this point, to state in detail the provisions of that act, because the United States supreme court, in decisions hereinafter noticed, has declared its nature, purpose, and scope, and the character of the rights and privileges which it conferred upon the appellant herein. It is sufficient here to say generally that the act gives the appellant the right to construct and maintain telegraph lines, not only through the public domain, portions of which are granted to it, and across navigable streams and waters, but also over and along any of the "post roads of the United States which have been or may hereafter be declared such by acts of congress;" that it provides for a priority of telegrams between the departments of the United States government and their officers and agents over all other business, and that they shall be sent at rates fixed by the postmaster general; and that, under the act, the United States may at any time after five years, for postal, military, or other purposes, purchase all the lines and property of the appellant at a value to be appraised in the manner provided in said act. It further appears that on and prior to the first Monday of March, 1885, the defendant, as such corporation, had constructed and was maintaining and operating in the state of California, along the military and post roads of the United States, and over, under, and across the navigable streams or waters of the United States, telegraph lines aggregating 6,531½ miles, and 3,501¼ miles of telegraph poles, and 34 2-5 miles of said wires and 9 miles of said poles are in the city and county of San Francisco; that all of said lines are used by defendant in the transmission of telegrams from points in the state of California to points in the other states of the United States and to foreign countries, and from said other states and countries to points within the state of California, as well as in the transmission of telegrams from point to point within the state of California; that the defendant is likewise engaged in the transmission over said wires of messages for, from, and between the several departments of the government of the United States; that said messages last mentioned are by this defendant given priority over all other business, and are sent at rates annually fixed by the postmaster general of the United States.

Under these facts, it is contended by appellant, among other things, which we do not deem it necessary to discuss, that the appellant is one of the means employed by the United States government for carrying into effect its sovereign powers; that the attempt to tax its franchise, in addition to the taxes which, in common with others, it pays on its property, is an attempt to tax "the operation of an instrument employed by the government of the Union to carry its powers into execution," within the meaning of the decision in McCulloch v. Maryland, infra; and that, therefore, the taxes sought to be recovered in this action were beyond the jurisdiction of the state to levy, and void. If the appellant is to be considered an instrument of the national government, within the meaning of McCulloch v. Maryland, then it is quite clear that, within the meaning of that celebrated case, the attempted tax on the franchise of the appellant was a tax upon its "operations." It is true that the state of Maryland had put its attempt to tax the United States Bank in the shape of a provision that its notes should be upon stamped paper furnished by the state at certain stated prices; but it is impossible to see how that method of taxation was any more a tax upon the "operation" of the bank than a general tax upon its franchise—upon its right to operate at all—would have been. There is in principle no distinction between the two methods of effecting the same result. But there is no need of general argument upon the subject, because the precise question was definitely settled by the supreme court of the United States in the case of California v. Railroad Co., 127 U. S. 1, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1073. In that case the state of California had attempted to tax the "franchise" of the railroad company, and the latter set up that it had franchises from the general government, granted under certain well-known acts of congress, which the state had no jurisdiction to tax. The decision of the court, from which there was no dissent, was delivered by Mr. Justice BRADLEY in a very elaborate opinion, and we have space here only to quote the vital parts of it on the question before us. Having concluded that the railroad company had certain franchises from the general government, the court say: "Assuming that the Central Pacific Railroad Company had received the important franchise referred to by the grant of the United States, the question arises whether they are legitimate subjects of taxation by the state. They were granted to the company for national purposes and to subserve national ends. In seems very clear that the state of California can neither take them away nor destroy nor abridge them nor cripple them by onerous burdens. Can it tax them? It may undoubtedly tax outside visible property of the company situated within the state. That is a different thing. But may it tax franchises which are the grant of the United States? In our judgment it cannot. * * * As Chief Justice MARSHALL said in McCulloch v. Maryland, 'the power to tax involves the power to destroy.' Recollecting the fundamental principle that the constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States are the supreme law of the land, it seems to us almost absurd to contend that a power given to a person or corporation by the United States may be subjected to state taxation. The power conferred emanates from, and is a portion of, the government that confers it." And, again, the court, speaking of the taxation of a franchise, say: "It has no limitation but the discretion of the taxing power. The value of the franchise is not measured like that of property, but may be ten thousand or ten hundred thousand dollars, as the legislature may choose. Or, without any valuation of the franchise at all, the tax may be arbitrarily laid. It is not an idle objection, therefore, made by the company against the tax imposed in the present case." Under this decision, therefore, it is entirely clear that if the appellant is an instrument of the national government, within the meaning of McCulloch v. Maryland, or has franchises granted by that government for national purposes, then the tax involved in the case at bar cannot be maintained.

The remaining question of importance is this: Are the relations of appellant to the national government, and its franchises derived therefrom, of such character as to bring it within the principles of the cases above cited? We think that the decisions of the supreme court of the United States answer this question in the affirmative. Indeed, the very case of California v. Railroad Co., to which we have just referred, seems to be itself a determination of the point in favor of appellant; for a comparison of the railroad acts which were held in that case to have conferred franchises upon the railroad company, with the act of July 24, 1866, respecting telegraph companies, (hereinbefore mentioned,) shows that the difference between the rights and powers granted in the two instances is a difference of degree only, and not of kind. An interstate railroad is a thing of more magnitude, and has greater financial and commercial value, than an interstate line of wires and poles used for telegraphy. The transportation of troops and munitions of war is, no doubt, a thing of graver importance than the transmission of telegraph messages; but the latter has become, also, an absolute necessity to the proper administration of the national government, either in peace or war. If, therefore, as was held in the decision last mentioned, the rights, privileges, and powers conferred by congress on the railroad company constitute franchises which a state cannot tax, it seems impossible to escape the conclusion that the rights, privileges, and powers thus conferred upon the appellant also constitute such franchises. But the supreme court of the United States has had occasion to declare the character and position of the appellant, with respect to the question here involved, in cases in which the appellant itself was a party to the record. In December, 1866, the legislature of Florida passed an act granting to the Pensacola Telegraph Company "the sole and exclusive right and privilege" of maintaining lines of electric telegraph through certain parts of that state. There was nothing in the state constitution of Florida which prohibited its legislature from granting such exclusive privileges within it own jurisdiction. Afterwards a certain railroad company granted the right to erect a telegraph line along its right of way, to the Western Union Telegraph Company, the appellant in the case at bar. The latter company had commenced the erection of the line when the said Pensacola Company commenced an action in the United States circuit court to enjoin the work, on account of its alleged exclusive right under said act of the legislature of Florida, with which the proposed line of the Western Union Company competed. The action was dismissed in the circuit court, and an appeal was taken by the Pensacola Company to the supreme court of the United States, where the judgment was affirmed. Pensacola Tel. Co. v. Western U. Tel. Co., 96 U. S. 1. The case was elaborately argued by counsel and thoroughly considered by the court, Mr. Justice FIELD delivering a very able and exhaustive dissenting opinion. The opinion of the court was delivered by Chief Justice WAITE, and is too lengthy to be quoted here. It was decided, however, in brief, that the said act of July 24, 1886, "to aid in the construction of telegraph lines," etc., was a legitimate and proper exercise by congress of the power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several states," and "to establish post offices and post roads;" that the powers given to and accepted by the Western Union Telegraph Company cannot be obstructed by state legislation, and that said act extends not only to such post roads as are on the public domain, but to "any of the military or post roads of the United States which have been, or may hereafter be, declared such by act of congress." The court say, among other things, as follows: "It is not necessary now to inquire whether congress may assume the telegraph as part of the postal system, and exclude all others from its use. The present case is satisfied if we find that congress has power, by appropriate legislation, to prevent the states from placing obstructions in the way of its usefulness." And the power of a state to tax its "franchise" to an unlimited extent would seem to be about as effective a means as could be imagined of "placing obstructions in the way of its usefulness." But Telegraph Co. v. Texas, 105 U. S. 460, is still a more pointed case in favor of appellant's contention. In that case the legislature of Texas had passed a statute providing that every telegraph company doing business in the state should pay a certain tax for every message sent by it; and the Western Union Telegraph Company, appellant in the case at bar, having refused to pay taxes under said statute, basing its defense on said act of congress of July 24, 1866, judgment had been recovered against it in the state court for the amount of such taxes. But on a writ of error the judgment was reversed. Here was a case almost impossible to be distinguished from McCulloch v. Maryland. The court, in its opinion, delivered by Chief Justice WAITE, among other things, say: "In Pensacola Tel. Co. v. Western U. Tel. Co., 96 U. S. 1, this court held that the telegraph was an instrument of commerce, and that telegraph companies were subject to the regulating power of congress in respect to their foreign and interstate business A telegraph company occupies the same relation to commerce, as a carrier of messages, that a railroad company does as a carrier of goods. Both companies are instruments of commerce, and their business is commerce itself." The opinion then refers to rights held by the said telegraph company under the said act of congress by which it became a "government agent;" and then, referring to the said tax attempted to be levied on its messages by the state of Texas, says: "As such, so far as it operates on private messages sent out of the state, it is a regulation of foreign and interstate commerce, and beyond the power of the state. That is fully established by the cases already cited. As to the government messages, it is a tax on the means employed by the government of the United States to exercise its constitutional powers, and therefore void. It was so decided in McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat. 316, and has never been doubted since." And thus in that case the Western Union Telegraph Company is put in exactly the same class with the United States Bank in McCulloch v. Maryland. With respect to the last-named case, we stated before that there was in principle no difference between a stamp tax on the notes of the United States Bank and a general tax upon its "franchise." But it is to be observed further on that subject that the statute of Maryland imposing the stamp tax provided that the bank may relieve itself from the operation of the provision aforesaid by paying annually in advance to the treasurer of the Western Shore, for the use of the state, the sum of $15,000. See act on page 319, 4 Wheat. And so the bank might have avoided the purchase of stamped paper on which to issue its notes by simply paying a lump sum annually, and that would have been the paying of a tax upon its right to carry on its operations,—upon its franchise. And if the court had seen any substantial difference between the two methods of accomplishing the same thing, it would have told the bank that it had no cause to complain of the illegal stamp tax, because that could have been avoided by the payment of the legal franchise tax. Suppose that the statute of Maryland had made no mention of a stamp tax, and had simply required the annual tax of $15,000, does any one suppose that in such event the great opinion of Chief Justice MARSHALL would never have been written, to become the broad and sure foundation for subsequent judicial decision in the realm of constitutional law?

The only decision of the United States supreme court which can be invoked with any plausibility in favor of the validity of the tax here involved is to be found in the case of Telegraph Co. v. Attorney General, 125 U. S. 530, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 961. An analysis of the case, however, shows it to be entirely consistent with the decisions and views hereinbefore cited and expressed. In that case certain taxes levied against appellant herein, under certain statutes of the state of Massachusetts, were upheld; and it is true that in those statutes the words "corporate franchise" are used. But an examination of those statutes will show that the taxes there involved were levied upon the property of the company, and not upon its franchise, and the opinion delivered shows that such was the understanding of the court. When in a statute a certain thing is particularly described, so as to clearly identify it, the character of the thing is not changed by a misnomer. The Massachusetts statutes, with which the court was dealing, may be found in full on pages 531-535, 125 U. S. They contain in detail a long and somewhat complicated plan for the assessment and taxation of corporations. The general scheme is that each corporation shall return annually to the tax commissioner the amount of its capital stock, with its par and market value, and also a list of structures, works, machinery, real estate, etc. Railroad and telegraph companies shall also return the whole length of their lines, and their length outside of the state. The commissioner is to ascertain from the returns, or otherwise, the true market value of the shares of the corporation, and to estimate therefrom the fair cash value of all of said shares constituting its capital stock. He is also to ascertain and determine the value and amount of all real estate, machinery, etc., owned by the corporation. Then from the aggregate value of the shares of capital stock, ascertained as aforesaid, a great many deductions are to be made, and, in case of railroad and telegraph companies having lines running beyond the state, there is to be deducted "such portion of the whole valuation of their capital stock, ascertained as aforesaid, as is proportioned to the length of that part of their line lying without the commonwealth," and also an amount equal to the value of certain property located within the state, and subject to local taxation; and the corporation is to pay a tax on such part of the value of the capital stock as remains after all the deductions are made. It thus appears that these statutes, of which the foregoing is a mere summary, undertake to provide a just and equitable mode by which the taxable property of a corporation shall be ascertained, according to business principles and usual methods of valuation and appraisement; and that mode is radically and entirely different from the unlimited irresponsible taxation of a "franchise," without regulation or condition, and without any necessary consideration of property values or recognized rules of assessment, such as we find in the case at bar. The tax under the Massachusetts statutes was a tax on property, and so the court clearly holds. Counsel for the telegraph company in that case argued that the tax was upon the franchise, and therefore void; and the court said upon that point as follows: "The argument is very much pressed that it is a tax upon the franchise of the company, which franchise, being derived from the United States by virtue of the statute above recited, cannot be taxed by a state; and counsel for appellant occasionally speak of the tax authorized by the law of Massachusetts upon this as well as all other corporations doing business within its territory, whether organized under its laws or not, as a tax upon their franchises. But by whatever name it may be called, as described in the laws of Massachusetts, it is essentially an excise upon the capital of the corporation. The laws of that commonwealth attempt to ascertain the just amount which any corporation engaged in business within its limits shall pay as a contribution to the support of its government upon the amount and value of the capital so employed by it therein." The court further say that the rights conferred on the company by the said act of congress do not exempt it from the "ordinary burdens of taxation," and that it is "liable upon its real or personal property as any other person would be;" and, referring to Telegraph Co. v. Texas, supra, it quotes the expression of Chief Justice WAITE that "its property in the state is subject to taxation the same as other property." Again, the court say: "The tax in the present case, though nominally upon the shares of the capital stock of the company, is, in effect, a tax upon that organization on account of property owned and used by it in the state of Massachusetts." We think, therefore, that the decision is clearly to the point that the thing there sought to be taxed, "as described in the laws of Massachusetts," was not "franchise," but property in the ordinary sense, "by whatever name it may be called." Under this view the case is entirely consistent with those of California v. Railroad Co., 127 U. S., 18 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1073, and with the Pensacola Case and the Texas, above cited; otherwise, it is impossible to reconcile it with those cases. Moreover, in the Massachusetts case, the statutes provided that if the telegraph company failed to pay the taxes, it should be enjoined from doing business, and the decree of the lower court had awarded an injunction; but the supreme court reversed that part of the decree, and held that the provision in the statutes for an injunction was, as against appellant, void; thus, in effect, recognizing the rights of the appellant under the said act of congress as they had been declared in the other decisions hereinbefore cited. The case of Massachusetts v. Telegraph Co., 141 U. S. 40, 11 Sup. Ct. Rep. 889, also cited by respondent, is the same, practically, as the case in 125 U. S. 530, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 961, which we have just been reviewing. It must be remembered that it has never been held in any of the cases that the property of a corporation holding national franchises was not subject to state taxation. In McCulloch v. Maryland, the court say: "This opinion does not deprive the states of any resources which they originally possessed. It does not extend to a tax paid by the real property of the bank in common with the other real property within the state."

From the foregoing decisions and views, we are of opinion that the taxes sought to be recovered in this case were beyond the power of the state to levy, and therefore void. The judgment is reversed, with direction to the superior court to dismiss the action.

On rehearing.

Per Curiam. The petition for rehearing is denied, but the following paragraph is eliminated from the opinion: "The testimony of Mr. Stewart should have been excluded; and the court erred in receiving it in the light of the circumstances shown by the record; but whether the appellant was prejudiced thereby to such extent as to justify a reversal upon that ground alone, it is not necessary to decide."

HARVEY v. DALE. (No. 15,128.)

Promissory Note—Failure of Consideration—Sale of Bonds.

In an action on a note given for the purchase of a bond, the invalidity of such bond, on account of noncompliance with statutory requirements in its issue, does not constitute a failure of consideration.

In bank. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; W. E. Greene, Judge.

Action by Harvey against Dale on a promissory note. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. T. Baggett, for appellant. James A. Waymire, for respondent.

Harrison, J. Action on a promissory note, to which the defendant pleaded a failure of consideration. Plaintiff recovered judgment, and the defendant has appealed. The cause was tried upon an agreed statement of facts, from which it appears that the note sued on was given for the purchase, by the defendant from the plaintiff, of one of a series of 5000 $1,000 bonds that had been issued by the Blue Lakes Water Company, a corporation duly organized and doing business under the laws of this state. The agreed statement also contains the various steps taken by the corporation in the matter of its issuance of the bonds; and it is contended on the part of the appellant that, by reason of the failure to take certain other steps which he claims are required by the statute, the bonds are invalid, and therefore the consideration for his note has failed. The sufficiency of the acts done by the corporation in the issuance of the bonds is the only question presented in the points of the respective counsel, and upon this question we have been referred merely to section 359 of the Civil Code, designating the steps to be taken by a corporation for the issuance of its bonds, and are asked to determine whether the compliance with the steps designated by that section was sufficient to render the bonds valid. But as this question is not involved in determining the correctness of the judgment appealed from, it would not be proper to enter into its discussion, especially as the corporation and other bondholders who are directly interested in the question are not before the court. In Sutro v. Rhodes, 92 Cal. 117, 28 Pac. Rep. 98, it was held that where one had sold certain county bonds that were invalid by reason of their having been issued without authority, such invalidity did not constitute a failure of consideration, and that the purchaser could not maintain an action to recover from his vendor the money which he had paid for the bonds, referring in support thereof to section 1774 of the Civil Code, and Otis v. Cullum, 92 U. S. 447. Upon the principles of that case, we must hold that the defendant herein cannot resist the payment of the note sued upon. He got from the plaintiff exactly what he intended to buy and did buy, viz., one of the bonds of the corporation. He had the same opportunity as the plaintiff to ascertain the steps that had been taken by the corporation in the issuance of the bonds, and, whether he made such examination or not, he bought subject to the rule of caveat emptor, and assumed all the risk of its invalidity when he accepted the bond in exchange for his promissory note. The judgment is affirmed.

In re GREEN. (No. 14,726.)

INSOLVENCY—SCHEDULE AND INVENTORY—VERIFICATION.

Insolvent Act 1880, § 12, provides that in involuntary insolvency proceedings the debtor shall file the schedule of debts and inventory of property required by sections 3 and 4. Sections 3 and 4, under the head of "Voluntary Insolvency," provide for a schedule and inventory, and what they shall contain. Section 5, under the same head, requires the schedule and inventory to be verified. Held that, there being no requirement to that effect in sections 3 and 4, and section 12, which provides for the schedule and inventory, failing to refer to section 5, which requires their verification, it was unnecessary that the schedule and inventory in involuntary proceedings be verified.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sonoma county; S. K. DOUGHERTY, Judge.

In the matter of Paul F. Green, an insolvent debtor. Appeal from an order discharging said Green from his debts. Affirmed.

Barham & Bolton, for appellant. J. C. Sims and A. B. Ware, for respondent.

SHARPSTEIN, J. Appeal from an order discharging respondent from his debts. The record shows that upon a petition of the requisite number of creditors the firm of Baxter & Green, and the members thereof, were adjudged to be insolvent, and that they prepare and file an inventory and schedule of all their property and estate, and of their debts and liabilities. Respondent, a member of said firm, filed an unverified inventory and schedule. After the expiration of more than three months from the adjudication of insolvency, respondent applied to the court for a discharge from his liabilities. Due notice of said application was given to creditors who had proved their debts, and they were notified to appear on a day appointed for that purpose, and show cause why a discharge should not be granted. On the day appointed for that purpose, appellant filed an opposition to the discharge of respondent, alleging as the ground of such opposition that, prior to the commencement of said proceedings in insolvency, respondent procured a writ of attachment to be issued and levied upon all the property of said firm of Baxter & Green, for the purpose of causing the creditors of said firm to proceed against it in involuntary insolvency. To that application respondent filed an answer denying said allegation, and upon that issue a trial was had, which resulted in a verdict and findings in favor of respondent. Appellant then objected to a discharge being granted to respondent, on the ground that respondent had not complied with the order or judgment of the court, requiring him to file an inventory and schedule, in that the inventory and schedule filed by him were not verified. The court overruled the objection, and granted a discharge to respondent from his debts. There was a literal compliance with the order of the court, which required respondent to file an inventory and schedule. The order did not expressly require that such inventory and schedule should be verified. But appellant's counsel insist that the insolvent act of 1880 requires that a debtor adjudged an insolvent upon the petition of his creditors must be required to file in court a verified inventory and schedule. Section 12 of the act provides that "if the respondent shall make default, or if, after a trial, the issues are found in favor of the petitioners, the court shall make an order adjudging that said respondent is, and was at the time of filing the petition, an insolvent debtor, and shall require said debtor, within such time as the court may designate, to file in court the schedule and inventory provided for in sections three and four of this act; and thereupon all proceedings shall be had in said matter in the same manner as if said debtor had voluntarily filed his petition." Sections 3 and 4 read as follows: "Sec. 3. Said schedule must contain a full and true statement of all his debts and liabilities, exhibiting, to the best of his knowledge and belief, to whom said debts and liabilities are due, and place of residence of his creditors, and the sum due to each; the nature of the indebtedness or demand, whether founded on written security, obligation, contract, or otherwise; the true cause and consideration thereof, and the time and place when and where said indebtedness accrued; and a statement of any existing pledge, lien, mortgage, judgment, or other security for the payment of the same. Sec. 4. Said inventory must contain an accurate description of all the estate, both real and personal, of the petitioner, including his homestead, if any, and all property exempt by law from execution, and where the same is situated, and all incumbrances thereon." As will readily be seen, neither of these sections requires a verification of the inventory and schedule to which it refers. But section 5 does require that the petition, schedule, and inventory voluntarily filed by an insolvent debtor must be verified by the affidavit of the petitioner. But section 5 is not referred to in section 12, and the omission to refer to it is, to our mind, quite significant. We think, if the legislature had intended that an involuntary insolvent debtor should verify his inventory and schedule in the same manner as a voluntary insolvent debtor is required to verify his petition, inventory, and schedule, the intention would have been clearly expressed. No such intention is expressed, and we think the implication clearly against it. Order affirmed.

Action by J. H. McCormick against W. W. Belvin and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from certain orders, defendant appeals. Dismissed.

C. L. Weller, for appellant. Pillsbury, Blanding & Hayne, for respondent.

Per Curiam. This is a motion by respondent to dismiss three appeals, upon the ground of want of undertaking on appeal. The appellant, by one notice of appeal, gave notice that he appealed from the judgment entered in the case, from an order denying appellant's motion to dismiss the action, and also from an order denying appellant's motion to set aside the judgment by default. Only one undertaking on appeal was given, in the sum of $300, and it did not refer separately to either of the appeals. "The undertaking is no undertaking at all," and there is no remedy under section 954 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Associates v. Wilkins, 71 Cal. 626, 12 Pac. Rep. 799; Corcoran v. Desmond, 71 Cal. 100, 11 Pac. Rep. 815. One of the orders, at least, was appealable,—the order denying the motion to set aside the default judgment.

The appeals are dismissed.

PEOPLE v. SWIFT et al. (No. 14,793.)

Patents—Cancellation—Fraud of Patentee—Bona Fide Purchasers—Appeal.

1. Though the denials in the answer to the allegations of a complaint do not conform to the statute, and are imperfectly made, yet, when the case is tried on the supposition that the denials are sufficient, an objection to them cannot be raised for the first time in an appellate court.

2. A patent will not be canceled on the ground that it was procured by the fraud of the patentee, where the land has passed to a bona fide purchaser from the patentee, for value and without notice of the fraud, though such purchase was made before the patent was issued, and while the patentee had only an equitable title.

3. Where a state seeks to cancel patents issued by it on the ground of fraud practiced in securing the patent, a suspicion of fraud, however strong, is not sufficient, but the proof must be clear and convincing.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Humboldt county; G. W. Hunter, Judge.

Action by the state of California against H. W. Swift and others to cancel certain patents issued for redwood timber land in Humboldt county. On the trial, plaintiff was nonsuited, and, from an order denying the motion for a new trial, appeals. Affirmed.

Atty. Gen. Hart and John W. Turner, for appellant. Horace L. Smith, for respondents.

Garoutte, J. This action was brought by the state to cancel certain patents issued for redwood timber land, situated in Humboldt county. After the certificates of purchase were issued to the several entrymen, each respectively conveyed the land included in his certificate to David Evans, who subsequently conveyed to one J. D. Walker, and upon June 16, 1885, Walker conveyed to the defendants H. W. Swift, T. W. Harvey, and Robert J. Walker, as trustees for other persons. It is sought by plaintiff to cancel these patents, upon the ground that they were procured by fraud and conspiracy practiced by the various parties to these transfers, in connection with other persons, for the benefit of and with the full knowledge and active consent of the defendant the California Redwood Company, a corporation. This corporation answered the complaint, denying the allegations thereof, and disclaiming any interest in the land involved in the litigation, and thereupon the action was dismissed as to such defendant. The defendants Swift, Harvey, and Walker denied the allegations of the complaint as to any fraud or conspiracy, admitted the land was conveyed to them as trustees, and set out that they held it in trust for the Humboldt Redwood Company, Limited, and that such company was a bona fide purchaser for a valuable consideration, and without notice of any fraud practiced in the procurement of the title from the state. The plaintiff was nonsuited, and now appeals from the order denying the motion for a new trial. Many of the denials of the answer are as follows: "And further answering, this defendant says 'that he has no knowledge or information sufficient to enable him to form a belief as to the truth of or to answer the allegation in said complaint contained, that * * *; and therefore he denies the said allegation, and the whole thereof.'" It is now insisted by appellant that these denials are not sufficient to constitute an issue, and that all the allegations of the complaint, where such character of denial exists in the answer, must be taken as true. The form of the denials is neither in line with the statute, nor valuable for future precedent, yet no objection was made to its sufficiency in the trial court, and the case undoubtedly went to judgment upon the theory that these denials were sufficient to create an issue. While they are imperfectly made, we do not consider them fatally defective, in view of the fact that appellant treated them as creating an issue, by supporting the allegations of the complaint in such regard with evidence, and from the further fact that the trial court undoubtedly so considered the matter in passing upon the motion for a nonsuit. To now sustain appellant's contention as to the insufficiency of the denials would not only be an injustice to respondents, but an injustice to the trial court. As was said in White v. Railroad Co., 50 Cal. 419: "The case seems to have been tried upon the supposition that the answer presented a sufficient denial to the allegations of the complaint, and to raise the objection for the first time in this court is too late."

If the defendants are bona fide purchasers for value, without notice, their title cannot be attacked by the state, notwithstanding fraud was practiced by their grantors in securing the patents. The recent case of Coal, etc., Co. v. U. S., 123 U. S. 307, 8 Sup. Ct. Rep. 131, is in many essential features similar to the case at bar; and there the court, speaking to this point through Mr. Justice MATTHEWS, said: "It is fully established by the evidence that there were no actual settlements and improvements on any of the lands, as falsely set out in the affidavits in support of the pre-emption claims and in the certificates issued thereon. This undoubtedly constituted a fraud upon the United States sufficient in equity as against the parties perpetrating it, or those claiming under them with notice of it, to justify the cancellation of the patents issued to them. But it is not such a fraud as prevents the passing of the legal title by the patents. It follows that, to a bill in equity to cancel the patents upon these grounds alone, the defense of a bona fide purchaser for value without notice is perfect." It is insisted that defendants were not innocent purchasers, and for that reason are not entitled to the benefits of the rule quoted. Before passing to an examination of the record upon this point, we would say the evidence necessary to be produced in a court of equity to justify the setting aside of a patent to state or United States lands, must be clear, convincing, and unequivocal. As was said in the Maxwell Land Grant Case, 121 U. S. 331, 7 Sup. Ct. Rep. 1015: "It is not to be admitted that the titles by which so much property in this country and so many rights are held, purporting to emanate from the authoritative action of the officers of the government, and, as in this case, under the seal and signature of the president of the United States himself, shall be dependent upon the hazard of successful resistance to the whims and caprices of every person who chooses to attack them in a court of justice; but it should be well understood that only that class of evidence which commands respect, and that amount of it which produces conviction, shall make such an attempt successful." The foregoing rule of evidence not only applies to the matter of fraud practiced upon the government by the entrymen and others in the actual procurement of the patents, but applies with equal force and effect to the good faith and innocence of the subsequent grantee.

Upon a careful examination of the record, we are of the opinion that the evidence entirely fails to establish the fact that defendants actually connived at or had notice of the fraud and perjury practiced in the procurement of these patents; for that some of them at least were procured through fraud and perjury amply sufficient to justify their cancellation by the state, if held by the original parties, or those claiming under them with notice, the evidence fully indicates. The actual purchasers of these lands were principally residents of Scotland, and it is not claimed that they were personally conversant with any of the details of the transaction; but it is insisted that their agent, one J. D. Walker, living in San Francisco, made the agreement of purchase with notice of the frauds to be practiced in the procurement of the title. We find but one fact in the case that to any degree casts suspicion upon the good faith and innocence of Walker in entering into this agreement of purchase, and that is the fact that he knew at the date of the agreement that the lands were the public lands of the state. But to create a suspicion, however strong that suspicion may be, is not sufficient under the rules of evidence by which we are guided. These parties should not lose their lands by a judgment based upon evidence from which suspicions, inferences, and conjectures of fraud only can be deduced. The stability of titles demands that a patent should only be annulled by a court of equity upon full and complete proof,—upon testimony which the courts say must be "clear, unequivocal, and convincing." As against the suspicion of the fraud created by Walker's knowledge that the title to these lands was vested in the state, we have his positive denials in detail of any participation in or knowledge of any fraud of any kind or character practiced in the procurement of these patents. His testimony, if true, sustains the judgment, and the character of the judgment clearly indicates that such testimony favorably impressed the trial court.

It is insisted that, defendants having purchased the land before the patent issued, they simply purchased an equity, and that the rule of bona fide purchasers for value without notice does not apply to equitable titles. If defendants' title had not ripened into a perfect legal title by virtue of the issuance of the patents prior to the commencement of this action, there would be merit in the contention, under the authority of Taylor v. Weston, 77 Cal. 534, 20 Pac. Rep. 62. But in that case, after a careful review of the authorities, the opinion of the court concludes by saying: "It is hardly necessary to add that in what we have said we have no reference to cases where the legal title has passed to the person through whom the bona fide purchaser claims." That is the status of this case exactly, and there can be no question but that these bona fide purchasers, being possessed of perfect legal title at the time this attack was made, although having purchased prior to the issuance of the patent, were in no worse position than though the patent had issued prior to the date of their purchase. Let the order be affirmed.

HASKIN v. JAMES. (No. 14,812.)

FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES — CONSIDERATION — RIGHTS OF GRANTEE—REVIEW ON APPEAL.

1. Where the transferee of valuable property of an insolvent firm did not know, or have reasonable cause to believe, that the transfer was made to prevent the property from coming into the hands of their assignee in insolvency, or to defeat the object of the insolvent act, and paid full consideration in good faith, he is not liable to the assignee in insolvency appointed within a month after such transfer.

2. The finding of a court that had the witnesses before it, on a point on which the evidence was conflicting, will not be disturbed.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Luis Obispo county; V. A. GREGG, Judge.

Action by Charles A. Haskin, assignee, etc., against D. W. James. Judgment for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Wilcoxson & Bouldin, for appellant.
Graves & Graves, for respondent.

FOOTE, C. The plaintiff, assignee of the partnership of Ward & James, insolvent debtors, brings this action against the defendant, D. W. James, to recover the value of certain property of the partnership, which it is alleged had been transferred to the defendant within one month prior to the creditors' petition in insolvency, by means of which transfer a preference had been made, in violation of section 55 of the insolvent act of 1880. The court below found against the contention of the plaintiff, and rendered judgment accordingly, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, the assignee appeals.

The findings are assailed as being contradictory, and as being unsupported by the evidence. It is claimed that in one part of the findings the court finds the defendant a creditor of the insolvents, and in another part that he is not a creditor, as meant in the insolvent act, and that, therefore, the judgment should be reversed. We do not deem it necessary to determine that question, because, under our view of the matter, it becomes of no consequence whether the defendant, at the time the transfer was made, was or was not a creditor of the insolvent debtors. The court finds, among other things, "that said defendant James did not believe, and did not have reasonable cause to believe, at or before the time he took said assignment from said Ward & James, that said Ward & James were insolvent, or that said assignment was made by them with a view to prevent the property conveyed from coming into the hands of their assignee in insolvency, or to prevent the same from being distributed ratably among their creditors, or to defeat the object of the insolvent act, or to hinder, impede, or delay the operation of the insolvent act." The transaction seems to have been one where it appears that this firm had improperly failed to account for certain money due Wells, Fargo & Co., and where they were threatened to be proceeded against criminally, and that they sought to get the defendant, who was the father of one of the partners, to become security for the payment of this money; and to secure him for that amount, and not for any previous liability which he was under for them, they made this transfer. The transfer was made, therefore, not in consideration of past indebtedness to the defendant, but for the purpose of securing him in his future payments of their debts. The evidence that the defendant did not know of the insolvency of the firm, or have reason to believe they were insolvent, is conflicting, but we cannot say that the court below, with the witnesses present and before it, and with an opportunity to observe their manner of testifying, was manifestly wrong in giving credence to one side rather than the other. For this reason we do not think the finding on the point above mentioned should be disturbed, and under it the defendant cannot be said to have accepted the preference in violation of the insolvent act. Bernheim v. Christal, 76 Cal. 567, 18 Pac. Rep. 683. Again, the evidence and the finding show that the property transferred was worth $900, and the amount the defendant agreed to pay and did pay afterwards for the insolvents was $1,272.47. As the findings show upon sufficient evidence that the defendant did not know or have any reason to believe a fraud was intended on the insolvent act on the part of the insolvent debtors, and it appears that he paid full consideration for the goods in good faith, he is not liable in this action. Albertoli v. Branham, 80 Cal. 631, 22 Pac. Rep. 404. For these reasons we think that the judgment and order should be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

DORN v. BAKER et al. (No. 14,809.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 17, 1892.)

TAX TITLE—SALE OF EQUITABLE INTEREST—EJECTMENT—PLEADING—AMENDMENT.

1. The purchaser at a tax sale of land held under a certificate of purchase from the state acquires only an equitable title, and the certificate holder, on subsequently completing his purchase and procuring a patent, may recover the land in ejectment against the tax purchaser, where no equitable defense was pleaded.

2. There is no error in refusing to permit an amended answer to be filed, where it states no defense that could not be made under the original answer.

Ejectment by N. A. Dorn against J. C. Baker and others. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Venable & Goodchild and Graves & Graves, for appellants. F. A. Dorn, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. This is an action of ejectment to recover possession of the east half of a certain thirty-sixth section of land in San Luis Obispo county, and the complaint is in the ordinary form. The answer of defendants simply denies the averments of the complaint, and alleges that the cause of action is barred by the statute of limitations. At the trial, the plaintiff introduced in evidence a patent from the state of California, dated March 21, 1891, granting to him the demanded premises. The defendants then admitted that they were, and had been since January 1, 1891, in possession of said land. And the plaintiff admitted that prior to the year 1880, one Alois Schneider applied to the state of California to purchase the said land, and paid to the state 20 per cent. of the purchase price and interest, and received a school land certificate of purchase therefor; that Schneider died in the year 1887, and thereafter, in the year 1890, plaintiff succeeded to his rights in and to the said land, under and through a deed executed by the administrator of his estate, after due and regular proceedings in the matter of his estate, and pursuant to an order of the court duly made, confirming the sale to plaintiff, and directing the execution of the deed. And plaintiff testified that at the time he purchased the land there was due the state, on the certificate of purchase therefor, about $600, which he paid to the state, and then, as the assignee of the certificate, received the patent introduced by him in evidence, and that he had no title to the land other than the one thus acquired. The defendants then offered in evidence a tax collector's deed of the land, which was executed to defendant Baker on March 12, and recorded on April 6, 1886, and which recited, among other things, that the land was assessed to Alois Schneider for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1885, and, the state and county taxes due thereon not being paid, was sold to Baker on March 6, 1885, for the sum of $9.13, the full amount of the taxes, costs, and charges. The plaintiff objected to the deed being received in evidence, upon the ground that it was immaterial, and was not pleaded. The court overruled the objection, and thereupon the case was submitted. On the next day, and before the case was decided, the defendants presented to the court and asked leave to file an amended answer, in which, in addition to the denials and averments of their original answer, they set out a copy of the said tax deed, and alleged that defendant Baker was the owner of said property, and in possession thereof, and had been such owner and in possession since the 6th day of March, 1885. The plaintiff objected to the filing of the amended answer upon the grounds "that said amendments were offered too late, and not at the proper time, and that they should have been offered at the time of the trial; that the amendments as offered do not constitute a defense; that no notice has been given to the plaintiff or his attorney of the proposed amendments, and the same, or a copy thereof, had not been served on the plaintiff or his attorney." The court sustained the objection, and the defendants excepted to the ruling. Thereafter the court found the facts and rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, defendants have appealed.

In support of the appeal it is now claimed that the evidence did not justify the finding that the plaintiff was the owner and entitled to the possession of the land, or the finding that the entry of defendants was without right or title; and it is urged that under the pleadings defendants had a right to introduce any evidence which might show, or tend to show, that plaintiff had no right of entry when the action was commenced; and that the evidence introduced did show that Baker, by his tax deed, acquired all the interest of Schneider in the land and in the certificate of purchase, which, by section 3514 of the Political Code, was made prima facie evidence of title; and hence that, under the rule declared in Clark v. Baker, 14 Cal. 612, and other cases, and in section 1106 of the Civil Code, the patent issued to plaintiff inured to Baker's benefit, and fed his title. We do not think the rule invoked applicable to the facts of this case. At most, the tax deed conveyed to Baker only such interest in the land as Schneider then had. That interest was an equitable title, which could only be perfected by paying up the balance of the purchase money, with the interest due thereon, and other charges, and obtaining the legal title from the state. Neither Schneider nor Baker ever made or offered to make these payments, but the plaintiff made them for and on his own behalf. When, therefore, he obtained the patent, the legal title vested in him, and the most that can be claimed is that Baker has a right, which a court of equity would enforce, to have that title transferred to him upon his doing equity and paying back to plaintiff all the money he has paid, and interest thereon. But in an action of ejectment the legal title will always prevail against an equitable one, if no equitable defense is pleaded. Hartley v. Brown, 51 Cal. 465; Kentfield v. Hayes, 57 Cal. 409. Here no equitable defense was pleaded, either in the original or amended answer, and the court, therefore, rightly gave judgment for the plaintiff. There was no error in refusing to permit the amended answer to be filed. The application was addressed to the discretion of the court, and the paper offered stated no defense that could not be made under the original answer. The statute of limitations did not begin to run until the patent was issued, and there can be no pretense, therefore, that the cause of action was barred. Manly v. Howlett, 55 Cal. 94. We advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

We concur: Vanclief, C.; Temple, C.

BURR v. BOARD OF SUP'RS OF SACRAMENTO COUNTY. (No. 14,759.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 20, 1892.)

County Board — Allowance of Claims — Writ of Review — Interest of Taxpayer — Remedy at Law.

1. A petition for a writ of review by a private citizen, asking the annulment of an order of a county board illegally allowing a claim against the county, which had not been duly verified, will not be granted, where the money has been obtained on the said order, because the annulment would not secure a return of the money, nor have any other beneficial effect, nor would the judgment therein be competent as evidence in a suit by the county against the recipient of the money, the county auditor, or treasurer, neither being a party to the said proceeding.

2. The county government act, (section 8,) making it the duty of a county attorney, whenever any money shall have actually been paid under an order of the supervisors, made without lawful authority, to institute suit for the said money in the name of the county, affords an adequate remedy at law in such cases; but the interest which a mere citizen or taxpayer has in the matter does not entitle him to bring suit in his own name, until after the matter has been laid before the attorney, and the latter has refused to act.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; W. C. Van Fleet, Judge.

Petition by E. A. Burr for the annulling of an order of the board of supervisors of Sacramento county. There was a demurrer to the petition, which was sustained, and judgment rendered for the board. Petitioner appeals. Affirmed.

Johnson, Johnson & Johnson, for appellant. A. J. & Elwood Bruner, for respondent.

Vanclief, C. Petition to the superior court for a writ of review for the purpose of annulling an order of the respondent board, allowing a claim of James McClatchy & Co. against the county for advertising. The court sustained a general demurrer to the petition, and thereupon, the petitioner declining to amend, rendered judgment for respondent. Whether or not the court erred in sustaining the demurrer is the only question presented for decision. The petition shows that the petitioner is a resident, citizen, and taxpayer of Sacramento county; that on or about the 11th day of April, 1891, the respondent heard and considered the claim of McClatchy & Co. for $1,567, for advertising, and allowed it to the extent of $1,317; that immediately thereafter, on the same day, McClatchy & Co. procured a warrant therefor from the county auditor, and obtained the money on the warrant from the county treasurer; and "that the said claim or bill of the said firm, so heard, considered, and allowed by respondent, was not duly or otherwise verified as to its correctness, and no claim therefor, duly or otherwise verified, was ever presented to or filed with the clerk of said board." It is also stated that because the claim was not verified the board had no jurisdiction to consider or allow it; and "that petitioner has no plain, speedy, or adequate remedy at law."

1. Conceding that the action of the board of supervisors was unauthorized and in excess of its jurisdiction, and that the money was wrongfully and unlawfully obtained from the county treasury, I think the relief sought, and all relief that could be given in this proceeding, viz., the annulment of the order of the board allowing the claim, would be of no material or beneficial consequence to the petitioner or to the county. It would not restore to the county treasury the money obtained by McClatchy & Co.; nor would the judgment be competent evidence in a suit by the county against McClatchy & Co., the county auditor, or the treasurer, as neither of them is a party to this proceeding; and, if an action by the county against the individual members of the board can be maintained on the facts stated in the petition, the alleged fact that the claim of McClatchy & Co. was not verified, and all other facts necessary to prove the nullity of the order of the board, may be proved in such action by any evidence which would be competent to prove them in this proceeding. "The law neither does nor requires idle acts." Civil Code, § 3532. A court will not exercise a power for no material or useful purpose, (Huntington v. Nicoll, 3 Johns. 598,) and will refuse a writ of mandamus if it appears that it can have no beneficial effect, (People v. Supervisors, 12 Barb. 222.)

2. A remedy for the wrong complained of is provided by section 8 of the county government act, as follows: "Sec. 8. Hereafter, whenever any board of supervisors shall without authority of law order any money paid as a salary, fees, or for any other purposes, and such money shall have been actually paid, * * * the district attorney of such county is hereby empowered, and it is hereby made his duty, to institute suit in the name of the county against such person or persons to recover the money so paid and twenty per cent. damages for the use thereof, and no order of the board of supervisors therefor shall be necessary to maintain such suit." This seems to be a plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law, available to the petitioner or to any other taxpayer of the county, by complaint to the district attorney; and, to say the least, the interest which a mere taxpayer has in the matter does not entitle him to bring suit in his own name until after the district attorney has refused to perform the duty enjoined upon him by the eighth section of the county government act. The petition does not show that any information of the alleged wrong has been laid before the district attorney, nor that he has failed or refused to perform his duty. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: FOOTE, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

HULSMAN v. TODD et al. (No. 14,568.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 20, 1892.)

WATER RIGHTS—QUIETING TITLE—PLEADING—FINDINGS—JOINT DEFENDANTS.

1. A complaint in an action to quiet title to the waters of a certain creek, and enjoin defendants' diversion of the same, alleging defendants' claim of interest in the said waters merely on information and belief, although perhaps imperfect in its assertion of their said claim, is not open to a general demurrer, where it alleges also facts showing a wrongful diversion by defendants, and a threatened continuance.

2. Findings that at the commencement of suit defendants claimed an interest in the waters adverse to plaintiff, and without right; that plaintiff had irrigated his land with said waters for 30 years, taking 230 inches of water, all of which was necessary for the purpose; and that he owned all waters flowing in the creek above his land, to the extent aforesaid,—were sufficient upon the issue raised by the pleadings as to whether defendants had any right, title, or interest in the waters, or any portion thereof, and also upon the plea of limitation, making it clear, at least, that if more specific findings had been made they would necessarily have been adverse to defendants.

3. Defendants made common answer, denying that plaintiff had any right to certain of the water, which belonged to defendants, and which one of their number had diverted, and disclaiming any right, except to the water owned by the said defendant. The court found that defendants claimed an interest in the water adverse to plaintiff, and that the said defendant, in pursuance thereof, and for the several benefit of himself and his codefendants, entered on the water, and diverted a portion belonging to plaintiff. Held, that a joint judgment for damages was proper against each defendant making the said answer, even though the ditch might not then have been extended to his land. Miller v. Ditch Co., 25 Pac. Rep. 550, 87 Cal. 430; Blaisdell v. Stephens, 14 Nev. 17; and Foreman v. Boyle, 26 Pac. Rep. 94, 88 Cal. 290,—distinguished.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Lassen county; W. F. MASTEN, Judge.

Suit by John F. Hulsman against Joseph Todd and others to quiet title, and for other relief. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Spencer & Raker, for appellants. Goodwin & Goodwin, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. It is alleged in the complaint in this case that for more than 30 years the plaintiff and his grantors have been the owners and in possession of a certain tract of land in Lassen county, which during all that time has been held and used by them as a farm; that from time immemorial a small stream of water, known as "Lassen Creek," has flowed to, upon, and across the said tract; that in the spring the stream carries about 225 inches of water, measured under a 4-inch pressure, but the amount thereafter diminishes until the flow does not exceed 25 inches; that plaintiff is the owner of three ditches conveying water from said stream to and upon his lands to irrigate the same, and that he and his grantors have owned, possessed, and used said ditches for that purpose for 30 years last past; that the three ditches have an aggregate capacity to carry 230 inches of water, measured under a 4-inch pressure, and that plaintiff now owns the said water, and the whole thereof, and has the right to have the same flow undisturbed to, upon, and across his land, and to and through his ditches; that plaintiff is informed and believes that defendants, and each of them, claim some interest in the waters of said stream adverse to him, and that such claim is without right; that at the time of the commencement of the action there was not to exceed 75 inches of water flowing in the said stream; that defendants have entered upon the stream above plaintiff's land and ditches, and have diverted a large portion of the waters thereof, and are conveying the same entirely away from plaintiff's land, and wholly depriving him of the use thereof; that plaintiff has growing crops of grass and grain and other products upon his land, which require all the water flowing in the said stream for their growth and maturity; that to deprive plaintiff of the use of the water will result in his irreparable injury; that defendants threaten to continue such diversion, and plaintiff has already suffered damage in the sum of $100. And the prayer is that plaintiff have judgment quieting his title to the waters of Lassen creek to the extent of 230 inches as against defendants, and perpetually enjoining them from diverting any portion thereof away from his land and ditches, and for damages in the sum of $100. The defendants demurred to the complaint upon the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action, and their demurrer was overruled. They then filed a joint answer, by which they denied all the averments of the complaint, except those as to Lassen creek, the amount of water flowing in it, and their adverse claim to a portion thereof; and alleged that defendant Joseph Todd had a right to 50 inches of water of the stream, measured under a 4-inch pressure, which was prior and superior to the right thereto of the plaintiff; and that the other defendants never obstructed the flow of the waters of the creek, or claimed any interest in or right to the same, except the 50 inches owned and claimed by Joseph Todd, and subject to his superior right. They also pleaded the statute of limitations in bar of the action. After trial the court made its findings, and rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff, according to the prayer of his complaint. From that judgment the defendants appealed, and the case is brought here for review on the judgment roll alone.

The first point made for a reversal of the judgment is that the court erred in overruling the demurrer. We see no error in the ruling. The law is well settled that a general demurrer to a whole complaint cannot be sustained if the complaint states facts, though imperfectly, showing that the plaintiff is entitled to relief, either legal or equitable. White v. Lyons, 42 Cal. 279; Cassidy v. Cassidy, 63 Cal. 352; McPherson v. Weston, 64 Cal. 275, 30 Pac. Rep. 842; Fleming v. Albeck, 67 Cal. 226, 7 Pac. Rep. 659. Here the averment objected to as insufficient is "that the plaintiff is informed and believes that the defendants, and each of them, claim some interest in and to the waters of said stream, adverse to plaintiff's title thereto;" and it is argued that this is not an averment that defendants claim any interest in the waters, but only that plaintiff is informed and believes that they do; and hence that the complaint does not state a cause of action to quiet title. Conceding this to be so, still the complaint states facts showing a wrongful diversion of water by the defendants, to the detriment of plaintiff, and a threatened continuance of such diversion. Under this showing, we think the plaintiff was clearly entitled to some relief, and his complaint was therefore not demurrable on the ground that it did not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action.

The next point is that the court failed to find upon the issue raised by the pleadings, as to whether or not the defendants had "any right or title to, or interest in, the waters of said stream, or any portion thereof;" and also failed to find upon the statute of limitations, pleaded by defendants; and it is claimed that for want of findings upon these issues the judgment should be reversed. The court found "that in the early spring of 1889 the defendants claimed an interest in the waters of said stream adverse to the plaintiff, and did so claim at the time this action was commenced; that the said claim was without right, and in subordination to plaintiff's right and title to said water." It further found "that since the year 1860 the plaintiff and his grantors have occupied and improved the lands described in the complaint; * * * that at the commencement of this action plaintiff owned, and since 1861 he and his grantors have owned, the three ditches described in the complaint; * * * that by means of said ditches the plaintiff and his grantors have each year during all of said time * * * diverted from said stream and appropriated two hundred and thirty inches of water, measured under a four-inch pressure, * * * and that said amount of water is necessary during all of the spring, summer, and fall months of each year for the irrigation and other domestic wants of plaintiff on said land; and at the time this action was commenced the plaintiff owned all the water flowing in said stream above his said lands, to the extent aforesaid." These findings seem sufficient to meet and dispose of the issues referred to, and they at least make it clear that, if more specific findings had been made, they must necessarily have been adverse to appellants. The judgment cannot, therefore, be reversed for the failures complained of. People v. Center, 66 Cal. 564, 5 Pac. Rep. 263, and 6 Pac. Rep. 481; Gillespie v. Lake, 85 Cal. 407, 24 Pac. Rep. 891; Winslow v. Gohransen, 88 Cal. 450, 26 Pac. Rep. 504.

The third and last point which need be noticed is that a joint judgment for damages and costs was entered against all of the defendants. It is claimed that no judgment for damages or costs was authorized as against the defendant Hosselkus, and that the judgment entered, at least so far as it affects him, should be reversed. We do not think this claim can be sustained. It appears that Hosselkus joined in a common answer with the other defendants, denying, among other things, that plaintiff had any right to "fifty inches of the waters of said creek belonging to the defendants," and alleging that defendant Joseph Todd and his grantors rightly entered upon the stream, and diverted 50 inches of the waters thereof, and had thereby acquired a right thereto which was superior to any rights of the plaintiff; and that he (Hosselkus) claimed no right to the waters of the stream, except such as he may have to the said 50 inches owned by Joseph Todd. And the court found that the defendants claimed an interest in the waters of the stream adverse to plaintiff, and "that in pursuance of said claim, and for the several benefit of himself and his codefendants, the defendant Joseph Todd entered upon said stream above the land of plaintiff, and above each and all of his ditches, as aforesaid, and in the spring of 1889 diverted a portion of the waters belonging to plaintiff." The diversion was therefore for the benefit of Hosselkus, and presumably was made partly at his instance and by his procurement. Under these circumstances, he became jointly liable with the other defendants for the damages resulting, and it was immaterial that the ditch had not yet been extended to his land. The cases of Miller v. Ditch Co., 87 Cal. 430, 25 Pac. Rep. 550; Blaisdell v. Stephens, 14 Nev. 17; and Foreman v. Boyle, 88 Cal. 290, 26 Pac. Rep. 94,—are not in point. In those cases it was held that an action for damages cannot be maintained against several defendants jointly when each acts independently of the others, and there is no concert or unity of design between them. The rule thus stated is undoubtedly correct, but it is not applicable to this case. We advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; TEMPLE, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

RAMELLI v. IRISH. (No. 14,728.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 20, 1892.)

APPROPRIATION OF WATER—CHANGING USE—PUBLIC LANDS.

1. A right acquired by appropriation of water flowing through public land will be protected as against a subsequent purchaser of such land.

2. A person entitled to the use of water may change the place of diversion, the place where it is used, or the use to which it is applied, if others are not injured by such change.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, El Dorado county; N. D. ARNOT, Judge.

Action by Giovanni Ramelli against Joseph Irish for damages alleged to have resulted from the diversion by the defendant of a stream of water. From a judgment entered upon an order granting a motion for nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Blanchard & Swisler, for appellant. Irwin & Irwin, for respondent.

BELCHER, C. The controversy in this case is as to the respective rights of the parties thereto to divert and use for purposes of irrigation the natural waters of a small stream in El Dorado county, known as "Slate Creek." Each party alleges that his right to the said waters is prior and superior to that of the other. At the trial, when the plaintiff rested his case, the defendant moved for a nonsuit, upon the grounds "that plaintiff has failed to show that at the time the water was diverted from the bed of the stream by the defendant the quantity of water at head of plaintiff's ditch was thereby diminished; that the evidence given shows that the defendant was lawfully entitled, as riparian proprietor, to the water diverted by him, and that none of the waters have been diverted away from the stream; that the evidence given does not show that the plaintiff was entitled to any of the waters diverted by the defendant." The court granted the motion, and the plaintiff thereupon appealed from the judgment.

The facts proved were, in substance, as follows: Slate creek runs through land owned by defendant, and to which he acquired title from the government by a homestead patent in April, 1885. It carries at the beginning of the irrigating season 20 or more inches of natural water, measured under a 4-inch pressure; but the quantity diminishes as the season advances, and at the end thereof there are not more than 4 or 5 inches. As early as 1857, a ditch, now called the "Schlein Ditch," was constructed to take water from Slate creek, and carry it away, to be used in mining. It started at a point a little above the lower line of the land now owned by defendant, and took not only the natural water of the creek, but other water received from flumes passing a short distance above its head. In 1858 one Craig purchased the ditch, and thereafter held and owned it until 1873. During the time he so held the ditch he sold water conducted through it to miners, and used some of the water to irrigate his land. In 1873 he conveyed his land to one Theodore Schlein, and intended to convey the ditch, but did not mention it in his deed. He testified: "I still owned it [the ditch] until I sold it to Mr. Schlein. I sold my ranch, and that with the ranch. I did not give a deed of the ditch. I forgot to put it in the deed. This ditch ran to the land I sold to Mr. Schlein. I used this ditch for irrigating on a portion of this land. * * * This Schlein ditch was used in connection with my ranch, and I sold water through it. This ditch took the natural waters of Slate creek from the time it was cut,—some time in 1856 or '57. * * * Schlein took possession of this Schlein ditch at the time I sold the ranch. The deed is dated December 30, 1873. Mr. Schlein took possession of the ranch and ditch at the same time." In March, 1875, Schlein sold the ditch to the plaintiff Ramelli, and he testified: "I entered into possession of the Schlein ditch in November or December, 1873, and continued in possession until I sold it to Mr. Ramelli. After I sold it to him, he went into possession of it, and used it. I went into possession of it through Mr. Craig's conveyance. At the time I purchased this ranch of Mr. Craig the ditch extended onto that land,—onto that ranch. * * * At the time I bought the ranch of Mr. Craig it was intended to include the ditch also, and I used this ditch in connection with the ranch, for irrigating purposes on the ranch, while I owned the ditch and had possession of the ditch." In July, 1876, the plaintiff purchased a piece of land, and 10 or 12 years before the trial, which was in June, 1891, constructed a ditch called the "Ramelli Ditch," which commenced at a point in Slate creek about a hundred feet below the head of the Schlein ditch, and extended thence to his land, about a mile distant. From the time of the construction of this new ditch plaintiff diverted the waters of the creek through it, and used them for mining on his land, and for irrigating crops on a portion thereof, until July, 1888, when the defendant, above the point of plaintiff's diversion, wholly obstructed the flow, and thereafter refused to let any water pass down to plaintiff's ditch. At that time plaintiff had growing on his land and was irrigating about an acre and a half of potatoes, some clover, fruit trees, and blackberries, all of which, as he says, for want of the water turned away, dried up and were destroyed, to his damage in the sum of $300. The prayer of the complaint was for an injunction and damages.

We think the court erred in granting the nonsuit. It is settled law that the right to the use of water flowing in a stream may be acquired by appropriation; and when an appropriation has been made upon public land of the United States for some useful or beneficial purpose, the rights so acquired will be recognized and protected as against another person who subsequently obtains title to the land from the government. De Necochea v. Curtis, 80 Cal. 397, 20 Pac. Rep. 563, and 22 Pac. Rep. 198. It is also settled law that the person entitled to the use of water may change the place of diversion, or the place where it is used, or the use to which it was first applied, if others are not injured by such change. Civil Code, § 1412; Kidd v. Laird, 15 Cal. 162; Davis v. Gale, 32 Cal. 27. Here it appears that the waters of Slate creek were appropriated for a useful purpose as early as 1857. And the evidence tended to show that the plaintiff had at least obtained a complete equitable title to the ditch then constructed, and the water right thereby acquired, and that the same had not been abandoned or lost. The plaintiff also constructed his new ditch some time between 1879 and 1881, and thereby again diverted and appropriated the waters of the creek. And after this appropriation he continued to use the waters for useful purposes until 1888, without any objection, so far as appears, on the part of the defendant. The defendant's patent may relate back to a point of time five years before its date, and still his rights as a riparian proprietor to claim and use the water on his land would be subordinate to those of the plaintiff, if the latter constructed his "Ramelli ditch" before that time, or had succeeded to and still retained the rights of the first appropriators. Under these circumstances, we think the case should have been fully tried, and the rights of the parties determined in view of all the evidence. We advise that the judgment be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: Vanclief, C.; Foote, C.

Per Curiam. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

SHEPLAR v. GREEN et al. (No. 14,826.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 20, 1892.)

Specific Performance—When Lies—Tender of Purchase Money.

1. Where the purchaser of land by contract pays part of the purchase money, takes possession, and makes improvements, the vendor, by bringing action against him to quiet title, without first offering to convey, repudiates the contract, and the purchaser may file a cross complaint for specific performance without a tender of the balance of purchase money.

2. Where the purchaser withdraws money deposited by him to cover balance due on the purchase, the withdrawal, though a violation of the contract, will not release the vendor from offering to convey and demanding the exact sum due before bringing suit, nor will it prevent the purchaser from obtaining specific performance.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, El Dorado county; N. D. Arnot, Judge.

Action by Samuel H. Sheplar against W. C. Green and others to quiet title. From a judgment in favor of Green and Robinson, plaintiff appealed. Affirmed.

George E. Williams, for appellant.

The question of tender being necessary before filing the cross complaint has been settled by several decisions in this state, and I will only refer to two of the cases: Goodale v. West, 5 Cal. 339; Englander v. Rogers, 41 Cal. 422.

Blanchard & Swisler, for respondents.

Haynes, C. Appeal from a judgment in favor of respondents Green and Robinson upon the judgment roll. The action was brought against respondents and one J. W. Rupley to quiet title to 80 acres of mineral land. Each defendant answered separately, and each filed a cross complaint for specific performance; Rupley to a part thereof containing about 20 acres, under a contract made and recorded in 1871; and the other defendants under a contract of purchase made by defendant Green with the plaintiff July 3, 1890, for the whole of said 80 acres. Robinson's claim was under this contract, in which he was interested with Green. Judgment went in favor of Rupley for the part claimed by him, and described as lying "below the toll road," being 20 acres; and in favor of defendants Green and Robinson upon their cross complaint, awarding specific performance of the Green contract for the remaining 60 acres. There was no appeal from the judgment in favor of Rupley.

The contract price of the land was $2,500, of which Green paid plaintiff $1,000, and deposited the remaining $1,500 in the hands of one Mahoney; the deposit, by the terms of the contract, to remain in his hands "until approval of title" by an attorney named in the contract, whose decision as to title should be final. Five days were allowed for examination of title after receipt of the abstract, and the balance of the purchase money "to be paid on delivery of deed." The contract further provided that the purchaser was to get full 80 acres of "bed rock," but if there should be less the price was to be correspondingly reduced. At the date of the contract the quantity of land embraced in the Rupley contract was not known. Plaintiff took no steps to ascertain the quantity, nor did he furnish an abstract, as to which matters the contract was silent. In the latter part of July, 1890, defendant Robinson had the Rupley tract surveyed, and also procured an abstract of title, on which the Rupley contract appeared. Soon thereafter, and before August 8th, the attorney informed plaintiff that there were 20 acres in the Rupley lot, and that he had good title to the remaining 60 acres. Immediately after entering into the contract defendants went into possession of the land, and made valuable improvements thereon, and also upon adjoining land, with a view to the development of the land in question. On August 8th defendants withdrew the deposit of $1,500. Plaintiff never tendered a deed, nor offered to convey; nor did defendants tender the remainder of the purchase money, or demand a conveyance. The court further found that defendants were at all times able, ready, and willing to complete the purchase, and that upon the trial they tendered to plaintiff $875, which plaintiff declined, and which defendants afterwards, and before the close of the trial, deposited with the clerk for the plaintiff, and which sum the court found was the balance due on the contract. On these facts appellant raises two questions: "(1) Was a tender of the balance of the purchase money by the defendants necessary before filing their cross complaint? (2) Was the withdrawal of the money by Green from the depositary a violation of the contract?"

1. The covenants of the parties were mutual and dependent. Plaintiff never having offered to convey, the defendants were not in default when plaintiff commenced his action to quiet title, which, in itself, was a repudiation of the contract. A tender of the remainder of the purchase money, under such circumstances, would have been a vain thing, which the law does not require. Counsel contends that the settled law in this state requires a plaintiff to tender performance before bringing suit, and that when a defendant files a cross complaint he becomes an actor or plaintiff, and must therefore tender performance on his part. The rule is not universal as to either party. In Dowd v. Clarke, 54 Cal. at page 50, the vendee sought specific performance. The court said: "He [the defendant] ignored altogether the right of the plaintiff to purchase, and on well-settled principles this was a waiver of the necessity of a tender before bringing suit." See, also, Barsolou v. Newton, 63 Cal. at page 226, and Pom. Spec. Perf. § 361. These authorities do not in the least conflict with the cases cited by appellant's counsel, none of which presented facts bringing them within the exception above stated.

2. The withdrawal of the deposit on the 8th of August, 1890, if a violation of the contract, was not such as to release the plaintiff from performing, or offering to perform, on his part; nor such as to prevent the defendants from obtaining specific performance against the plaintiff under the facts found by the court. The plaintiff had received more than half of the purchase money, and put defendants in possession, and permitted them to make valuable improvements on the land, yet had taken no steps to complete the contract. He was informed, prior to the withdrawal of the money, of the quantity of land claimed by Rupley, and which would largely diminish the amount required to complete the purchase, so that but little over one half the sum deposited was required for that purpose. It may be questioned, under these circumstances, viewed in the light of the wording of the contract, whether the withdrawal was a violation of its terms; but, conceding that it was, the plaintiff was not injured. It is true, he called upon the attorney who became the depositary, by consent of the parties, for the money, four days before the commencement of the action, but if that could be considered a demand, it was for the whole sum deposited, and not for the less sum actually due; nor was it accompanied by a tender of a deed or offer to convey. He was therefore not entitled to the money from the depositary, if it had then been in his hands; and the circumstances did not indicate that he had any intention of performing the contract on his part. Any lack of exact compliance with the terms of the contract on the part of defendants was sufficiently compensated by allowing costs to the plaintiff, while a refusal to grant defendants their prayer for specific performance against the plaintiff would have caused them irreparable loss. I advise that the judgment be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; VANCLIEF, C.

ABRAM v. STUART et al. (No. 14,807.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 23, 1892.)

COSTS—DISCRETION OF COURT.

Under Code Civil Proc. § 1025, which provides that in certain cases "costs may be allowed or not, and, if allowed, may be apportioned between the parties on the same or adverse sides, in the discretion of the court," in a suit for an injunction against several defendants, though plaintiff has judgment against one of the defendants, where the issues are found in favor of the others, it is not an abuse of discretion to allow such defendants costs against plaintiff.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Placer county; J. E. PREWITT, Judge.

Action for an injunction by John Abram against William Stuart and others. Plaintiff had judgment against one of the defendants only, and from the order allowing costs to the successful defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

F. P. Tuttle, for appellant. J. M. Fulweiler, B. P. Tabor, and Jo. Hamilton, for respondents.

BELCHER, C. On the 14th of July, 1890, the defendant Kaslowsky, to secure payment of the sum of $504.21, executed to the plaintiff a mortgage upon a certain mining claim and water ditch. which he had owned for many years, known as the "Stony Bar Claim" and "Stony Bar Ditch." On the 23d of May, 1890, Kaslowsky and one Graydon located another mining claim known as the "Red Hill Claim," which seems to have adjoined the Stony Bar claim, and across which the Stony Bar ditch extended. In June, 1890, Graydon and the defendants Stuart and Kaslowsky began to work the Red Hill claim by the hydraulic process, dumping the debris and tailings upon the Stony Bar claim, and during that month they washed away 79 feet of the Stony Bar ditch. Work was then suspended until December, 1890, when the defendants, some of whom had purchased Graydon's interest, began again to mine and wash away the Red Hill claim, dumping the tailings as before, and they continued such work up to the time this action was commenced, on January 9, 1891. After resuming work on the mine, as aforesaid, defendants washed away 87 feet more of the Stony Bar ditch. In his complaint the plaintiff alleged that Kaslowsky executed to him the mortgage as before stated, and that on or about December 1, 1890, the defendants "entered upon said property, and ever since said date have been, and now are, engaged in mining on a portion of the same by forcing water through pipes and a nozzle under pressure, and thereby disintegrating, washing away, and removing the earth, rock, and gravel, and causing the same to pass through cuts and sluices, where gold is retained;" "that by reason of said working the value of said mining property is being constantly diminished, and the security of plaintiff thereby impaired;" also that by reason of said working defendants have washed away a portion of said Stony Bar ditch, and destroyed the situs of the same, and they threaten to continue their working, and totally destroy said ditch, and that by the destruction of the ditch the security of plaintiff will be rendered valueless; that the work carried on as aforesaid by defendants has caused and is causing the earth, rock, and gravel to be deposited on a portion of the claim; and that the said mining claim is of the value of $250, and the said ditch is of the value of $250. Wherefore plaintiff prays that a temporary injunction be issued, restraining the defendants from committing the acts complained of, and that on the final hearing the injunction be made perpetual. The defendant Kaslowsky failed to answer, and his default was entered. The other defendants answered, and the principal issues raised were as to whether or not the plaintiff's mortgage covered the Red Hill claim, and as to whether or not the Stony Bar claim and ditch were of any value as a mortgage security. After trial, the court found, among other things, that no part of the Red Hill claim was covered by the said mortgage; that at the date of the execution of the mortgage "the Stony Bar mining claim, described in said mortgage, was wholly valueless as a security, and entirely worked out, and that no depreciation in the value thereof has been, or will in the future be, caused by the working of the said Red Hill placer mining claim by the defendants, or by the dumping of the tailings from such working upon the said Stony Bar mining claim; and that such deposit of debris and tailings by the defendants will in no wise impair the value of the security held by plaintiff by reason of said mortgage;" that the Stony Bar ditch was valuable, "and the destruction of the same would render it valueless, and impair the security of the mortgage of plaintiff:" and, as conclusions of law, that plaintiff was entitled to an injunction restraining the further destruction of the said ditch; that plaintiff was entitled to a judgment against defendant Kaslowsky for his costs of suit; and that the other defendants were entitled to a judgment against the plaintiff for their costs of suit. Judgment was accordingly so entered, and from that part of it which awards costs to the defendants, plaintiff appeals.

The contention in support of the appeal is that it appears from the facts found that "the trial court erred and committed an abuse of discretion in adjudging that appellant should pay the costs incurred in the action by the defendants named;" and it is said: "While it is true, as a general principle, that the matter of costs in equity proceedings is a matter of discretion, yet it is equally true that it must be a discretion tempered by reason and judgment." In the opinion of the trial court, which the appellant has brought up in the transcript, it is said: "The principal question as to which evidence was offered relates to the value of the Stony Bar claim, the defendants alleging that it is worked out, and wholly valueless, and the plaintiff contending that it possesses a value ranging from $200 to $1,000. In the view which I take of the matter this becomes a very important inquiry. Upon this point the evidence is overwhelmingly in favor of the defendants." And further on: "As we have already seen, the court must hold that the part of the Stony Bar claim in question must be held to have no value; that is, it is not worth one cent." And again: "As almost the whole evidence was directed mainly to the question of the value of the Stony Bar claim and the ownership of the Red Hill claim, I deem it just that the defendants (other than Kaslowsky) recover their costs from the plaintiff." It thus appears that the ground upon which the decision as to costs was based was that the issues for the determination of which the costs were chiefly incurred were decided against the appellant. Under such circumstances, can it be said that the action of the court was an abuse of its discretion? We think not.

The Code provides that in actions like this "costs may be allowed or not, and, if allowed, may be apportioned between the parties on the same or adverse sides, in the discretion of the court." Section 1025, Code Civil Proc. And in Gray v. Dougherty, 25 Cal. 282, it is said, quoting from a decision of the court of appeals in New York: "Costs in equity are always in the discretion of the court, and, whether they are granted or withheld, they are but as incidents to and no part of the relief sought. A party getting the relief asked may be compelled to pay costs." We advise, therefore, that the judgment appealed from be affirmed.

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; TEMPLE, C.

Ex parte BATCHELDER. (No. 20,956.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 22, 1892.)

POOR DEBTORS—EFFECT OF DISCHARGE—ALIMONY

Where defendant in a divorce suit is imprisoned for refusing to pay alimony, and is afterwards discharged on taking oath that he has no property, (Code Civil Proc. § 1148,) a subsequent imprisonment till he should pay the alimony accruing before as well as after such discharge is invalid under Code Civil Proc. § 1151, providing that a person, "after being so discharged, is forever exempted from arrest or imprisonment for the same debt."

In bank.

Petition by George A. Batchelder for habeas corpus. Petitioner discharged.

Jones & O'Donnell, for petitioner.

BEATTY, C. J. In June, 1889, the superior court of San Francisco, in an action for divorce in which Mary M. Batchelder was plaintiff and the prisoner was defendant, made its decree granting the divorce, and ordering the payment by the defendant to the plaintiff of $30 per month permanent alimony. Prior to the decree, there had been orders requiring the payment by defendant of counsel fees and alimony pendente lite. In January, 1890, the defendant was imprisoned by order of the superior court for refusal to comply with the orders and decree of the court for the payment of said counsel fees, temporary and permanent alimony, theretofore accrued. In March, 1890, he was duly discharged from said imprisonment by the superior court upon his taking the oath prescribed by section 1148[1] of the Code of Civil Procedure. Subsequently he was again committed by an order requiring his imprisonment until he should comply with the order of the superior court directing him to pay to plaintiff "said alimony and counsel fees;" that is to say, as we construe the order, until he pays all the alimony and counsel fees accrued prior to his last discharge, as well as the monthly alimony accruing since that time. To test the validity of said last-mentioned order this writ has been sued out. The order is certainly invalid, so far as it requires payment of counsel fees and alimony, whether permanent or temporary, due prior to the discharge of the prisoner on March 29, 1890. Code Civil Proc. § 1151.[1] The order, as it stands, cannot be enforced. Let the prisoner be discharged.

PEOPLE v. O'BRIEN. (No. 20,918.)

ALTERING PUBLIC RECORD—INDICTMENT—INTENT—EVIDENCE—IMPEACHING WITNESS—EVIDENCE OF ACCOMPLICE—INSTRUCTIONS.

1. Pen. Code, § 113, provides for the punishment of every officer having the custody of any public record, who is guilty of willfully altering such record. Section 114 provides for the punishment of every person, not an officer, such as is referred to in the preceding section, who is guilty of any act specified in that section. Held, that an indictment under the latter section for altering a record need not state that the record was in the custody of an officer, nor need it contain a copy of the writing alleged to have been altered, nor a statement of the substance thereof.

Code, §§ 113, 114, taken in connection with section 7, providing that the word "willfully," when applies to the intent with which an act is committed, implies merely a purpose to commit the act, and does not require any intent to violate law or acquire any advantage, it is no defense to an indictment for altering the record of a deed that the alteration was made with no fraudulent intent, and merely to rectify an unauthorized alteration made by defendant in the deed before it was recorded.

3. It is no defense to an indictment for altering the record of a deed that the deed was void by reason of an unauthorized change in the name of the grantee, made before the deed was recorded, which invalidity did not appear on its face.

4. Under Code Civil Proc. § 2051, providing that a witness cannot be impeached by evidence of particular wrongful acts, it was error to compel one of defendant's witnesses to state whether he and defendant had participated in the alteration of a record other than that charged in the indictment.

Paterson, J. In May, 1886, J. H. Derevan conveyed to the defendant a tract of land in Modoc county. The defendant erased his own name, "Denis," from the deed, and inserted therein "Mary," his wife's name, thus making the deed purport to convey the property to Mary O'Brien, instead of to himself. In this form the deed was, at the request of the defendant, recorded in the office of the county recorder. Thereafter the defendant called upon T. B. Reese, the county recorder, before whom the deed had been acknowledged by Derevan, informed him of the change which he (the defendant) had made, and requested him to change the deed and the record so that both would speak the truth with respect to the transaction. Reese refused to make the changes unless Derevan and Mrs. O'Brien consented thereto. Their consent having been obtained, Reese erased the name "Mary" in the deed, and also in the record, and inserted in lieu thereof the name "Denis," in each place. The defendant was convicted of the crime of altering a public record, and was sentenced to serve a term of two years in the state prison. From the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, he has appealed.

1. Appellant claims that the demurrer to the indictment should have been sustained. It is insisted that the indictment is insufficient because it is wanting in the following respects: (1) It is not alleged that the record was in the custody of any officer; (2) it does not contain a copy of the writing alleged to have been altered, nor any sufficient description of the same. It is conceded that the case is prosecuted under sections 113 and 114 of the Penal Code, and not under sections 470 and 471, which relate to the forgery of instruments and false entries in public records. Section 113 provides that "every officer having the custody of any record * * * filed or deposited in any public office, or placed in his hands for any purpose, who is guilty of stealing, willfully destroying, mutilating, defacing, altering * * * the whole or any part of such record, * * * is punishable," etc. Section 114 provides that "every person, not an officer, such as is referred to in the preceding section, who is guilty of any of the acts specified in that section, is punishable," etc. The language of the indictment is: "The said Denis O'Brien, * * * not being an officer, such as referred to in section 113 of the Penal Code, * * * did then and there willfully alter and procure to be altered a certain deed record of real estate in book seven, pages 305-6, of Deeds, public records of Modoc county, state of California, whereby said record was changed and made to read and to appear to read that one J. H. Derevan sold and conveyed certain real property to the defendant, Denis O'Brien, when as a matter of fact, and as the record stood before the altering and defacing the same, the said deed conveyed said real property to Mary O'Brien, the wife of the defendant," etc. It is sufficient to say in answer to the first point urged that section 114 makes it unlawful for a person not an officer to do any of the acts specified in section 113, without regard to the question whether they are in the custody of the officer or not. The words "having the custody of any record" are used to designate the officer who is punishable for the acts prohibited. The offense which an officer having the custody of the record commits when he does any of the acts prohibited by section 113 is regarded by the law as a more aggravated offense than that which is committed by one who has not been intrusted with the safe-keeping of the record. We think that the indictment alleges the facts constituting the offense charged with sufficient certainty. There are cases holding that it is necessary to set out a copy of the instrument, or the substance thereof, but they are not applicable under our system of pleading. Our Code, in matters of civil and criminal procedure, is no friend of old precedents, which were introduced into the law in an age of legal and scholastic refinements, and which Lord Ellenborough justly condemns as a blemish and inconvenience in the law, and the administration thereof. Substance, rather than form, conciseness and clearness, are the canons of code pleading. If "the act or omission charged as the offense is clearly and distinctly set forth in ordinary and concise language, without repetition, and in such a manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended," the indictment is sufficient. "Is the act or omission charged as the offense stated with such a degree of certainty as to enable the court to pronounce judgment upon a conviction according to the right of the case?" That is the fundamental test. Pen. Code, § 959.

2. It is urged with much earnestness that no offense could have been committed by the defendant, because there was no intention on his part to do an unlawful act, his object being simply to rectify a wrong already done. It is admitted that the defendant was not excusable for procuring the deed to be recorded in its altered form, but it is insisted that his subsequent attempt to rectify the error cannot be deemed a crime. The attorney general admits that the evidence fails to show any fraudulent intent on the part of the defendant; and the question presented is whether it is necessary, in making out the offense, for the prosecution to show that the act was done for some sinister purpose.

It is an emphatic postulate of both civil and penal law that ignorance of a law is no excuse for a violation thereof. Of course, it is based on a fiction, because no man can know all the law, but it is a maxim which the law itself does not permit any one to gainsay. It is expected that the jury and the court, where it is shown that in fact the defendant was ignorant of the law, and innocent of any intention to violate the same, will give the defendant the benefit of the fact, and impose only a light penalty. 1 Bish. Crim. Law, § 2961; Whart. Neg. § 411. The rule rests on public necessity. The welfare of society and the safety of the state depend upon its enforcement. If a person accused of crime could shield himself behind the defense that he was ignorant of the law which he violated, immunity from punishment would in most cases result. No system of criminal justice could be sustained which such an element in it to obstruct the course of its administration. The plea would be universally made, and would lead to interminable questions, incapable of solution. Was the defendant in fact ignorant of the law? Was his ignorance of the law excusable? The denser the ignorance the greater would be the exemption from liability. The absurdity of such a condition of the law is shown in the consummate satire of Pascal, where, speaking upon this subject, he says, in substance, that although the less a man thinks of the moral law the more culpable he is, yet under municipal law "the more he relieves himself from a knowledge of his duty the more approvedly is his duty performed." It is a familiar rule that, to constitute crime, there must be a union of act and intent; but our Code provides that "the word 'willfully,' when applied to the intent with which an act is done or omitted, implies simply a purpose or willingness to commit the act or make the omission referred to. It does not require any intent to violate law, or to injure another, or to acquire any advantage." Pen. Code, § 7. In Halsted v. State, 41 N. J. Law, 552, this subject was carefully considered and elaborately discussed. After reviewing the authorities, the court reached the conclusion stated in the syllabus, viz., that "when an act, in general terms, is made indictable, a criminal intent need not be shown, unless from the language or effects of the law a purpose to require the existence of such intent can be discovered. The question appertains to the department of statutory construction; and, to introduce into the act the requisite of a guilty mind, it must appear that such was the intent of the lawmaker." In State v. McBrayer, 98 N. C. 623, 2 S. E. Rep. 755, the court said: "It is a mistaken notion that positive, willful intent to violate the criminal law is an essential ingredient in every criminal offense, and that, where there is an absence of such intent, there is no offense. This is especially so as to statutory offenses. When the statute plainly forbids an act to be done, and it is done by some person, the law implies conclusively the guilty intent, although the offender was honestly mistaken as to the meaning of the law he violates. When the language is plain and positive, and the offense is not made to depend upon the positive, willful intent and purpose, nothing is left to interpretation." To the same effect are the following cases: Com. v. Weiss, 139 Pa. St. 251, 21 Atl. Rep. 10; State v. Gould, 40 Iowa, 374; Fiedler v. Darrin, 50 N. Y. 443. A case directly in point is Rex v. Ogden, 6 Car. & P. 631. In that case the prisoner was indicted for unlawfully transposing from one piece of wrought plate to another the lion passant, contrary to the statute. It was conceded that the act was done without any fraudulent intention. The same argument urged here was made in that case, but the court said: "There are no words in the act of parliament referring to any fraudulent intention. The words of it are, 'shall transpose or remove, or cause to procure to be transposed or removed, from one piece of wrought plate to another.'" The court considered the case a harsh one, and, upon recommendations made, the prisoner received his majesty's pardon. It has been held that one who marries a second time under an honest but erroneous belief that a decree of divorce which had been granted was valid is afforded no protection by the invalid decree, and that evidence of his good faith will be excluded. 2 Whart. Crim. Ev. (8th Ed.) § 1695*a*. The same principle is applied to many cases, such as selling intoxicating liquors to minors, abducting girls under a certain age, usurping an office under the belief that the usurper was truly elected, illegal voting under the belief that the voter is a qualified elector, publishing a libel in ignorance of its contents, storing gunpowder, and the like. 1 Whart. Crim. Law, § 88; 2 Whart. Crim. Law, § 1584; Hill v. State, 62 Ala. 170. The only authority we have found holding contrary to the rule stated is the case of State v. Gardner, 5 Nev. 378, where it was held that a deputy sheriff, who had settled a suit against persons for doing business without a license upon their payment of the costs and the amount of license, and had given them a paper written by his attorney, and signed by himself, purporting to be a license, although it appeared he had no proper forms or blanks at the time, was guilty of no criminal offense under the statute making the issuance of such a license a felony; there being no fraudulent intention on his part, further than indicated by his mere naked act. That case, however, can be reconciled, perhaps, with other cases referred to, upon the principle stated in Com. v. Weiss, supra, viz.: "Whether a criminal intent or a guilty knowledge is a necessary ingredient of a statutory offense, therefore, is a matter of construction." The majority of the court in the Nevada case held that the legislature, by the act under consideration, did not intend to create an offense under the statute, unless some fraudulent intention on the part of the officer existed at the time he performed the act. Commenting upon this case, the court of appeals of New York say: "The case cited from 5 Nev. 378, tends to support the views of the plaintiff in error, but it is evident that a majority of the court struggled to relieve the defendant from a harsh punishment for a comparatively innocent act." Gardner v. People, 62 N. Y. 305. Sections

7, 112, and 113 of the Penal Code, when read together, clearly establish the proposition that it was not necessary, in making out the offense, to prove any fraudulent intention on the part of the defendant. No hardship will result from the administration of the law as thus construed. The legislature has wisely given the court a wide latitude in fixing the penalty, evidently with the idea of meeting just such cases as this. The penalty fixed is "imprisonment in the state prison not exceeding five years, or in a county jail not exing one year, or by a fine not exceeding one hundred dollars, or by both." Thus are provided appropriate penalties for all degrees of offenses committed under this act.

3. Another contention of the appellant is that, when the deed was offered for record, it was not an instrument entitled to be recorded, and, not being an instrument authorized by law to be recorded, a copy of it written in the recorder's book could not be the subject of a felony. In support of this contention, he relies upon People v. Harrold, 84 Cal. 567, 24 Pac. Rep. 106. The instrument referred to in that case was one which the law did not authorize to be recorded in the office of the county recorder. A record of it could under no circumstances give notice to the public of its contents. The deed under consideration was valid on its face, as recorded, the record was notice to all the world of its contents, and it is immaterial that the instrument was void for objections which did not appear upon its face. U. S. v. Turner, 7 Pet. 136.

4. It is claimed that the court erred in reading section 113 of the Penal Code to the jury, without also reading section 114; that defendant, not being an officer, could not be convicted under section 113. But the court had to read section 113 to the jury to inform them as to the acts prohibited, and it was unnecessary to read section 114 after giving instruction No. 1, which embodied all the information the jury would have received from a reading of the last-named section.

5. During the cross-examination of the defendant, he was required, against his protest, to admit before the jury that he had participated with Reese in the alteration of a record other than that charged in the indictment in this case. Reese, also, in his examination, although protesting that such testimony would tend to criminate him, was compelled to answer similar questions. In the case of Reese the evidence was not admissible to impeach him, nor to show that the defendant had committed other offenses of the same kind about the same time. A witness cannot be impeached by evidence of particular wrongful acts. People v. Hamblin, 68 Cal. 101, 8 Pac. Rep. 687; Code Civil Proc. § 2051. And while it is true that in certain cases, like forgery and embezzlement, it is permissible to introduce evidence concerning other acts of the same nature, for the purpose of establishing a guilty intention, no such rule applies in cases of this kind, where the very ground upon which the prosecution relies for a conviction is that a performance of the acts mentioned in the statute constitutes a crime, regardless of any fraudulent intention. The ruling of the court in the cross-examination of the defendant upon this subject was erroneous, for the additional reason that the questions propounded to him were not proper cross-examination as to anything related in his examination in chief. So far as the defendant is concerned, the court is not allowed that discretion as to the extent and scope of the cross-examination which it is permitted to exercise in the examination of the other witnesses. People v. Rozelle, 78 Cal. 92, 20 Pac. Rep. 36. The court instructed the jury that "the testimony of an accomplice ought to be viewed with distrust, and the evidence of the oral admissions of a party with caution." The Code authorizes this instruction to be given to the jury on all proper occasions. Code Civil Proc. § 2061. But we do not think that this was a proper case for such an instruction, although it may be proper to give it in a case where the witness has been called by the people. Section 1111, Pen. Code. It, in effect, told the jury not to believe the testimony of one of the defendant's witnesses,—at least, to discredit it. That is the meaning of the word "distrust." This the court had no right to do. Our constitution provides that "judges shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact" Article 6, § 19, Const. To tell the jury what weight to give r not to give to any particular evidence is to express an opinion upon a matter of fact. We took occasion to refer to the latter clause of this provision of section 2061, Code Civil Proc., in Kauffman v. Maier, 94 Cal. 283, 29 Pac. Rep. 481, and disapproved of the instruction which embodied it, on the ground that it is unconstitutional.

6. The court also gave an instruction which has been several times approved here,—with some hesitancy and criticism, however,—directing the attention of the jury to the fact that the defendant had offered himself as a witness on his own behalf, and saying to them that in considering the weight and effect to be given to his evidence, in addition to noticing his manner and the probability of his statements, they could consider his relation to the case, and the circumstances under which he gave his testimony, the consequences to him resulting from the verdict in the case, and all the inducements and temptations which would ordinarily influence a person in his situation. This instruction received its first sanction from courts acting under constitutions which had no such inhibition as that found in section 19, art. 6, supra, and never ought to have been approved here; but, as the provision of the constitution referred to is the same as that of the constitution of 1879, under which there were decisions holding it was not error to so charge the jury, the construction which was placed upon it by those decisions has become a part of the provision itself, and we are not at liberty to depart from it. As a slight change in the phraseology of the instruction, however, is liable to be construed as going beyond the limits of what has been approved, it would be a safer course, and one which would work no injustice to the people, if it were entirely omitted from the instructions asked and given on behalf of the prosecution. Judgment and order reversed, and cause remanded for a new trial.

BEAN v. PROSEUS. (No. 14,884.)

NEGOTIABLE INSTRUMENTS—CONSIDERATION.

In an action on a note for $625, the evidence was undisputed that, in consideration for the note, plaintiff transferred to defendant a one-half interest in a note for $2,500, on which the maker thereof agreed to pay $1,250 as a compromise. Held, that the fact that afterwards, in an action thereon, the latter note was declared to have been made without consideration, does not affect the consideration for the note in suit, and plaintiff should recover.

Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Sierra county; JOHN CALDWELL, Judge.

Frank R. Wehe, for appellant. John Gale and S. B. Davidson, for respondents.

PATERSON, J. In January, 1885, the appellant held a note against his brother, Joel Bean, for the sum of $2,500. The circumstances under which the note was given are fully set forth in Bell v. Bean, 75 Cal. 86, 16 Pac. Rep. 521, where it was held that the note was without consideration. The defendant was to receive one half of the amount collected, as payment for professional services rendered the plaintiff. On April 21, 1885, the defendant transferred the note to Bell & Co. as security for the payment of the sum of $500, which he owed them. Joel Bean several times offered to pay $1,250; but the defendant, acting for himself and plaintiff, refused to accept less than $2,500. The appellant, being unwilling to engage in litigation with his brother, sold his interest in the note to the defendant, and received from the latter, as payment therefor, a promissory note for $625. Defendant refused to pay the note, claiming that it was given without any consideration, whereupon this action was brought to recover the amount of the principal and interest due on the note. The court found that the note was executed and delivered by defendant without consideration, and judgment was entered against the plaintiff for costs of the suit. From this judgment, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial, plaintiff has appealed.

The respondent claims that the finding of the court is sustained by the admitted fact that there was no consideration for the $2,500 note. There being no consideration for that note, the $625 note given in payment of plaintiff's interest therein is necessarily without consideration. This contention cannot be sustained. The learned judge of the court below overlooked the fact, which is undisputed, that, at the time this note was given by the defendant to the plaintiff, Joel Bean was willing to pay in satisfaction of the claim made against him the sum of $1,250. The $2,500 note, therefore, had an actual cash value of $1,250 when appellant transferred his interest therein to defendant. How can it be said, therefore, that plaintiff parted with nothing of value? It was not his fault that defendant afterwards failed to recover on the note. The latter preferred to litigate. He took the chance of getting more than the amount offered in compromise, and lost. Plaintiff parted with his right to compromise, relying upon defendant's promise to pay him the $625, and is entitled to recover. The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

McBEAN v. CITY OF SAN BERNARDINO.
(No. 14,681.)

CONSTRUCTION OF SEWERS—LIABILITY OF CITY—SUBSEQUENT PROMISE TO PAY.

1. St. 1885, p. 147, requires a contract to construct a sewer to contain a clause that the city shall not be liable thereon, "except where it is otherwise provided in this act," and declares that the city shall be liable only when it expressly agrees to pay for the work out of its funds, or when the cost of the sewer exceeds one half of the valuation of the assessable property, in which case the excess shall be paid by the city. Held, in an action to recover part of the cost of a sewer not assessed on the abutting property, where the contract contained the clause provided for, but did not contain an agreement by defendant city to pay, that the complaint must allege that the cost exceeded half the valuation of the assessable property; and an averment that the sum sued for was "chargeable to said city, to be paid out of the municipal treasury," is insufficient to charge the city, being a mere conclusion of law.

2. After the work had been completed and accepted by the superintendent of streets, the board of trustees of the city passed a resolution approving the payment by the city of the portion of the price of construction sued for. Held, that the resolution was without consideration, and created no obligation on the city.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Bernardino county; J. W. McKINLEY, Judge.

Plaintiff, McBean, as assignor, sued the defendant, the city of San Bernardino, for the sum of $4,221.19, claimed to be due from it on account of the construction of a sewer. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and judgment given for defendant. Plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Ezra Crossman and C. W. C. Rowell, for appellant. Paris & Fox, Chas. R. Gray, and John Brown, Jr., for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. This action was brought for the purpose of recovering from the defendant city the sum of $4,221.19, claimed to be due from it on account of the construction of a sewer, and its promise to pay for the same. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, and judgment thereupon given for defendant. The question is thus presented by this appeal whether, upon the facts alleged in the complaint, the plaintiff is entitled to the relief which he demands. It appears from the complaint that the sewer referred to was constructed along the center line of First street, in the city of San Bernardino, between C and I streets, and between these terminal points the southern boundary of the city is the center line of First street, so that one half of the sewer as constructed is outside of the city. It was constructed by the assignor of plaintiff, under a contract awarded to him by the board of trustees of defendant, and executed by its superintendent of streets under the provisions of the "Act to provide for work upon streets, lanes, alleys, courts, places, and sidewalks, and for the construction of sewers within municipalities," approved March 18, 1885, (St. 1885, p. 147.) The contract contained the clause which is required to be inserted in such contracts by section 6 of that act, to the effect "that in no case, except where it is otherwise provided in this act, will the city, or any officer thereof, be liable for any portion of the expense, nor for any delinquency of persons or property assessed." The complaint further alleges that the work called for in the contract was fully performed, and was approved and accepted by the superintendent of streets, "who thereupon, on the 12th day of April, 1889, assessed and apportioned the total amount of expense of said work necessary to be assessed to cover the sum due for said work, including the incidental expenses thereof, as hereinafter set forth, to wit, the sum of seven thousand and fifty-seven dollars and thirty-two cents upon all the lots of land fronting on said north side of First street from the center line of C to the center line of I street, each lot or part of each lot being separately assessed in proportion to its frontage on said First street." It is then alleged, in apparent contradiction to this, that said lots upon the north side of Front street were by the assessment mentioned assessed to pay the sum of $2,836.19, and that the balance of the cost of constructing said sewer, to wit, $4,221.19, was "chargeable to said city, to be paid out of the municipal treasury of said city." In the view we take of the case, it is not necessary to determine whether such lots were assessed for the whole or only a part of the contract price for the construction of the sewer. It further appears from the complaint that the assignor of the plaintiff on April 23, 1889, demanded from the defendant city payment of the said sum of $4,221.19, "and the said city, by resolution of its board of trustees, duly made and passed, agreed and promised to pay said four thousand two hundred and twenty-one dollars and nineteen cents out of the municipal treasury, in language as follows: * * * The motion of Mr. Keniston, seconded by Mr. Lesher, for an order that the city pay one half of the costs of constructing the First street receiving sewer, on the south line of the city, and also pay the excess of the cost of building said sewer over the cost of a lateral sewer, is approved by the board, and ordered referred to the finance committee."

1. The facts alleged in the complaint do not show any liability of the defendant upon the original contract for the construction of the sewer. It was expressly provided in that contract that, except as otherwise provided in the act of March 18, 1885, (St. 1885, p. 147,) the city should not be liable for any portion of the expense incurred in the performance of the contract. Under the provisions of that act, a city is only liable for work done in the construction of sewers when it has expressly contracted to pay for such work out of its funds, or when, in order to raise the necessary amount to pay for such construction, the assessment upon any lot properly assessable for that purpose would exceed one half the valuation of such lot "in its last preceding assessment for municipal taxation," in which case such excess shall be paid by the city. The defendant did not bind itself to pay for any part of this work in the original contract, and it is not alleged that, in order to collect sufficient to pay for the cost of constructing the sewer, it would have been necessary to assess any lot properly chargeable with such cost for an amount exceeding one half its last assessed valuation for municipal purposes. The complaint, therefore, fails to show that the defendant is liable upon the contract for any part of the cost of constructing the sewer, and the allegation that the sum of $4,221.19 was "chargeable to the city, and payable out of its municipal treasury," in view of the other facts alleged, is to be regarded simply as the statement of a conclusion of law, the truth of which was not admitted by the demurrer.

2. The only remaining question for consideration is as to the effect of the above-quoted resolution of defendant's board of trustees. It is claimed by appellant that, whatever view may be taken of defendant's liability upon the original contract, as it actually received the benefit of the work done under such contract, this resolution is sufficient to render the city liable to pay therefor, to the extent therein named. This resolution was passed after the contract was fully performed, and it is clear that before its adoption the city was in no wise liable to pay for any part of the work, the contract expressly providing that it would not be called upon to pay for such work except as provided in the statute under which the contract was made, and the complaint not alleging such facts as would make the city responsible under this statute. This being so, the question is directly presented, whether this naked declaration or resolution of the board of trustees had the effect to create a binding obligation where none existed before. We are of the opinion that it did not. The resolution is without any consideration to support it, and, if it had been executed, the payment of the money named in it would have been in the nature of a gift,—a purely voluntary payment by the city. It cannot be said that the defendant was under any moral obligation to pay for this work. Cities are creatures of law, and their powers are defined by law, and persons dealing with them are chargeable with notice, not only of the extent of their powers, but also of the mode in which their powers may be exercised. It is very evident that the act of March 18, 1885, (St. 1885, p. 147,) in expressly naming the cases in which cities shall be liable for the construction of sewers, and in directing that every contract for such work shall expressly provide that the city shall not be liable except as provided in that act, intended to place a limitation upon the power of the city to contract an indebtedness for such purposes, to be paid for out of the municipal treasury. The intention of the statute is that improvements of this character shall be paid for by assessments upon adjacent property, unless the city, at the time of undertaking the work, shall determine to "assess the cost and expense thereof upon the property to be affected or benefited thereby in such manner and within such assessment district as it shall prescribe," or shall determine to pay for the same out of its street contingent fund, or by the issuance of bonds. Sections 27, 29, Act March 18, 1885, (St. 1885, p. 147.) The contract under which the assignor of plaintiff constructed this sewer, referred to in the complaint, contemplated no liability on the part of the city, but that the work should be paid for by an assessment upon adjacent property; and it cannot be said that the city was under any moral obligation to pay for that for which, not only the law, but the contract of plaintiff's assignor, following the law, expressly provided that it should not be responsible for. It follows from these views that the resolution set out in the complaint is without consideration, and insufficient to create any liability against the defendant.

Judgment affirmed.

McCORD v. CALIFORNIA NAT. BANK OF SAN DIEGO. (No. 14,693.)

BANKS—PAYMENT OF CHECK—MONEY FOR UNLAWFUL USE.

A bank cannot refuse to cash a check, though it knows that the check was drawn in payment of a bet made in violation of law on the result of an election; and the fact that a check was so cashed is not ground on which the drawer can recover the amount from the bank.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, San Diego county; G. PUTERBAUGH, Judge.

Action by T. J. McCord against the California National Bank of San Diego to recover the amount of one of plaintiff's checks, alleged to have been illegally cashed by the bank. From a judgment for defendant, and an order refusing a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

William Darby, (Hunsaker, Britt & Goodrich, of counsel,) for appellant. Conklin & Hughes, H. E. Doolittle, and M. T. Allen, for respondent.

TEMPLE, C. This is an appeal from the judgment, and from an order refusing a new trial. The action is by a bank depositor, and the question is whether the bank rightfully paid a certain check for $1,000. The case was tried without a jury. At the trial there was a material and substantial conflict between the testimony of the bank teller and the testimony of the plaintiff, who was corroborated by another witness. The findings support the testimony of the teller whose statement, therefore, we are forced to adopt. On the 4th of November, 1890, the plaintiff made a bet upon the result of an election. What the election was does not appear, but it seems to be conceded that the wager was forbidden by our Codes. The wager was at night, and a check for $1,000 upon defendant was drawn in favor of J. A. McRae,—the other party to the wager,—and placed in the hands of one Hickman, as stakeholder. The next morning one Frederick, who was authorized by plaintiff to notify the bank not to pay the check, met the paying teller in the street, and told him about the bet and the drawing of the check, and advised him not to pay the check, saying that he had no interest in the matter except as the friend of McCord, and would not like to see the boy lose his money. The teller testified that "he did not at any time demand that I should not pay the check, and conveyed the impression to me that he was acting on his own responsibility." That same day Hickman presented the check for payment, but the teller refused to pay it. Later in the day, Hickman and McRae called together for the same purpose, but payment was again refused. The refusal was because of what Frederick had said, and to give plaintiff a chance to stop the payment. On the morning of the sixth, Hickman again presented the check, and asked that it be certified. Not having heard from plaintiff, and thinking he had declined to pay as long as he would be justified in doing, the teller consented. Of course the bank then became the principal debtor, and the check was then virtually paid. The teller at the time drew a memorandum check against plaintiff's account, as his custom was in such cases. On the twelfth the check was paid, and the amount carried to the account of Hickman, and on the same day, after such payment, plaintiff drew his check for the amount, and presented it in person. Payment was refused, on the ground that plaintiff had no balance to his credit at the bank.

If the facts had been found according to the contention of plaintiff, and as testified to by his witnesses, he would have had a good case. That theory was that he had countermanded the payment of the check. But, as the court found for the defendant on that issue, the question is simply whether the fact that the defendant knew that the money was intended to be used for an illegal purpose will enable the plaintiff to recover. A case can be imagined in which to pay a check might be to aid and abet a crime, but, even then, it is difficult to see how a guilty principal can sue the depositary for obeying his orders. But, independently of that consideration, it would not do to permit a banker to decline payment on the ground that bad use is to be made of the money. His undertaking is to honor his customer's orders so long as he has sufficient funds in his hands; subject to certain limitations for the protection of the banker against spurious orders, the funds are intended and understood to be as much under the control of the depositor as though they were in his own safe. Morse, Banks, § 311, lays down the law upon this subject as follows: "The banker cannot excuse his disobedience of his customer's orders, in the due course of business, by setting up that he knew or had reason to believe that the customer's orders were given in promotion of an unlawful purpose." The banker in paying a check is not, as appellant seems to contend, in the position of one who purchases negotiable paper. He is a custodian of funds, and payment of a check of his customer is payment to his customer, who is in no position to complain. And besides, public policy would not permit a banker to shirk his duty under such defenses. So obvious is this that the books contain no cases where the question is raised, except where the deposit is of trust funds or by an agent. Under these views, it is obvious that the alleged errors of law were not errors or were harmless. I advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—WHEN NECESSARY.

Where the only question on appeal is whether the court below erred in striking out certain portions of the answer filed, a bill of exceptions is necessary.

Commissioners' decision. Department 1. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; Lucien Shaw, Judge.

Action by E. F. Spence against J. W. Scott and others and H. I. Kowalsky for the foreclosure of a mortgage. From the judgment of foreclosure, defendant Kowalsky appeals. Affirmed.

Temple, C. This is an appeal taken from a judgment of foreclosure by one of the defendants. There is no bill of exceptions. Appellant filed an answer, in which he set up various defenses. It is claimed that the court erroneously struck out certain portions of his answer, and this is the only question which he seeks to present on this appeal. Manifestly the question cannot be presented without a bill of exceptions. Dimick v. Campbell, 31 Cal. 239; Douglas v. Hutchinson, 46 Cal. 49; Canal Co. v. Kidd, 43 Cal. 180; Feely v. Shirley, Id. 369; Code Civil Proc. §§ 670, 950. Indeed, the decisions upon this point have been very numerous, commencing with the first volume of the reports. The following are a few of them: Gunter v. Geary, 1 Cal. 462; Griswold v. Sharpe, 2 Cal. 17; Wilson v. Middleton, Id. 54; Castro's Ex'rs v. Armesti, 14 Cal. 39; Dawley v. PEOPLE v. URQUIDAS. (No. 20,914.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 23, 1892.)

BURGLARY—CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE—NEW TRIAL.

1. The words "intention of stealing" may be used as equivalent to "intention of committing grand or petit larceny," in defining burglary.

2. A charge that "there is nothing in the nature of circumstantial evidence that renders it less reliable than other classes of evidence" correctly states the law. People v. Morrow, 60 Cal. 142, followed.

3. The discovery of new evidence, which is merely cumulative, and would not render a different result probable on a new trial, is not sufficient ground for granting such new trial.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Los Angeles county; B. N. Smith, Judge.

Nicodemus Urquidas was convicted of burglary in the second degree, and, from the judgment and an order denying a new trial, appeals. Affirmed.

Shinn & Ling, for appellant. James McLachlan and Atty. Gen. Hart, for respondent.

Belcher, C. The defendant was convicted of the crime of burglary in the second degree, and sentenced to be imprisoned in the state prison for the term of one year. The appeal is from the judgment and an order denying a new trial. The charge was that the defendant entered the barn of one Beale with intent to commit larceny, and the evidence on the part of the prosecution tended to show that such an entry was made by defendant about 2 o'clock in the morning. The judgment cannot be reversed, therefore, for want of evidence to justify the verdict.

It is claimed that the court erred in refusing to strike out, on motion of defendant, a portion of the testimony of the witness Rose, and in admitting, over the objection of defendant, another portion of the testimony of the same witness. In answer to this claim we think it enough to say that we see no error in the rulings complained of.

In one of the instructions given at the request of the people the court told the jury: "If you believe from the evidence, beyond a reasonable doubt, that defendant entered the barn of witness Beale, as charged in the information, with the intention of stealing hay therein, then the offense of burglary would be complete, whether the defendant actually stole hay or not, nor would it make any difference how defendant effected his entrance into the barn in question." It is claimed that the instruction was erroneous, and it is said: "The jury were not given the legal definition of 'burglary' in any instruction, unless it be in this one. The words 'stole' and 'stealing' are not equivalent to the word 'larceny,' and, where the court attempts to define the crime, the words, or equivalent words, of the Code must be used. The words 'stole,' and 'stealing' are not equivalent thereto, hence prejudicial error is assumed." We see no merit in this point. If the defendant entered the barn "with the intention of stealing hay therein," he entered "with intent to commit grand or petit larceny," and the jury must have so understood it.

[1] Affirmed on rehearing. 31 Pac. Rep. 939.

In another instruction given at the request of the people the jury were told: "There is nothing in the nature of circumstantial evidence that renders it less reliable than other classes of evidence." It is claimed that this instruction was erroneous for the reasons (1) "that it directs the jury what weight to give to this particular kind of evidence;" and (2) "that it is not true." The words quoted and objected to are only a part of a quite lengthy instruction. In People v. Morrow, 60 Cal. 142, substantially the same instruction was given to the jury, and it was held by this court that "it contains a correct statement of the law, and was free from legal exception." That decision was undoubtedly correct, and should be adhered to. As a whole, the instructions stated the law applicable to the case very fully and fairly; and if the court should have pointed out more distinctly the difference between burglary of the first and second degrees, still the defendant was not prejudiced by the omission, as he was found guilty only of the lesser offense.

One of the grounds upon which a new trial was asked was that of newly-discovered evidence. In People v. Sutton, 73 Cal. 243, 15 Pac. Rep. 86, it is said: "To entitle a party to a new trial on the ground of newly-discovered evidence, it must appear '(1) that the evidence, and not merely its materiality, be newly discovered; (2) that the evidence be not cumulative merely; (3) that it be such as to render a different result probable on a retrial of the cause; (4) that the party could not with reasonable diligence have discovered and produced it at the trial; and (5) that these facts be shown by the best evidence of which the case admits.' 1 Hayne, New Trial & App. § 88. 'Applications on this ground are addressed to the discretion of the court below, and the action of the court below will not be disturbed except for an abuse of discretion, the presumption being that the discretion was properly exercised.' Id. § 87." In this case the affidavits offered in support of the motion were in contradiction of the evidence introduced by the people, and in support of that given by the defendant. The evidence was cumulative, and it fails to satisfy us that it would have rendered a different result probable on a retrial of the cause. We can therefore see no abuse of discretion by the trial court in denying the motion. We advise that the judgment and order be affirmed.

BAUMBERGER v. ARFF. (No. 14,518.)

CONTINUANCE—ABSENCE OF COUNSEL.

Absence of a party's attorney from court does not give him an absolute right to a continuance, but it is in the discretion of the court, in view of all the circumstances.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Alameda county; W. E. GREENE, Judge.

Action by Baumberger against Arff. Judgment was entered against plaintiff by default, and, from an order denying a motion to set aside the judgment, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Wal. J. Tuska, for appellant. Geo. W. Reed, E. Nusbaumer, and R. B. Tappan, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. On the day set for the trial of this action plaintiff moved for a continuance upon the ground of the absence of his attorney, who was then engaged in the trial of a case in another court. The motion was denied, and thereupon the person who made the motion in behalf of plaintiff, and who seems to have been the clerk of his attorney, left the room. Neither plaintiff nor his attorney thereafter appeared, although called by the court, and the defendant moved for judgment in his favor, upon the ground that plaintiff had abandoned his cause upon the trial, and before the final submission thereof, and for want of prosecution. This motion was granted, and judgment entered in favor of defendant. The plaintiff afterwards moved, upon affidavits, to set this judgment aside, which motion was denied, and from that order this appeal is taken. The plaintiff did not have an absolute right to a continuance because of the absence of his attorney, but the motion was one which was to be disposed of in the sound discretion of the court, and in view of all the circumstances then made to appear. People v. Collins, 75 Cal. 411, 17 Pac. Rep. 430; People v. Goldenson, 76 Cal. 341, 19 Pac. Rep. 161; Haight v. Green, 19 Cal. 113; Lightner v. Menzel, 35 Cal. 452. The affidavits filed by plaintiff, on his motion to set aside the judgment, do not show that the court failed to exercise a proper discretion in its ruling upon the motion for a continuance. We cannot say that the court would, in view of all the facts disclosed, have committed an error if it had denied the motion unconditionally; and certainly there is nothing unreasonable in the condition upon which it is claimed that the court offered to grant the motion, viz., the payment by plaintiff of the fees of all jurors in attendance upon the court upon that day, amounting to $87, and the defendant's costs for the day. Order affirmed.

LORENZ et al. v. WALDRON. (No. 14,895.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 23, 1892.)

INJUNCTION—TO RESTRAIN CONSTRUCTION OF TUNNEL UNDER MINING DITCH—EVIDENCE.

1. In an action to restrain defendant from constructing a tunnel on his mining claim under plaintiff's mining ditch, it appeared that, about two years before the action, defendant, without objection, had run a tunnel into the mountain beneath plaintiff's ditch, extending about 50 feet beyond the ditch, and 35 to 40 feet below it; that this tunnel was abandoned; that afterwards defendant commenced another tunnel, about 300 feet from the first tunnel, and 48 feet, vertically, lower than the ditch. Eight experienced miners testified, on the part of defendant, that, in their opinion, the extension of the lower tunnel under and beyond the ditch would not injure it; that the earth in which the ditch was dug was clay and broken rocks; that the upper tunnel had stood more than two years without injury to the ditch; and that the lower tunnel was partly in bed rock at a distance of 29 feet from its mouth. Five witnesses testified for plaintiff, in substance, that, in their opinion, the construction of the tunnel would injure the ditch; that "the effect of water percolating through ground of this character is to loosen it, and cause it to cave or slide;" that the upper tunnel did not injure the ditch, and that the lower tunnel is 300 feet further down stream. Held, that the evidence failed to entitle plaintiff to the injunction.

2. In an action to restrain defendant from extending a tunnel on his claim under plaintiff's mining ditch, where plaintiff has no interest in defendant's claim except the right of way for the ditch, it is immaterial whether defendant's claim is of value as a mine or not.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Trinity county; T. E. JONES, Judge.

Action for an injunction by Henry Lorenz and others against John Waldron. Plaintiffs had judgment, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

John W. Turner, for appellant. James W. Bartlett, for respondents.

VANCLIEF, C. Action to enjoin defendant from running a tunnel into the side of a mountain, under plaintiffs' water ditch. The judgment was in favor of the plaintiffs, awarding a perpetual injunction; and defendant has appealed from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for new trial. The plaintiffs' ditch was constructed along the side of a mountain, on the public land of the United States, for mining purposes; and it is not questioned that, under acts of congress, plaintiffs had acquired the right of way for, and were entitled to maintain, their ditch, as constructed. The court found that on the 30th day of October, 1886, the defendant located a mining claim on the side of the mountain, extending across and below the plaintiffs' ditch; that, for the purpose of prospecting this mining claim, the defendant had run a tunnel into the mountain beneath plaintiffs' ditch, extending about 50 feet beyond a vertical plane drawn on the line of the ditch. The floor of this tunnel is 35 to 40 feet, vertically, lower than the bottom of the ditch. At the back end of the tunnel the bed rock inclined downwards, indicating, as defendant believed, the existence of a "back-pay channel," so low that it could not be mined through this tunnel, on account of water. He therefore abandoned it more than two years before the commencement of this action. The plaintiffs made no objection to the running of this tunnel before it was abandoned by defendant. Afterwards defendant made several open cuts into the side of the mountain below plaintiffs' ditch, from 10 to 20 feet in length, for the purpose of prospecting his claim, to which no objection was made by plaintiffs while they were being made. How nearly any of these cuts approached the ditch does not appear. Having answered the purpose for which they were made, these open cuts were also abandoned. Afterwards defendant commenced another tunnel, about 300 feet, horizontally, from a vertical plane drawn on the line of the tunnel first above mentioned, and 48 feet and 4 inches, vertically, lower than plaintiffs' ditch. After driving this lower tunnel in, very nearly horizontally, a distance of 29 feet, this action was commenced, and defendant was enjoined from continuing it, pendente lite; and, by the final judgment, he was "perpetually enjoined and restrained from digging or excavating any tunnel or tunnels under and beneath" plaintiffs' ditch. It was not alleged, nor found by the court, that plaintiffs' ditch had been injured, nor that plaintiffs had sustained any damage from any work done by defendant before the commencement of the action; and, of course, there is no judgment for damages. The sole object of the suit is to obtain a perpetual injunction against threatened future injuries to plaintiffs' ditch. The only threat or intention of the defendant, which the evidence tended to prove, was to drive his lower tunnel in the direction in which he had started it, to and beyond a point vertically beneath plaintiffs' ditch, for the purpose of tapping what he believed to be a "pay channel" running through his mining claim. The court found that "defendant is engaged in running tunnels, starting at a point about fifty feet below said ditch; and that he threatens to continue to run said tunnels beneath the bottom of said ditch; * * * that, if defendant is permitted to dig and excavate the above-named tunnels, great and irreparable injury will result to plaintiffs, for which pecuniary compensation would not afford adequate relief; * * * that said second tunnel, if not properly constructed, would be dangerous to the safety of said ditch, and would cause the waters of said ditch to percolate through the roof of said tunnel, and thereby endanger its safety; * * * that said ditch would be in danger of destruction if said tunnel is permitted to be constructed in the manner now pursued by defendant;" and that defendant is insolvent. These findings, except the insolvency, are excepted to on the ground that they are not justified by the evidence, and I think the exceptions are well taken, to the extent hereinafter defined.

1. There is no evidence tending to prove that defendant was "engaged in running tunnels," or more than one tunnel; nor did the evidence tend to prove that he theatened to "continue to run said tunnels," or any tunnel, except his lower tunnel, which, if continued in its course, will pass under plaintiffs' ditch at a point about 46 feet vertically below it.

2. The finding that, if defendant is permitted to continue the construction of his second (lower) tunnel, "said ditch would be in danger of destruction," construed to mean that there is a reasonable probability of the effect predicted, is not justified by the evidence. Eight experienced miners on the part of the defendant testified that, in their opinion, the extension of the lower tunnel beyond a vertical line from the ditch would not injure the ditch; and also that even the upper tunnel would never injure the ditch. As grounds for their opinion, they testified, among other things, that the earth in which the ditch was dug, and under it, was composed of clay and broken rocks; that the upper tunnel stood more than two years without injury to the ditch; that there was still about 20 feet of solid ground between the upper tunnel and the ditch; that the upper tunnel was partly in bed rock where it passed the ditch; and that the lower tunnel was partly in bed rock at a distance of 29 feet from its mouth. Five witnesses, on the part of the plaintiffs, testified on this point substantially as follows: Mr. Johnson: "Where a ditch is passing over it, [tunnel,] it would be more apt to cave. * * * In my opinion, as a miner, the effect of the running of these tunnels under the ditch, I think it would be an injury to the ditch. I think it would be likely to make it cave down, from the nature of the ground it was in. * * * The effect of water percolating through ground of this character is to loosen it and cause it to cave; it also causes it to slide. * * * The second tunnel is 300 feet further down stream. Question. Did that tend to weaken the bank at all, where the upper tunnel was? Answer. No, sir. Q. Did the upper tunnel tend to weaken the bank where the lower tunnel was? A. No, sir. Q. There could be no relative connection between the two with reference to the caving or sliding? A. No, sir. Q. Each one would have to occasion its own particular injury by weakening the bank? A. Yes, sir; I think so. Q. How could it cause a slide? A. By coming down from the roof. Q. That would be a mere possibility? A. Yes, sir. Q. It might happen, or it might not? A. It might happen, or it might not. Q. Then this is a mere conjecture on your part that it would happen? A. Certainly; because it has not happened yet. That tunnel was run two years ago and over, and we have had two very excessive seasons since then." Mr. Day. "Question. What is the effect of running a tunnel under the bottom of a ditch? Answer. It has a bad effect if it has water in it. It will make it cave; it will get soft and cave easier from water. * * *" Saw water dripping down from above in defendant's tunnel. Could not say where it came from. This witness gave no opinion as to the effect of defendant's tunnels on plaintiffs' ditch. Mr. Hilliard: "Question. Now, describe to the court the appearance of those tunnels? Answer. I should judge the appearance of those tunnels would be very bad,—that is, they would be liable to cave most any time. It is not a solid foundation. It is a kind of a mountain slide, I should judge, broken-up rock and clay mixed in. I saw water coming through the roof of these tunnels. Q. Do you know what the effect upon a ditch would be of running tunnels under it? A. Well, I should consider it to have a very bad effect; the water coming through, and it not being a solid foundation, it is liable to cave. I saw about eight cuts,—some of them would be about 20 feet back; they were about four feet wide. * * * In my opinion, as a miner, if those tunnels were continued under and beneath that ditch the result would be, I think, to cave down and destroy the ditch." On cross-examination he said: "It would be a mere opinion on my part that the tunnels would have the effect of caving the ditch down. It might occur, and it might not. In there it is all loose bed rock. That would be the result of the action of the elements for ages. It is all sliding rocks, so far as I know. There are trees and brush growing on it." Mr. Pelletreau: "In my opinion the effect upon the ditch, if the tunnel is continued in the manner in which they have been running, is that they will cave the ditch down and destroy it. That would be the result." On cross-examination he said: "If it was properly timbered, it would not cave. * * * Question. It has not caused it within two years, and why should it cause it in the future? Answer. It would at any time, if the ditch were to break and cut the foot of the mountain away." Mr. Beavers: "My opinion as a miner is that if those tunnels were permitted to be run beneath the ditch, that if they continued on cutting the face of the hill, that after a while there would be no support at all. The hill is very steep, and a great mass of earth would shove it off."

Neither of the plaintiffs testified on the trial; and the nature and full extent of the threatened injury stated in their complaint is "that defendant is engaged in running and excavating tunnels, starting at a point about fifty feet down the side of the mountain below said ditch, and that he threatens to run and continue said tunnels under and beneath the bottom of said ditch. * * * That the earth and ground composing the surface of the above-named mountain, at the above-named point, and over which said ditch passes as aforesaid, is of such a character that if an excavation is made below or under said ditch, and into said mountain, the waters conveyed in said ditch will percolate through and into said excavation, and thereby cause a slide on said mountain which will destroy and carry away said ditch for a distance of from one hundred to two hundred feet." The evidence has not the slightest tendency to prove that defendant threatens or intends to construct or continue any tunnel or cut except this lower tunnel; therefore the inquiry as to the probability of future injury to plaintiffs' ditch should be confined to the effect of continuing the lower tunnel. The plaintiffs appear to be entitled to the right of way for their ditch, with vertical and lateral support for it; nothing more. Subject to these rights, the defendant is entitled to his mining claim,—to prospect, explore, and mine it through his lower tunnel, or in any other mode he may select. These rights of the parties are not incompatible, though subject to the maxim, sic utere tuo ut alienum non lædas, (Clark v. Willett, 35 Cal. 548;) and the complaint is that the defendant threatens and intends to violate this maxim to the injury of plaintiffs. That the injunction granted unnecessarily restricts the defendant in the use of his own property, by enjoining him from digging any tunnel in any manner under and beneath plaintiffs' ditch, is unquestionable. If defendant can construct his lower tunnel, or any other tunnel, beneath plaintiffs' ditch, in such manner as not to injure the ditch, he should be permitted to do so, for the evidence does not tend to prove that even the lower tunnel may not be so constructed; much less, that no tunnel at any other place beneath the ditch may not be constructed without possible injury to the ditch. McMenomy v. Baud, 87 Cal. 139, 26 Pac. Rep. 795.

Furthermore, I think the testimony on the part of the plaintiffs, considered in connection with the undisputed facts and circumstances, had no substantial tendency to prove a reasonable probability that a continuation of defendant's lower tunnel, in the manner and direction in which it had been constructed to the extent of 29 feet, would injure plaintiffs' ditch; or more than a remote possibility of such injury, and therefore there is no substantial conflict of evidence on this issue. Even the possibility of such injury is negatived by a considerable preponderance of the whole evidence. But a mere possibility, or anything short of a reasonable probability, of injury, is insufficient to warrant an injunction against any proposed use of property by its owner. "Injury, material and actual, not fanciful or theoretical, or merely possible, must be shown as the necessary or probable result of the action sought to be restrained." Genet v Canal Co., 122 N Y. 529, 25 N. E. Rep. 522. In Lutheran Church v. Maschop, 10 N. J. Eq. 57, the court said: "The court cannot grant an injunction to allay the fears and apprehensions of individuals; they must show the court that the acts against which they ask protection are not only threatened, but will, in probability, be committed, to their injury." In Sherman v. Clark, 4 Nev. 142, the court said: "It must also appear that there is at least a reasonable probability that a real injury will occur if the injunction be not granted." In High, Inj. § 790, it is said: "Nor will an injunction be continued against the erection of a structure where the facts do not satisfactorily show a probability of irreparable injury to the complainants." See, also, Dorsey v. Allen, 85 N. C. 358; Hall v. Rood, 40 Mich. 49; McMenomy v. Baud, 87 Cal. 139, 26 Pac. Rep. 795, and cases there cited; Hoke v. Perdue, 62 Cal. 545.

It is claimed by respondents that defendant's mining claim is prospectively valueless, and therefore that defendant was never entitled to locate or to explore it, and is not injured by the injunction; and one or two of plaintiffs' witnesses testified that, in their opinion, there is no "pay channel" in defendant's claim, while witnesses on the part of defendant expressed their opinion to the contrary. But it was proved, without contradiction, that defendant's claim is in the midst of a mineral region; that there were paying gravel mines in its immediate vicinity, among them that of the plaintiffs', and that the defendant had washed a small quantity of gold ($1.75) from earth taken from his upper tunnel. That defendant located and prospected his claim in good faith, was sufficiently evinced by the fact that he had expended $1,000 in running the tunnel and cuts complained of. Under these circumstances, the question whether the defendant would succeed in discovering a pay channel was immaterial for any purpose of this action. The plaintiffs did not claim the land for any other purpose than the right of way and support for their ditch, and their right to this extent was not controverted. They were not entitled to question the right of the defendant to locate, possess, and explore the land as mineral land, subject to their admitted right of way. Only the government of the United States, or persons claiming the lands under the government as non-mineral land, could properly raise the question whether the land was subject to be located as mineral land. The court found that "the ground where defendant is running his tunnel is absolutely worthless for mining purposes," and "that there is no evidence of any gravel channel either under or back of said ditch;" and it seems probable that this was the principal ground upon which the perpetual injunction was granted. I think the judgment and order should be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: Foote, C.; Belcher, C.

GREEN et al. v. ABIETINE MEDICAL CO.

(No. 14,458.)

CORPORATIONS—STOCK—ESTOPPEL TO DENY PAYMENT.

Plaintiffs held a majority of the stock of a corporation, which they had taken at the rate of 50 cents a share in return for property turned into the hands of the corporation. Afterwards the board of directors, which plaintiffs controlled, sold the balance of the stock to raise working capital at the same rate per share which plaintiffs had paid, and gave certificates which stated that the stock so sold was fully paid and unassessable, the same kind of certificates which plaintiffs held. After having acquiesced for three years in this sale, plaintiffs claimed that the shares so sold for working capital were subscribed for at the par value of two dollars a share, and that the difference between that and the price paid was still due. Held, that plaintiffs were estopped from denying that the price paid was full payment.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Butte county; P. O. HUNDLEY, Judge.

Action by R. M. Green and Perkins & Wise, copartners, against the Abietine Medical Company, a corporation, to vacate an assessment made upon plaintiffs' stock in the corporation, to recover the sum of assessments paid, and to enjoin defendant from further assessing plaintiffs' stock. From a judgment for defendant, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, plaintiff Green appeals. Affirmed.

H. V. Reardan, for appellants. F. C. Lusk, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. The defendant is a California corporation, which was organized on the 22d day of May, 1885, for the purpose of manufacturing medicines from the sap of trees known as "abietine trees," and the plaintiffs are stockholders of the corporation. The corporation levied an assessment of 10 cents per share on its capital stock. The plaintiffs having refused to pay the assessment, their stock was advertised for sale. To prevent the sale, plaintiffs paid the assessment under protest that the assessment was void, and that they were under no lawful obligation to pay it. The object of this action is to vacate the assessment, to recover from defendant the sum of the assessments paid by the plaintiffs, and to enjoin the defendant from further assessing plaintiff's stock. Judgment passed for defendant, from which, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, the plaintiff Green alone appeals. The material facts found by the court and admitted by the pleadings are substantially as follows: On the day the corporation was organized, May 22, 1885, A. F. Jones, John D. Williams, and the plaintiff Green entered into a written agreement with each other, reciting that they had "incorporated themselves into a corporation known as the Abietine Medical Company," and that each of them owned certain described property necessary for the use of the corporation in its business; and agreeing that each would sell such property to the corporation in consideration of a specified number of shares of "full paid, unassessable" stock of the corporation. The plaintiff Green agreed to sell his property for 12,750 shares of such stock and $1,000 in cash, Williams agreed to sell his property for 5,000 shares of such stock, and Jones agreed to sell his property for 12,750 shares of the stock. The whole capital stock, as stated in the articles of incorporation, was $100,000, divided into 50,000 shares. The corporation was not a party to this agreement, but entertained it as a proposal, and thereafter, at a regular meeting of its board of directors, held on June 8, 1885, accepted the proposal, took the property described in the agreement, and ordered the issuance of certificates of stock to Green, Jones, and Williams, according to the terms of their agreement; and such certificates were then issued, stating among other things that the stock was "full paid and unassessable." At the meeting of June 8th, the board ordered the issuance of certificates for 10 shares to E. W. Fogg, and 20 shares to Floyd Taber, which had been given them to qualify them to become directors. Of the remainder of the stock, 19,500 shares were reserved by the corporation to be sold for "working capital," and were ordered to be sold for not less than 50 cents per share, and afterwards were sold to various persons for 50 cents per share. Article 10 of the original by-laws of the corporation prescribed the form of certificates of stock, containing this statement, viz.: "And that the same [shares] is full paid and unassessable stock." But at a meeting of the stockholders held September 6, 1886, this by-law was amended by striking out the words "and unassessable." At a stockholders' meeting, June 2, 1885, it was unanimously resolved "that no assessment be levied on the capital stock of the company without the unanimous vote of the stockholders." It also appears that there was no by-law authorizing the issuance of certificates of stock prior to full payment. At a stockholders' meeting September 6, 1886, at which all the stock was represented, "it was unanimously resolved that it is the sense of the stockholders of this corporation that the directors thereof do levy assessments on the capital stock of said corporation when necessary for the business thereof to be properly conducted, said assessments not to exceed the amount of ten cents per share at any one assessment." At a directors' meeting, April 25, 1887, it was resolved to levy an assessment of 10 cents per share. This assessment was levied on all the stock, and was all paid without objection. Again, August 18, 1887, another assessment of 10 cents per share was levied on all the stock, and was all paid without objection. From the organization of the corporation until the commencement of this action, the appellant Green was a stockholder and director, and voted for each of the above-mentioned orders and resolutions of the stockholders, and of the board of directors, except that at the meeting of August 18, 1887, he moved to amend the resolution by reducing the assessment to five cents per share, and, when his proposed amendment was lost, he voted against the resolution. The assessment to which appellant first objected, and which he seeks to avoid and set aside by this action, was levied November 14, 1889.

The court found that no part of the capital stock of defendant was ever subscribed for by any person, but that the whole stock had been sold by the corporation to various persons, as fully paid-up stock; that the stock sold to Green, Jones, and Williams in exchange for their property was not sold for its par value of $2 per share, and that the consideration paid by them in property did not exceed 50 cents per share; that the 19,500 shares reserved for working capital were sold to various parties for cash, at 50 cents per share, and that all the certificates issued to purchasers of stock were precisely in the same form,—all contained the statement that the stock was "full paid and unassessable;" that there was no unpaid subscription price due or owing to the corporation on any part of the 19,500 shares sold for working capital, nor upon any other stock; that all the stock of the corporation, 50,000 shares, had been issued and is held as fully paid stock, and all stands upon the same footing; that 50 cents per share was the full value of the 19,500 shares sold for working capital at the times it was sold; and that the purchasers thereof never subscribed for any part thereof, and never promised to pay the par value thereof, nor any price exceeding 50 cents per share, which they paid. As conclusions of law the court found that all the stock is alike assessable, and that the assessment in question is valid. It is, tacitly at least, and I think correctly, conceded by appellant's counsel, that, where all the stock of a private corporation in this state is fully paid, it is assessable. Railroad Co. v. Spreckles, 65 Cal. 193, 3 Pac. Rep. 661, 802. But counsel contends that the stock issued to Green, Williams, and Jones in exchange for property was fully paid up, while the 19,500 shares reserved for working capital, and sold for 50 cents per share, must be considered as having been subscribed for by the purchasers thereof at its par value of $2 per share; and that until this is called in or paid, the alleged fully paid stock issued to Green, Williams, and Jones, in payment for property, cannot be assessed. Passing all questions as to the correctness of this theory, it will be sufficient to say that the most material of the assumed facts upon which it is constructed are negatived by the findings of the court. No stock was subscribed for, but all the stock was purchased from the corporation; Green, Williams, and Jones did not pay for the stock purchased by them a sum exceeding 50 cents per share; all the certificates issued to purchasers of stock were in the same form, stating that the stock was fully paid; all the acts of the corporation prior to the assessment of November 14, 1889, were advised and consented to by the plaintiffs in their dual character of stockholders and directors, except that appellant objected to the amount of the second assessment; the actual value of the stock did not exceed 50 cents per share at the times when it was sold by the corporation; and the court found that all the stock was fully paid stock, as stated in the certificates issued by the corporation in obedience to a by-law adopted by the plaintiffs in their character of stockholders.

It should be observed that the rights of creditors are not involved in this suit, and that, from an equitable point of view, and as matter of fact, the suit is a contest between two classes of stockholders, viz., the class which exchanged property for stock, and the class which paid cash for stock. In this view of the case it seems clear that the plaintiffs have no just ground for complaining of the assessment in question. As both parties to the contest paid the same price for their stock, the effect of the assessment upon all stockholders was equal and just. Moreover, on the facts pleaded and found by the court, I think the plaintiffs (especially the appellant) are estopped from denying that the stock sold for cash is not fully paid stock, and from claiming that any sum is due or owing thereon from the purchasers or holders thereof to the corporation. At the time the reserved 19,500 shares were offered for sale at 50 cents per share, Green, Williams, and Jones controlled the board of directors, and were the equitable owners of all the unsold stock, and the legal owners of all stock that had been sold. In the estimation of a court of equity, they constituted the corporation. In obedience to their orders and resolutions their fictitious creature, the corporation, as their trustee, sold the reserved 19,500 shares of stock, representing and certifying to the purchasers that the price paid was full payment, and that the stock was fully paid stock. The trust of this representation and certificate was a contractual condition of the sale, which the stockholders—the real sellers—are equitably, and the corporation legally, bound to make good to the purchasers, unless the contract of sale was unlawful. No reason is perceived why the sale should be held unlawful. It is contended, however, that it was a violation of section 323 of the Civil Code, which provides that "all corporations for profit must issue certificates for stock when fully paid up, * * * and may provide, in their by-laws, for issuing certificates prior to the full payment, under such restrictions and for such purposes as their by-laws may provide." This section does not prohibit the issuing of certificates before the stock is fully paid up. It enjoins the duty of issuing certificates for fully paid-up stock, and authorizes the stockholders to enact by-laws, in accordance with which the corporation may issue certificates before full payment. While "it is true that the unanimous consent of the stockholders cannot cure the illegality of issuing certificates in violation of law," yet "the rule that a corporation is bound by an unauthorized act of its agents after the act has been ratified by all the stockholders applies to an unauthorized issue of certificates for shares." Mor. Priv. Corp. § 290. In the case at bar there was more than a mere ratification by the stockholders. At a regular meeting of all the stockholders before the sale, the corporation was expressly authorized and directed to sell the reserved stock, as fully paid stock, for 50 cents per share. Article 10 of the by-laws required that each certificate of stock should state that the stock was fully paid, and the certificates issued on the sales of the reserved stock so stated. During a period of more than three years immediately after such sales and the issuance of such certificates, all the stockholders acquiesced therein. See Sayre v. Heating Co., 69 Cal. 208,[1] 10 Pac. Rep. 408; Gas Co. v. West, 50 Iowa, 25; Goff v. Windmill Co., 62 Iowa, 691, 18 N. W. Rep. 307; Lumber Co. v. Mittlestadt, 43 Minn. 91, 44 N. W. Rep. 1079; Walburn v. Chenault, 43 Kan. 352, 23 Pac. Rep. 657. The plaintiffs, as against the corporation and the holders of the stock sold for cash, are estopped from denying that the price paid (50 cents per share) for the reserved stock, was full payment, and from asserting that the holders of that stock are indebted to the corporation for the difference between the price paid and the par value, by the terms of the contract of sale made pursuant to their order, and evidenced by certificates issued in accordance with a by-law enacted by them, upon the faith of which the purchasers appear to have relied and acted in good faith, in paying the purchase price and two subsequent assessments; in all which the plaintiffs acquiesced during a period of three years. Mor. Corp. § 630 et seq. The finding that the stock was fully paid stock, construed to mean that the purchase price was fully paid, and that the purchasers were not indebted to the corporation for the difference between the price paid and the par value, is fully justified by the evidence, and is not inconsistent with the finding that all the stock was sold and paid for at 50 cents per share. The authorities above cited show that when, by consent of all the stockholders, stock is sold by the corporation for less than its par value, it is to be considered as fully paid-up stock, in the sense above stated; and it is manifestly in this legal sense only that the court found all the stock to be fully paid-up stock, and not in the sense that the full par value had been paid. In no aspect of the case is the appellant entitled to complain of the assessment in question, nor has he been injured thereby. I think the judgment and order should be affirmed.

PEOPLE ex rel. JENNINGS v. MARKHAM, Governor. (No. 15,176.)

STATE LEGISLATURE — TERM OF OFFICE OF SENATORS — DIVISION OF DISTRICT.

In 1890, S., a qualified resident of B. county, was elected state senator for the fortieth district, composed of B. and D. counties, for a full term of four years. In 1891 the legislature, by reapportionment, made D. county alone the fortieth district, and provided that there should be an election in 1892 in the odd-numbered districts, and that the senators elected in 1890 from the even-numbered districts should continue in office four years. Const. art. 4, § 4, provides that a senator shall be a citizen "of the district for which he shall be elected one year next before his election." Held, that S. remained senator for the fortieth district for the full term of four years, his residence in B. county causing no vacancy.

Application by the people ex rel. Jennings, petitioner, against H. H. Markham, as governor, for a mandamus. Proceeding dismissed on demurrer to petition.

Gibson & Titus, for petitioner. Atty. Gen. Hart, for respondent.

MCFARLAND, J. This is an application for a writ of mandate to compel the respondent, as governor of the state, to issue a proclamation for a special election in the fortieth senatorial district to fill what is alleged to be a vacancy in the office of senator for said district. No question is raised as to the jurisdiction of this court to issue such a writ in a proper case. The facts disclosed by the petition are these: At the general election held in November, 1890, Hon. H. M. Streeter was duly elected state senator for the full constitutional term of four years for the senatorial district composed of the counties of San Bernardino and San Diego, then called the "Fortieth District." At that time he was a resident of the said county of San Bernardino, and was in every way qualified for the office of senator for said district. He has ever since been, and now is, a resident of said county of San Bernardino. In 1891 the legislature passed an act by which, for purposes of legislative representation, it reapportioned and redistricted the state; and in that act it provided that thereafter the county of San Diego alone should constitute a senatorial district, to be called the "Fortieth." (The act also provided, however, that there should be an election in 1892 for senators from the odd-numbered districts, and that senators who had been elected from the even-numbered districts in 1890 should continue in office for four years.) The only point made by petitioner is that, by virtue of said act making San Diego alone the fortieth district, the said Streeter ceased to live in the fortieth district; and that, therefore, under the constitution of this state, there is a vacancy in the office of senator for said district. But the only constitutional provision upon the subject is in section 4 of article 4, and is as follows: "No person shall be a member of the senate or assembly who has not been a citizen and inhabitant of the state three years, and of the district for which he shall be elected one year, next before his election." And it is quite clear that, so far as residence is concerned, this provision does not in the least affect the question before us. Streeter was elected for a district composed of the counties of San Bernardino and San Diego; and at the time of his election he was, and for a year theretofore had been, and (if that be material) still is, a resident of said district. The cases cited by petitioner are not in point. They were cases where officers of counties, or other municipal corporations, were required by law to reside at the seat of government of the municipalities; and the provisions of law under review in these cases were materially different from the provision of our constitution above quoted. For instance, in the leading case cited by petitioner, of State v. Choate, 11 Ohio, 511, the constitutional provision construed was as follows: "There shall be appointed in each county not more than three, nor less than two, associate justices, who during their continuance in office shall reside therein." It is to be observed that in this case petitioner raises no question arising out of the said act of the legislature redistricting the state other than the said question of residence. The demurrer to the petition is sustained, and the proceeding dismissed.

PEOPLE ex rel. SNOWBALL v. PENDEGAST, County Clerk. (No. 15,184.)

SAME v. MARKHAM, Governor. (No. 15,185.)

ELECTIONS OF SENATORS—TIME—REAPPORTIONMENT OF DISTRICTS.

Under Const. 1879, art. 4, §§ 1–6, the state is divided into senate districts numbered from 1 to 40, and senators are chosen for terms of 4 years. The only exceptions stated are that the senators elected in 1879 shall be limited to 3 years, and those elected in 1882 from the odd-numbered districts to 2 years, so that one half may thus be elected every second year. Held that, notwithstanding a county may by a new apportionment be transferred from an odd to an even numbered district, and so lose the opportunity of participating in an election, the courts will not interfere; but the senator elected in the said even-numbered district, before the change, will hold for the full term. McPherson v. Bartlett, 4 Pac. Rep. 582, 65 Cal. 577, distinguished.

Applications, on relation of Snowball, for writs of mandate to Pendegast, county clerk of Yolo county, and Gov. Markham, governor of California. Denied.

G. W. McInerney, for petitioner. Atty. Gen. Hart, for respondent.

BEATTY, C. J. These are original applications for writs of mandate. The relator is a citizen of Yolo county, and possesses the qualifications entitling him to represent the senatorial district of which Yolo county is a part. He claims that under the constitution and laws of the state a senator is to be elected in said district at the approaching election, and he has been regularly nominated as a candidate for the office. He has made formal demand upon the governor to issue his proclamation for the election of a senator from said district, and upon the county clerk of Yolo county to file his certificate of nomination pursuant to the election law. Both demands have been refused, and he seeks by these proceedings to enforce compliance therewith. In each case a general demurrer to the petition has been interposed, which raises the question whether, under a proper construction of the constitution and laws of the state, the terms of the senators elected in the year 1890 from the even-numbered senatorial districts, as well as those of the senators elected in 1888 from the odd-numbered districts, expire on the first Monday after the 1st day of January next. If they do not so expire; if, notwithstanding the redivision of the state into new senatorial districts by the act of March 11, 1891, the senators elected in 1890 continue to hold office for the full constitutional term of four years,—it is conceded that the writ in each case must be denied. As we are very clearly of the opinion that this proposition must be affirmed, it will not be necessary to consider any other questions affecting the right of the relator to the relief which he demands.

So far as it rests in the power of the legislature to regulate the senatorial terms, there is no doubt as to the law. The act above cited, by which the state was redivided into legislative districts, as required by section 6, art. 4, of the constitution, is plain and explicit, to the effect that the senators elected in 1890 from the even-numbered districts, as defined by the act of 1883, shall continue in office for four years; that at the approaching election only senators from the odd-numbered districts are to be elected, and that the first election of senators from the even-numbered districts, as now defined, shall be in 1894. St. 1891, p. 83, § 4. But it is contended that this act, in so far as it attempts to continue the senators from the even-numbered districts in office for a full term of four years, is in conflict with the constitution; and the question for determination, therefore, is the true construction of the provisions of the organic law with respect to this matter. The number and arrangement of assembly and senatorial districts, the election of senators and assemblymen, and their terms of office, are all regulated with minute particularity by the constitution, (article 4, §§ 1-6;) and the meaning of these provisions, so far at least as the question here presented is involved, seems to us to be plain and unambiguous. The legislative power is vested in a senate and assembly. Section 1. The senate consists of 40, and the assembly of 80, members, to be elected by districts numbered respectively from 1 to 40, and from 1 to 80, each district to be represented by 1 member. This numbering is to commence at the northern, and end at the southern, boundary of the state. In the formation of the districts no county is to be divided unless it contain sufficient population within itself to form two or more districts, nor is any part of any county to be united with any other county; but, subject to these restrictions, the districts are to be made and kept as nearly as possible equal in population. For this purpose the census, taken under the direction of the congress of the United States in the year 1880, and every 10 years thereafter, is made the basis of fixing and adjusting the legislative districts, and it is made the duty of the legislature at its first session after each census to adjust such districts and reapportion the representation. Sections 5, 6. Senators are chosen for a term of four years, (section 4,) and one half of the members are to be elected every two years. All the members of the assembly are chosen biennially for a term of two years. Section 3. The members of both houses are elected on the first Tuesday after the first Monday of the even-numbered years, and their terms of office and the session of the legislature commence on the first Monday after the first day of January next ensuing. Sections 2, 3; article 20, § 20.

These are the general, important, and permanent features of the scheme of legislative organization embodied in the constitution. Confining ourselves to the senators, it is important to note these two fundamental provisions respecting their election and terms of office: Their term of office is four years, and one half of their number is to be elected every two years. If there are any exceptions to this rule they should be found in the constitution itself, and, if any such exceptions are found, it must be held, upon a familiar principle of construction, that they are the only exceptions, and that the rule, subject to such exceptions as are expressly enumerated, is invariable in its operation. Looking, then, to the terms of the constitution, we find that there are two, and only two, exceptions made to the rule therein prescribed, and these evidently designed for the mere purpose of putting into regular operation the permanent system and policy indicated by the rule itself. At the time of the adoption of the constitution in 1879, the state was divided by law into 29 senatorial districts, numbered from 1 to 29, from which 40 senators were elected,—20 from the odd-numbered and 20 from the even-numbered districts. Act March 16, 1874. The first election under the new constitution was to take place in 1879 for all the members of the legislature and all the officers of the reorganized state. The regular terms of the members of the senate and assembly were four and two years respectively; of the officers of the executive department, four years; of the justices of the supreme court, twelve years; of the superior court justices, six years. But since it was desired that the general state elections should be held on the even-numbered years, it was provided that the terms of all the officers elected at the first election should be shortened one year so that their successors could be elected in 1880, 1882, 1884, and so on. For this reason the 40 senators elected in 1879, in common with all other persons elected at the same time to offices, the regular term of which is 4 years, were limited to a term of 3 years. This was one necessary exception to the rule, and there was one other equally necessary. The 40 senators elected in 1879 for a term of 3 years would go out of office at the beginning of 1883, and their 40 successors would be elected in November, 1882. In order to bring about the alternate election every 2 years of one half of the senators, it was necessary, sooner or later, to shorten the terms of one half of them by 2 years. It was assumed that the legislature of 1881, in obedience to the express injunction of the constitution, (article 4, § 6,) would redistrict the state for legislative purposes upon the basis of the census of 1880, and in accordance with the constitutional scheme; that the state being so redistricted, the 40 senators elected in 1882 would be chosen from the new districts, and that the time would be ripe for putting in operation the system of electing one half of the senators every 2 years. Accordingly, it was provided that the seats of the 20 senators elected in the year 1882 from the odd-numbered districts should be vacated at the end of the second year. These, and no other, exceptions are made by the constitution to the rule which it prescribes, and we know of no authority in the courts or the executive or the legislature itself to enlarge the list. This, however, is what in effect we are asked to do. Yolo county, which by the act of 1883 constituted, together with Napa county, the ninth district, is by the act of 1891 joined with Sutter and Yuba counties to form the new sixth district. Sutter and Yuba were, under the act of 1883, in the twelfth district. Similar changes have been made all over the state. Very few counties are now in a senatorial district bearing the same number as that under which they were ranged before the new act. Of the rest some have been changed from one odd to another odd number, others from one even to another even number, others from even to odd, and no less than four counties, Lassen, Modoc, San Luis Obispo, and Yolo, from odd to even numbers. In such counties as were comprised under odd numbers, and so remain, the voters will of course have an opportunity of choosing senatorial representatives at the approaching election. In counties that were comprised under even numbers and which so remain, the voters will not have an opportunity of choosing senatorial representatives this year, but they will be represented by the senators for whom they voted two years ago. In counties formerly in even, but now in odd, numbered districts, the voters will participate in the choice of senators at this election, notwithstanding the senators for whom they voted two years ago in their old districts hold over for two years longer. In other words, they will have double their fair and equal representation in the senate; while the voters in counties like Yolo, which have been transferred from odd to even numbered districts, will have no opportunity of participating in the choice of senators at this election, notwithstanding the terms of the senators chosen by them four years ago will have expired. In other words, such counties will be deprived of their fair and equal share of representation in the senate. Undoubtedly these are inconvenient and deplorable results, but it must be assumed that they were foreseen and deliberately accepted by the framers of the constitution. Whatever the fact may be as to the actual amount of prescience by which the deliberations of the convention were guided, the courts in construing the constitution are bound to suppose that any inconveniences involved in the application of its provisions, according to their plain terms and import, were considered in its formation, and voluntarily accepted as less intolerable than those which are thereby avoided, or as fully compensated by countervailing advantages. But with respect to this matter, it cannot be doubted that the framers of the constitution fully understood that at every redivision of the state into senatorial districts inconveniences similar to those above set forth must necessarily ensue, and the fact that they made no provision for a remedy proves that they did not regard them as of paramount importance. Certain it is, at all events, that so far from attempting to remedy the evil by providing that all of the senators should go out of office together after every redivision of the state, they placed in the constitution more than one clear and express injunction, which must be willfully disregarded in resorting to that method of correction.

It is conceded in the argument, and it is manifestly true, that if there is to be an election in the sixth district in 1892 there must be an election in every other even-numbered district in the state, or, in other words, that the whole 40 senators must be elected at one time instead of one half every two years as the constitution requires. And another consequence involved in this contention is that not only must the constitutional term of the senators elected in 1890 be reduced by two years, but, unless we are to abandon for all time the constitutional scheme of rotation in senatorial elections, the terms of one half of the 40 senators chosen this year would have to be reduced to two years, in order that half of the senators might be chosen in 1894. But if this were to be done, how would it be done, and by what authority? The constitution contains no provision on the subject, and affords no rule of decision except a rule by analogy, under which it might be plausibly argued that the provision respecting the senators chosen in 1882 should be applied to those chosen in 1892, with the effect of vacating the seats of all senators from odd-numbered districts at the end of two years. But such an argument, we think, would be more plausible than sound, and such a decree would be more like making than expounding the law.

The case of McPherson v. Bartlett, 65 Cal. 577, 4 Pac. Rep. 582, was referred to in the argument, but we do not understand that counsel make any claim that the point involved in these proceedings was there decided. The opinion, it is true, contains an observation, not necessary to the argument and purely obiter, to the effect that the terms of one half of the senators will necessarily be shortened to two years every time the legislative districts are readjusted. But this was a question not involved in the case, either directly or indirectly, and the dictum of the court cannot have proceeded from very mature consideration. The history of that case is as follows: It was, as we have seen, made the duty of the legislature of 1881 to divide the state into 40 senatorial districts upon the basis of the census of 1880 for the purpose of electing 40 senators in 1882 to succeed the 40 senators elected in 1879 for a term of 3 years; and in order to put in operation the system of rotation by which one half of the senators should be elected every 2 years, it was provided that the seats of the 20 senators elected in 1882 from the odd-numbered districts should be vacated at the expiration of the second year. Article 4, § 5. In anticipation, apparently, that the legislature of 1881 might fail to redistrict the state as enjoined in section 6, it was provided that, until such redistricting, senators and assemblymen should be elected by the districts and apportionment then established by law. Section 6. The legislature of 1881 did fail to redistrict the state, and, as a consequence, 40 senators were chosen in 1882 from the 29 old districts to succeed the 40 senators chosen from the same districts in 1879 for the shortened term of 3 years. These senators and assemblymen elected at the same time constituted the legislature of 1883, which took up and performed the task, neglected by their predecessors, of redistricting the state for legislative purposes in the manner enjoined by the constitution. St. 1883, pp. 58-85. By the forty-second section of the act establishing senatorial districts, (page 61,) it was provided that, at the general election in 1886, 40 senators should be elected, 1 from each district; that those elected from the odd-numbered districts should hold office for 2 years; and that their successors should be elected in 1888, and every 4 years thereafter; that the senators elected from the even-numbered districts should hold their office for 4 years, and that their successors should be elected in 1890, and every 4 years thereafter. By these provisions the legislature undoubtedly supposed that they had put into regular and permanent operation the scheme of the constitution, and, evidently, they also supposed that all the senators elected in 1882 would hold their offices for the full constitutional term of 4 years, and until the election and qualification of the 40 senators to be elected in 1886. But in McPherson v. Bartlett, decided just prior to the election of 1884, it was held that the 20 senators chosen in 1882 from the 15 odd-numbered districts according to the old apportionment held their offices for only 2 years, and, consequently, that their successors must be elected in 1884. The point actually involved and decided was certainly a doubtful one, and three of the justices dissented from the conclusions of the court; but the decision, whether right or wrong, has no application here. It merely gave effect to a clause of the constitution which in terms applied to the senators elected from the odd-numbered districts in November, 1882. There is no similar clause applying to any subsequent election, and to make that special and exceptional provision a ground for shortening the terms of the senators elected in 1890 would be to decide not only without a rule, but without even a plausible argument from analogy.

In short, the theory of the petitioner is too widely at variance with the theory of the constitution to bear investigation. By the scheme of the constitution we have biennial sessions of a legislature, composed of 80 assemblymen elected biennially, and of 40 senators chosen one half every 2 years for a term of 4 years, covering 2 sessions of the legislature. Under the theory of the petitioner, with nothing to support it, against the plain terms of the constitution, except the argumentum ab inconvenienti, at every fifth election 40 senators must be elected at once, and at 2 out of every 5 elections 20 senators must be elected for terms of 2 years instead of terms of 4 years. It is impossible to reconcile the provisions of the constitution with such an intention on the part of its framers, and equally impossible, in view of the painstaking detail with which their intentions in other respects are set forth, to suppose that they would have omitted to make express provisions covering matters of so much importance if they wished to accomplish that for which the relator is contending. Our conclusion is that the senators chosen in 1890 hold their offices until January, 1895, and, consequently, that there can be no election of a senator from the sixth district in 1892. The writs are denied.

JOHNSON v. VISHER. (No. 14,859.)

EJECTMENT—COMPLAINT—VERDICT.

1. A complaint in ejectment alleging that defendant wrongfully ousted plaintiff, and took possession of the premises to plaintiff's damage, is sufficient without an averment that defendant had received the rents and profits.

2. Where there is no request that an informal verdict be made formal and specific, and the construction of the verdict by the trial court is relevant and responsive to the pleadings, an objection to it will not be heard on appeal.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from superior court, San Joaquin county.

Action of ejectment by Phœbe F. Johnson against S. Visher. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Cobb, Kinley & Burris, for appellant. Baldwin & Campbell, for respondent.

VANCLIEF, C. Action of ejectment; the complaint alleging that plaintiff is owner of the demanded premises that defendant wrongfully ousted her from, and took possession thereof, "and now retains possession of the same from plaintiff, to plaintiff's damage in the sum of five hundred dollars;" and "that the rental value of said real estate is the sum of $1,500 or thereabouts per annum;" and prays judgment for the possession, and "for the sum of two thousand dollars damage." The answer of the defendant denies plaintiff's title, right of possession, and all damages; and denies that the value of the rents and profits exceeds $200 per annum; and for further answer alleges that defendant has been in the peaceable and uninterrupted possession of the land for more than five years next before the commencement of this action, claiming the same adversely by farming the same, etc., and that plaintiff's alleged cause of action is barred by section 318 and by section 338 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The answer also alleges other affirmative matter as a defense to the action. The case was tried by a jury, whose verdict was: "We, the jury in the above-entitled cause, find for the plaintiff, and judgment in the sum of ($1,175) eleven hundred and seventy-five dollars." Whereupon it was adjudged by the court that plaintiff have and recover from the defendant the possession of the demanded premises, and "the sum of $1,175, rents and profits," and $74.25 costs. The defendant brings this appeal from the judgment on the judgment roll without a bill of exceptions.

1. Appellant contends that neither the complaint nor the verdict is sufficient to support the judgment. The complaint, as against a general demurrer, warrants a judgment for the possession of the demanded premises, and for the value of the rents and profits during the period of the wrongful withholding. It was not necessary that there should have been an averment that the defendant had received the rents and profits. Patterson v. Ely, 19 Cal. 28; Sullivan v. Davis, 4 Cal. 291. The questions as to what was the value of the rents and profits, and as to what was the period of wrongful withholding, must have been submitted to the jury, whose verdict must be presumed to have been justified by the evidence. The verdict, though informal, was properly construed by the court to be a general verdict, with a special finding of the value of the rents and profits for the whole period of the wrongful withholding, and, so construed, supports the judgment. As a general verdict it determines that plaintiff was the owner of the demanded premises, and that defendant wrongfully withheld the possession; from which it follows, as matter of law, that plaintiff was entitled to recover the possession and the value of the rents and profits for the whole period of the wrongful withholding. The remaining question propounded is, does the special finding of the jury, viz., "and judgment in the sum of $1,175," construed in connection with the pleadings and evidence, mean that $1,175 was the value of the rents and profits for the wrongful withholding, so as to support the judgment for that sum, as "rents and profits?" As the record gives no account of the proceedings on the trial, and contains no part of the evidence, the appellate court is not placed at the point of view occupied by the trial court when the latter construed the verdict. Only the relation of the verdict to the pleadings can be seen by this court; and it appears that the verdict, as construed by the trial court, is relevant and responsive to the pleadings, and, to some extent, includes facts admitted by the pleadings, viz., that defendant withheld the possession, and that the value of the rents and profits was $200 per annum. To the extent of the admissions of the pleadings both the jury and the court were bound by them. McLaughlin v. Kelly, 22 Cal. 213; Hutchinson v. Inyo Co., 61 Cal. 119; Pierce v. Schaden, 62 Cal. 283. If necessary to uphold the construction given to the verdict by the trial court, it may be presumed that, in addition to the admissions of the pleadings, it was clearly proved or admitted at the trial that the value of the rents and profits for the period of the wrongful withholding was $1,175, and that there was no evidence of damage from any other cause. But, supposing that there was evidence of damage other than the loss of rents and profits, to the extent of the ad damnum allegation, ($500,) and that the jury included this in their estimate,—adding it to $675 for rents and profits,—the defendant was not injured, either by the form of the verdict or by the misconstruction of it by the court; for, so far as he was concerned, the result would have been the same as if the verdict had been perfectly formal, in two parts,—$675 rents and profits, and $500 damages from other causes. If the defendant was dissatisfied with the form of the verdict, he should have asked, at the time it was announced, that it be made formal and certain; otherwise it was the duty of the court to construe it so as to give it the effect intended by the jury, if the intended effect could be ascertained from its language, considered in connection with the pleadings and evidence; provided, however, that the intended effect was not unlawful and not irrelevant to the pleadings, (Truebody v. Jacobson, 2 Cal. 270; People v. McCarty, 48 Cal. 557; People v. Perdue, 49 Cal. 425;) and, as a general rule, a party will not be heard to object to a verdict for the first time on appeal from the judgment, if it is susceptible of a construction which may have a lawful and relevant effect, (Douglass v. Kraft, 9 Cal. 562;) and this case does not appear to fall within any exception to the rule.

2. Appellant complains that his equitable defense was not disposed of before the trial at law. The ready answer to this is that no affirmative matter constituting an equitable cause of action against the plaintiff was pleaded. I think the judgment should be affirmed.

We concur: BELCHER, C.; HAYNES, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. DOLAN. (No. 20,905.)

ABDUCTION—HABITS OF FEMALE—APPEAL FROM ORDER REFUSING ARREST OF JUDGMENT—COMMITMENT—PEREMPTORY CHALLENGE.

1. Appeal does not lie from an order refusing to grant a motion in arrest of judgment.

2. The validity of a conviction on an information filed against one charged of an offense is not dependent on the regularity of the complaint on which he was arrested and brought before the committing magistrate.

3. Pen. Code, § 872, provides that if on a preliminary examination it appears that a public offense has been committed, and there is sufficient cause to believe defendant guilty thereof, the magistrate must make or indorse on the depositions taken on such examination an order to that effect, and that defendant be held to answer to the same. Held, that the section is sufficiently complied with where an order of commitment in due form was filed with the other papers in the case, and referred to the complaint as "the within deposition."

4. In a prosecution under Pen. Code, § 267, which makes it unlawful to take any female under the age of 18 away from the person having legal charge of her person without his consent, for the purpose of prostitution, evidence as to whether the child had a habit of being away from home at night is immaterial.

5. In such case, it is no defense that defendant believed the female to have been over 18 years of age.

6. Pen. Code, § 1088, provides that, after the challenges of both sides are disallowed, "either party, first the people, and then defendant, may take peremptory challenges, unless the parties' peremptory challenges are exhausted." Held, that the prosecution may exercise the right of peremptory challenge after once passing the jury, and the right has been exercised by defendant.

Commissioners' decision. Department 2. Appeal from Superior court, Sacramento county; W. H. GRANT, Judge.

D. F. Dolan was convicted of abducting for the purpose of prostitution a female under the age of 18, and appeals. Affirmed.

Carroll Cook and J. E. Foulds, for appellant. Atty. Gen. Hart, for the People.

FOOTE, C. The defendant was convicted of the abduction of a female, under section 267 of the Penal Code. From the judgment rendered, and from an order refusing a new trial, and also from an order refusing to grant a motion in arrest of judgment, he appeals.

No appeal lies from the order last mentioned. People v. Markham, 64 Cal. 157, 30 Pac. Rep. 620.

One of the material points made for the reversal of the judgment and order is that the magistrate before whom the preliminary examination was had, after the defendant's arrest, did not himself swear the complaining witness to the complaint filed against the defendant in the magistrate's court. The magistrate was the judge of the police court of Sacramento, and the affidavit to the complaint was taken by the clerk of that court. Even if it be admitted that such clerk had no power to take the affidavit or oath, we do not see how that affects the question of the validity of the information which, upon this as one ground urged by the appellant, the superior court refused to set aside. For it was said by the appellate court in People v. Velarde, 59 Cal. 457: "The regularity of the proceeding by information did not therefore depend in any manner upon the affidavit on which the warrant of arrest was issued, and had no connection with it." If the affidavit or deposition of the informant or prosecutor under section 811 of the Penal Code, or the sworn complaint which it is the usual practice to demand of the informant or prosecutor, has no connection with the information, we do not perceive how this defect can affect the validity of the information filed in this case, if in other respects the committing magistrate has proceeded properly.

It is further claimed, in support of appellant's contention, that the magistrate did not make a proper order of commitment, because he made no such order on any deposition which was valid. It seems that an order of commitment in due form was made in writing and filed with the clerk of the superior court with the other papers, which referred to the complaint as "the within deposition." This seems to have been held as sufficient to meet the requirements of section 872[1] of the Penal Code, in People v. Wilson, 93 Cal. 377, 28 Pac. Rep. 1061.

The appellant also contends that the complaint is defective in not stating any public offense, or facts sufficient to constitute the public offense for which the defendant was committed, and this he claims, as we understand, to be a jurisdictional matter upon which the information should have been set aside. But the appellate court, as we have seen, does not coincide with appellant's view of the law; and besides, under the rule announced in People v. Fowler, 88 Cal. 138, 25 Pac. Rep. 1110, the complaint did sufficiently charge the offense described in section 267 of the Penal Code. "The gist of the offense is the taking away of the child against the will of the person having lawful charge of her, for the purpose of prostitution; and one who does so acts at his peril, and cannot defend himself on the plea of ignorance as to the age of the child." People v. Fowler, supra. This language of the appellate court is not only decisive of the question of the insufficiency of the complaint, but it also disposes of the argument of defendant that the court should have permitted evidence to go to the jury as to the habits of the child in not being at home at night, contradictory of what her father had testified was her habit. If this was not the fact, and the father had testified to what was not so, as to her habits, it was not matter of impeachment, because whether she stayed at home or wandered abroad at night could not affect the material questions at issue, under section 267 of the Penal Code. For if she was a girl of exemplary or bad habits, or if her father represented her to be of good habits when she was not, these things did not affect the question as to whether or not she was taken off, while under the age of 18 years, for purposes of prostitution, without the consent of her parents.

The point is also made that as to the juror Slaughter the people erroneously exercised the right of peremptory challenge, under the provisions of section 1088 of the Penal Code.[2] It seems that the name of Slaughter was drawn from the jury box, and he was passed by the people, and then the defendant exercised the right to challenge four jurors peremptorily, whereupon, Slaughter not having been sworn, and the panel being uncompleted, the people asked the right further to examine the juror, and then challenged him peremptorily, which was objected to by defendant. We do not see how the defendant's rights were materially affected. He had all the jurors that had not been properly challenged presented him, and he did not challenge the juror Slaughter, and if after that the people exercised a peremptory challenge, when such challenges on their part were not exhausted, how could the defendant be injured? We do not perceive that the case cited on this point (People v. McCarty, 48 Cal. 558) supports the contention of defendant. "Neither a departure from the form or mode prescribed by this Code in respect to any pleading or proceeding, nor an error or mistake therein, renders it invalid, unless it has actually prejudiced the defendant, or tended to his prejudice, in respect to a substantial right." Pen. Code, § 1404.

There is much said by defendant's counsel about the admission and rejection of certain evidence. We have given the whole matter thorough examination, but can perceive no prejudicial error in these regards. The cause was tried by the jury, and upon sufficient evidence, as we think, they convicted the defendant, and that is all that need be said upon the argument made that the evidence does not sustain the verdict. It is assigned for error that the court did not give, as requested, the tenth instruction asked for by the defendant. That instruction runs thus: "If one set or chain of circumstances lead to two conclusions, one or the other of such conclusions must be wrong, and, therefore, in such a case, there must be a reasonable doubt, and the defendant should be acquitted." In lieu of that the court gave this instruction: "If one set or chain of circumstances leads to two opposing conclusions, one or the other of such conclusions must be wrong, and, therefore, if in such a case you have any reasonable doubt as to which of said conclusions the chain of circumstances leads, a reasonable doubt would be thereby created, and you should give the defendant the benefit of the doubt and acquit him." It must be apparent at a glance that the instruction as given was clearer than the one proposed, and stated the law correctly. It is further claimed that instruction 24 asked by defendant should have been given as requested. It ran thus: "Every witness, the defendant included, (if called as a witness,) is presumed to speak the truth, and the jury are bound to remember such presumption, in determining the facts admitted to them, for their consideration." To which the court added this: "But this presumption is a disputable one, and is not conclusive upon you. You are the sole and exclusive judges of the credibility of the witnesses, and of the weight to be given to the testimony of each. In determining the weight of the testimony, you have the right to take into consideration the interest, if any, which the witness may have in result of the trial; his conduct on the stand, his general appearance and demeanor before you, and whether or not it is such as convinces you that he is speaking the truth or otherwise." There appears to be nothing in this act of the court to condemn. The refusal of the court to give the twenty-eighth and twenty-ninth instructions asked by defendant was warranted, for the reasons given by that tribunal, under the circumstances, as they appear in the record. We do not observe any error in the court's charge that the defendant, when a witness in his own behalf, having introduced no evidence of his good character, is not to be assailed by the prosecution being permitted to introduce proof of his general bad character. The charge was in favor of the defendant, and not against him. Neither do we perceive any error in this instruction for the people, viz.: "You are instructed that the child, Kittie Sheridan, (if she did consent,) is of no avail to the prisoner if she is under age, notwithstanding that the defendant bona fide believed and had reasonable grounds for believing that she was over age." There was no dispute but that the girl was under age, as we read the record, and counsel concede that this fact was proven; and the defendant must in a case of this sort act at his peril in abducting a girl under age, and cannot defend himself on the plea of ignorance as to her age. People v. Fowler, 88 Cal. 138, 25 Pac. Rep. 1110. We have carefully examined the whole record, and the very voluminous brief of counsel for appellant, but we find no prejudicial error in the record, and advise that the judgment and order denying a new trial be affirmed.

[1] This section provides that if, on the preliminary examination, it appears that a public offense has been committed, and there is sufficient cause to believe defendant guilty thereof, the magistrate must make or indorse on the depositions taken on such examination an order to that effect, and that defendant be held to answer to the same.

[2] The section provides that, "if all challenges on both sides are disallowed, either party, first the people, and then defendant, may take a peremptory challenge, unless the parties' peremptory challenges are exhausted."

We concur: VANCLIEF, C.; BELCHER, C.

PER CURIAM. For the reasons given in the foregoing opinion the judgment and order are affirmed.

DE HAVEN, J., (concurring.) I concur in the judgment. The court, at the request of defendant, instructed the jury as follows: "(7) Where a criminal charge is to be proved by circumstantial evidence, the proof ought to be not only consistent with the prisoner's guilt, but inconsistent with any other reasonable hypothesis consistent with the proof. (8) Where circumstantial evidence alone is relied upon to sustain a criminal charge, the true rule is that the proof ought not only to be consistent with the prisoner's guilt, but inconsistent with every other rational conclusion, and must exclude to a moral certainty every other hypothesis but the single one of guilt." In view of these clear and explicit instructions, and which stated the law correctly upon the point to which they relate, I do not think it possible that the jury could have been misled by the tenth instruction as modified and given by the court.

KREUZBERGER v. WINGFIELD. (No. 14,828.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 23, 1892.)

PAROL EVIDENCE — MEMORANDUM IN WRITING — ACTION ON CONTRACT—OPINION EVIDENCE—MECHANICS' LIENS—VALIDITY OF ORAL CONTRACT.

1. The rule that parol evidence is not admissible to vary the terms of a written contract does not apply to a memorandum, signed by one of the parties, which contains no contract stipulations, and does not define the mutual obligations, and which appears on its face to be intended as an informal memorandum, to be considered in connection with oral negotiations which preceded it.

2. In an action for work done and materials furnished, where plaintiff has testified to the work which he agreed to do and the kind of materials he was to furnish, a question whether he completed the work in accordance with the contract is not objectionable, as calling for the opinion of the witness. Conner v. Stanley, 7 Pac. Rep. 723, 67 Cal. 315, and Estate of Taylor, 28 Pac. Rep. 603, 92 Cal. 564, distinguished.

3. Code Civil Proc. § 1183, which gives mechanics a lien on buildings, etc., for work and materials, but provides that, where the amount agreed on exceeds $1,000, the contract is void unless in writing, has no application to a contract to construct a sidewalk in a city; but such a contract may be oral, under Code Civil Proc. § 1191, which provides for a lien for the construction of sidewalks, but does not require a writing.

Department 2. Appeal from superior court, Sacramento county; W. C. VAN FLEET, Judge.

Action by Lucus Kreuzberger against Wingfield for a balance for work done and materials furnished in the construction of a sidewalk. Judgment for plaintiff. Defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Johnson, Johnson & Johnson, for appellant. Chauncey H. Dunn, for respondent.

DE HAVEN, J. Action to recover an alleged balance for work done and materials furnished by plaintiff to defendant in the construction of a sidewalk in the city of Sacramento. The plaintiff recovered judgment in the superior court, and the defendant appeals. The claim made by the plaintiff in the court below was, in substance, that by the terms of his contract he was to erect a wooden and cement sidewalk for defendant, with a brick bulkhead around its outer edge, the portion on Eighth street to be made of new lumber, except that the old posts were to be used as supports for it, the new lumber to be of the usual size and quality for such work, and to be covered over with a good quality of cement four inches thick, etc., and that part of the sidewalk to be placed on I street was to be made of the best of the lumber taken from the old sidewalk around the premises at the time of making the contract, except that the top was to be covered with new one-inch redwood lumber, upon which was to be laid the cement. On the other hand, the defendant in his answer alleged that there was no agreement that old lumber should be used in the construction of the sidewalk referred to, but that it was "agreed between the parties that the said carpenter work should be first class in all particulars, and that the materials should be new, strong, and of the best kind. It was further understood and agreed that the said work and labor should be performed in first-class manner, and that the work and materials should in all matters comply fully with the ordinances and directions of the city of Sacramento," etc. The answer further alleged that the work was not performed according to this contract; that the old lumber used was weak, decayed, and broken, and the sidewalk, as constructed, unsafe and insecure.

1. Upon the trial plaintiff introduced oral evidence, tending to show the making of the contract with the agent of defendant, and that its terms were as contended for by plaintiff. It appeared, however, that after the oral negotiations were fully completed, and the terms of the contract agreed on, and about the time plaintiff commenced the work of building the sidewalk, he made and signed the following writing, and gave the same to the defendant or his agent:

"To Right Rev. Bishop Wingfield: 'Contract for brick bulkhead to be built in this manner: Four feet six inches between buttresses to two brick or seventeen inches thick, and to be tapered in as you see the pier on outer side; the circle wall to be eight-inch wall, and all to be plastered outside with cement mortar. There is cement walk to be laid the full length, width, and also to do carpenter work, and to be made ready to receive cement walk. All to be done in a good workmanlike manner, for the sum of one thousand and eighty-one dollars, ($1,081.)

"LUCUS KREUZBERGER,
"No. 1622 K St., Sacramento."

The defendant thereupon moved to strike out all evidence relating to oral negotiations and conversations between the parties prior to the making of this writing, upon the ground that the writing itself constituted the contract between the parties, and contained the only evidence of its terms. The motion was denied, and the court found the terms of the contract to be as testified to by the witnesses for plaintiff. The motion of defendant was properly denied. The rule is, of course, a familiar and salutary one, that when a contract has been reduced to writing, parol evidence is not admissible for the purpose of cutting down or adding to its terms. But, in order for this rule to have any application, the writing must be one which by legal construction shows upon its face that it was intended to express the whole contract between the parties. Naumberg v. Young, 44 N. J. Law, 338; Harrison v. McCormick, 89 Cal. 327, 26 Pac. Rep. 830. It does not apply to a mere memorandum like the one we are now considering, and which does not of itself import any contract. Brigg v. Hilton, 99 N. Y. 517, 3 N. E. Rep. 51. It certainly cannot be determined from this writing whether the sidewalk therein referred to was to be constructed by the plaintiff, who signed it, or by the defendant, to whom it seems to have been addressed, and, of course, there is the same uncertainty as to who shall pay for the work. It does not define the mutual obligations of the parties, and is only signed by the plaintiff. In fact, it does not purport to bind any one. It contains no contract stipulations, and shows upon its face that it was only intended as an informal memorandum, to be considered in connection with the oral negotiations which preceded it.

2. While plaintiff was on the stand as a witness, and after he had testified fully in relation to the terms of the contract, as he claimed them to be, he was asked the following: "And your work is in every way according to the contract that you agreed to do with Von Herlich? What is the character of the work on the Eighth-Street side as regards the contract? Is it in accordance with the contract?" The defendant objected to each of these questions upon the ground that the same were irrelevant and incompetent, and called for the conclusion of the witness. The objection was overruled. The court did not err in these rulings. The questions did not call for the opinion of the witness, within the meaning of the law which excludes the opinions of witnesses, but for facts within his knowledge. The witness had just testified to the terms of the contract, that is, as to the precise work which he had agreed to do, and the kind of materials he was to use in the construction of the sidewalk, and it was certainly competent for him to state whether in point of fact this particular work had been done, and such quality of materials used, and that was, in substance, all that the witness was called upon to say or did say in answer to the questions. In the case of Brink v. Insurance Co., 80 N. Y. 108, the witness was allowed to answer this question: "So far as you could, individually, did you get those proofs of loss forwarded as soon as it was possible for you to do so?" And the court of appeals, in disposing of the objection that this question called for the conclusion or opinion of the witness, speaking by CHURCH, C. J., there said: "While it would not have been a legal error to have sustained the objection, I am of the opinion, under the circumstances of this case, that it was not a legal error to overrule it. The object of all examinations in judicial tribunals is to elicit truth, and there are many cases where the form of questions and the manner of examination must be left to the discretion of the trial judge. No injustice could have been done, because the answer would not be likely to prevail against facts which might be drawn out on cross-examination, or proved by other witnesses inconsistent with it." So in this case the trial judge might properly have required the plaintiff to ask questions touching all the details of the work of constructing the walk, its dimensions, and the grade upon which it was laid, and the quality of the materials used in its construction; but it was clearly a matter within the discretion of the trial judge to permit the general question, and the defendant could, if he had so desired, have called for more minute particulars upon the cross-examination of the witness. The cases of Conner v. Stanley, 67 Cal. 315, 7 Pac. Rep. 723, and Estate of Taylor, 92 Cal. 564, 28 Pac. Rep. 603, are not in conflict with these views. In those cases the questions held to be erroneous called upon the witness for answers, which necessarily must have been based upon his opinion of the law governing the case, as well as his knowledge of the facts. The distinction between those cases and this one is in this respect marked and important.

3. The appellant further contends that the contract upon which plaintiff has recovered judgment in this action is void, under section 1183[1] of the Code of Civil Procedure, as such contract was oral, and the price fixed for doing the work therein mentioned exceeded $1,000. It is sufficient to say, in answer to this position, that the section referred to does not by its terms expressly relate to contracts for building sidewalks in cities, and we are unwilling to construe the section as applying to any contract not clearly within its letter as well as its reason. Section 1191[2] of the Code of Civil Procedure is the one that governs contracts for the construction of sidewalks, and that section does not provide that the contract for such work, when exceeding $1,000, shall be void if not in writing. We do not deem it necessary to particularly notice the other points made. We have considered them all, and find no error in the record.

ACTION TO QUIET TITLE—EVIDENCE.
